My hon. Friend mentioned the issues of Wessex Rail and the Prism deal and I hope to have time to deal with them all. The creation of a future Wessex Rail franchise to serve the west of England was announced by Sir Alastair Morton on 20 June. The franchise could include the area bounded by Worcestershire, Bristol and the south coast, or services to and from Gloucester. It could also include the line between Exeter and Waterloo, local services around Bristol and services transferred from Wales and West, South West Trains and the longer distance Thames Trains services. A study will be undertaken to define the Wessex franchise more precisely. A final decision will be made after consulting local and regional authorities and local rail passengers' committees.

Earlier this year, the SSRA also announced a feasibility study into a dedicated Wales rail franchise to serve the interests of Wales and the border counties more effectively. The study will decide which services should be included and consider the likely effects on passengers and value for money. Wales is served by seven franchises. There is little coherence and they have no ability to work effectively with the National Assembly or to address the emerging needs of Wales after devolution. The study will broadly consider the core of services within Wales and the border counties, excluding long-distance high-speed services that are operated by First Great Western and Virgin Rail, which provide the southern and northern inter-city links to London. The SSRA is consulting closely with the main stakeholders and an announcement is expected shortly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud mentioned the Prism deal. The franchising director reached an agreement on 15 June with Prism Rail plc on the restructuring of the group's portfolio of passenger rail franchises, which includes Wales and West, West Anglia Great Northern, Cardiff Railway and London, Tilbury and Southend Railway. As a result, the Wales and West and Cardiff Railway franchises will be surrendered on 31 March 2001 instead of early 2004, which will facilitate the SSRA's proposals to create a single franchise for Wales and the borders.

The new arrangements for the three shorter-term Prism franchises, which were originally let for seven years, will reflect the SSRA's goal in franchise negotiations to achieve the best possible outcome for passengers and the taxpayer while accelerating the national franchise replacement programme. The franchising director's objective is to replace the shorter franchises, which expire in 2004, within about two years. It is not known when the franchising director will be able to announce the outcome of any franchise replacement negotiations, but he is not committed to accepting any proposal and could allow existing franchises to run to their expiry date. If an application is to succeed, it will have to guarantee better performance, more investment and expansion of network capacity, improvements for passengers and value for money for the taxpayer.

My hon. Friend set out his concerns, which I share, about the performance and quality of service of train operators serving his constituency. Hon. Members will know that last year the rail industry made several commitments to improve rail services during the year. I am pleased that most of those have been met. However, more clearly needs to be done if passengers are to get the service they expect. We must continue to work with the industry to ensure that standards are raised. That means better safety, improved performance, new rolling stock and investment secured for the future.

Operators are being judged against a new public performance measure that gives a clearer and more meaningful idea of the actual performance of train operators. Initial data cover the second half of the last financial year, from mid-October to the end of March 2000. Compared with the same period in 1998-99, of the four operators that serve Gloucestershire, I am delighted to say that three have improved—Wales and West, Central Trains and Virgin CrossCountry. The new measure will also allow headline figures for each train operating company to be published every month, which is a clear improvement on the previous quarterly shadow Strategic Rail Authority reports. I am pleased to announce that the first monthly summary will be published this month.

Results from the second national passenger survey, which is a twice-yearly tracking study conducted by the Oxford Research Agency to measure levels of satisfaction across the entire franchised rail network, indicates that between 78 and 83 per cent. of passengers who use the four operators are satisfied with the overall service. However, there are still gaps between the best and worst performers. The worst performers must raise their game to match the best. The powers given to the shadow Strategic Rail Authority by the Transport Bill, which is now going through Parliament, will ensure that they do that or suffer the consequences.

I have described some of the measures that we are taking as part of the franchise replacement programme, as well as the other issues relevant to my hon. Friend's interests. I hope I have made it clear that, through such measures, we are determined to drive up the quality and performance of rail services and lever investment into the industry. I thank my hon. Friend for allowing us to discuss these important issues in this Adjournment debate.

Widening Access to Oxford University

12.29 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I am pleased to have the opportunity to debate this important subject, which has been in the news recently. Access to Oxford university was supposed to be a theme of Government campaigning, and a recent outburst by the Chancellor received a great deal of publicity. This is the first opportunity that we have had to discuss the subject in detail in the House. I think that everyone in the House and, indeed, everyone in society recognises that there is a problem about access to universities for less well-represented groups, especially in relation to the so-called elite universities—I would use the term "top" universities or university departments. We need to do something about that. I am pleased to welcome an Education Minister to the debate: I am sure that he feels as passionately as my constituents and I do about the problem of groups under-represented in higher education generally.

It is unfortunate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not here to respond to the debate, because that would give him an opportunity directly to answer some of the concerns that have been raised by my constituents and others about the Government's handling of the matter. The Chancellor waded into the subject by making a statement that was factually incorrect, offensive to people involved in the admissions procedure at Oxford and, most importantly, counterproductive to the aims of my constituents, of Oxford university and of the Department for Education and Employment. I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity, however indirectly, to apologise on behalf of the Chancellor, not only for making factual errors, of which everyone is capable, and not only for the unjustifiable offence caused to people involved in the admissions process at Oxford university—it is a casualty of all politics that some offence is caused—but mainly for the fact that his remarks were counterproductive and will make our task in rectifying the problems much more difficult.

It is worth considering the Chancellor's motives for pronouncing that the decision by Magdalen college, Oxford not to offer a place to one student was a scandal. What could his motives have been? It is interesting to note that he made the remark—which he knew would receive press coverage, because it had already been covered earlier in the week—at a celebration of the 30th anniversary of the Equal Pay Act 1970. Was it that the Chancellor had little to say about any new legislative proposals to deal with the pay gap between men and women? Given the subject of this debate, it is interesting to note that a pay gap in higher education has been proved to exist. The Bett report clearly showed a discrepancy in the pay of men and women in higher education, regardless of their status, for which the Government have refused to accept responsibility and refused to provide funding to tackle the problem.

The Minister often says that there has been a real-terms increase of 11 per cent. in funding for higher education and that that is sufficient to tackle the problem. However, he knows that that increase is to fund expansion, which he and I both welcome, but involves a reduction in the unit cost per student. When unit funding per student increases in primary and secondary education, the Government rejoice. In their annual report, they announced that as a wonderful thing, but when the higher education unit of resource is cut year after year by this Government, as it was cut by the previous Government, either they have nothing to say or they say that it is a necessary efficiency. I do not believe that equal pay or access can be fully tackled until that reduction in the unit of resource is halted or, preferably, reversed.

It is appropriate for me to refer to an individual case in relation to access to Oxford university, not least because Ministers, including Cabinet Ministers, have already done so. Some years ago, a state school student with a string of As at GCSE, or the O-level equivalent, applied to Oxford university. The student was predicted to do well at A-level, but was rejected by the medical school at Oxford, and went on to America to study at Harvard. That student was me. However, I went to Harvard high school in Los Angeles—and only for a year. I then applied again to Oxford university and got in. It was right that I was rejected the first time, as my performance in the entrance exam was poor. As I understand it, my place was given to a young woman from an inner-city school. She was born on the Indian sub-continent and had done equally well in her education, although she had overcome many more hurdles, not least that of language. I made no complaint and I was pleased to enter the university a year later. The contrast between my approach and that of the Chancellor in the Laura Spence case is startling. I shall speak more about that later.

We should consider the figures, as they are the basis of the subject under discussion. We know that only 7 per cent. of people are educated in the private sector, but that 50 per cent. of places at Oxford university and some other top academic departments go to students from the independent sector. That huge discrepancy is very worrying. The corollary is that the 93 per cent. of our young people who are educated in the state sector form only 50 per cent. of entrants to some of our top academic institutions. The gap can be narrowed, and it is important to note where it is reduced, so that we can see where the problem lies. Information given by the Independent Schools Association to the Select Committee on Education and Employment during its recent inquiry suggests that 20 per cent. of A-level entrants are in the private sector, which, of course, leaves 80 per cent in the state sector. The figure narrows the gap significantly, although there is still a huge discrepancy between the 80 per cent. of A-level entrants and the 50 per cent. of acceptances to top universities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department for Education and Employment (Mr. Malcolm Wicks) indicated assent.

Dr. Harris: I see the Minister nodding. The gap must be closed if we are to solve the problem, whose existence we both acknowledge. Approximately two thirds to 70 per cent. of pupils who gain the sort of qualifications—the Government consider A-levels the best measure—that are required for entry into the top institutions come from the state sector. The pool from which Oxford university and other top institutions can recruit is limited to that 70 per cent. Clearly, that percentage needs to be levered up, because it leaves a large discrepancy between the state sector pupils among those students eligible to be admitted and the proportion among those who are admitted.

The ratio of applications from the two sectors, which varies according to institution and subject of study, is approximately 50 per cent. each from the state sector and the private sector. That figure is approximate and varies year on year, but, crucially, it roughly matches the percentage of acceptances or offers made or entrants—the terms are analogous—into the top institutions. It gives at least prima facie evidence that the problem exists mainly in the proportion of the number of people with top A-level grades who are from the state sector and who actually apply to the top universities or, indeed, to higher education in general. It is that gap to which we should apply ourselves, and I hope that Government policy will be directed towards it as well as the others.

In any assessment of the relatively poor performance of young people in the state sector as compared with those in the private sector, we must first say that the poor performance is that of the sector and not of the young people themselves. It would be wrong to argue that there is anything to do with the students themselves that makes them on average less likely to do well in the state sector than students do in the private sector. Classes in the private sector are much smaller, which is what wealthier parents are paying for. We ask whether the Government are doing enough to ensure that funding in the state sector is equivalent to or is catching up with that in the private sector. That will help address the problems of morale in the teaching profession in the state sector.

In his latest Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer put nearly three times as much state money into reducing income tax, which will benefit the better-off, as he made available in additional funding to the state education sector. The Minister knows that the Liberal Democrat party and I oppose that. Our priority is yet more funding for the state sector, and we oppose those income tax cuts. It ill behoves a Chancellor who has such priorities to say that the problem lies not with inadequate resources in the state sector but in some sort of bias in our top universities.

The Chancellor who made those remarks is the same Chancellor who, although it was not mentioned in the election manifesto, cut at a stroke maintenance grants for the poorest students entering higher education and imposed tuition fees on most of the rest. Independent studies of the subject, not least the independent Cubie commission in Scotland, show that fear of debt is a significant deterrent to young people entering higher education, particularly for those from poorer backgrounds.

The Government are particularly keen on focus groups as a mode of gauging opinion. However, it is not surprising that the university partnership in East Anglia found that fear of debt among poorer families in areas with poor access to higher education is a major factor in deterring people from applying for higher education. That is also the view of the Independent Schools Association, which has no axe to grind on maintenance grants for poorer students. Indeed, the director of Sutton Trust told the Select Committee that he was aware of the work of the Cubie commission and could understand its point of view.

The Government may have increased access funds, which is welcome as far as it goes, but I wonder whether that is the way forward, because it is a post-application, post-acceptance, post-poverty solution. Once students get into poverty, they are encouraged to enter a beauty parade to decide who is the poorest and who can qualify for access funds.

The major component of the problem relates specifically to the number of applications being made to our top universities and to universities in general. The Minister will know that a huge amount of work is already being done, although it could be argued that more should have been done earlier. Next week, at Oxford university, I shall again attend one of a series of summer schools to encourage young people from comprehensive schools, from poorer backgrounds and from the state sector in general to apply to Oxford university. Such summer schools can be found at other universities. Indeed, the Department for Education and Employment, in its welcome excellence in cities initiative, is funding some of them.

I applaud the Government for that, but it rather defeats the purpose of funding schemes that encourage people to apply to universities when the person in charge of the purse strings says, "By the way, however much you are encouraged to apply, you may as well not bother. The admission scheme is stacked against you because the old school tie or old boys' network is at large." That unsubstantiated allegation has caused great damage.

Application statistics show little evidence of bias in the selection and admissions system at Oxford university. For example, of the students from UK schools selected to study biochemistry—the subject that Laura Spence eventually decided to study at Harvard university—62 per cent. of candidates were from the state sector, and 38 per cent. from private schools. That is similar to the distribution of students doing well at A-level, which is welcome; crucially, the success rate is almost identical for students from each background—a 69 per cent. success rate for state candidates and a 70 per cent. success rate for independent school candidates.

Success rates are similar in the medical school, to which Laura Spence applied. Just over 100 places are available for UK students, and about 500 applications are received. Approximately half those application come from the state sector—the proportion should be higher—and half are from the private sector. Almost every one of those students will have gained straight As at GCSE and will be predicted for straight As at A-level; there is no point in applying without such grades, because it is such a competitive subject. Even if every one of those just over 100 places had been allocated to state school students, 150 eminently qualified and highly able state school students would not get a place. That is 150 Laura Spences—an awful lot of speeches for the Chancellor to make. The allegation that the offers received by that capable student from other medical schools were somehow unworthy is of concern to those who work in the top universities.

One must ask what the Government seek to achieve, particularly when the Foreign Secretary says, on the one hand, that too much cachet is put on Oxbridge degrees—I would agree with that—while the Chancellor says, on the other, that it was a terrible crime that someone as able as Laura Spence could not get a place at Oxford and that she was therefore right to reject the other top universities. That was her decision, and I wish her well wherever she studies, but the biochemistry scholarship that she was awarded by Harvard—not the subject that she applied to study at Oxford—will not cover the fees that she will have to pay. Poorer students at Harvard have to take jobs to pay their way, perhaps by cooking meals for richer students.

The Chancellor and his colleagues would do best to consider their own country—Scotland has done away with some of the barriers that prevented people from poorer backgrounds from getting into higher education—rather than some American panacea. The number of applications in Scotland as a percentage of the population has increased this year by nearly 5 per cent. following the abolition of tuition fees and the reintroduction of maintenance grants in some form, whereas it is still falling in the rest of the country. That must give the Minister pause for thought.

Finally, it is important that we realise that a problem remains to be tackled. We must ensure that people with a state-education background apply for higher education generally, and particularly to our top universities. That process is not helped by Oxford and Cambridge and other top universities being portrayed as having a Brideshead image. I get extremely frustrated—the Minister, too, must feel this—at press and television coverage showing Oxford students wandering about in academic dress. The times when academic dress is worn at Oxford are much the same as at every other university.

We must change those prejudices. We must ensure that universities do more to get people to apply for higher education, including at Oxford. That process is not helped by the Government's ill-founded, factually incorrect, offensive and counter-productive attacks on individuals in the Oxford admissions process. I look forward to the Minister answering some of the points that I have raised about Government policy. I hope that he recognises the damage that was done by the Chancellor's intervention in the debate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Malcolm Wicks): The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) said that he was sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not able to reply to the debate. My right hon. Friend is elsewhere, helping to maintain a stable and growing economy, which must be good news for future public spending on education and many of our other priorities. It therefore falls to me to undertake the task.

I start with a quotation from the report of the vice-chancellor of Oxford university's working party on access of May 1999. In it, he said:

> Year by year, Oxford admits more applicants from the independent sector than from the maintained, although the latter group contains approximately two-thirds of those school leavers who obtain the highest A level grades. Fairness to applicants and fulfilment of the University's mission alike suggest that the proportion of applicants accepted should be closer to the ratio of high grades at A level, one-third independent school pupils to two-thirds maintained.

I am struck by the fact that, although the Oxford university working party was not complacent about social inequalities, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon appeared to be so on at least one occasion. He saw faults all over the place, but they did not relate to admissions policies. I side with the university in recognising that there is a serious problem.

Obviously, there has been much discussion about the matter in recent weeks and I for one welcome that, especially because it will become a spur for action. Many universities are doing good work to improve their links with state schools and colleges. They include Oxford, which is why I referred to the Oxford document. They are also reaching out to parts of our country where participation in higher education is traditionally low. As Oxford's vice-chancellor acknowledged, much more needs to be done. Although opinions differ on what precisely should be done, there is no doubt that action to improve the position should be taken in partnership: Government, universities, colleges and schools need to work together.

For our part, the Government have been taking action on a number of fronts to ensure that people with talent and all those who can benefit get their chance in higher education. Given the limited time that remains for this debate, this is not the occasion to speak in detail about our policies. However, I should point out that we are spending more on education. We have taken significant action for early-years and nursery education, and measures such as the primary school literacy hour and the numeracy strategy are in some respects as important to tackling this issue as encouraging an 18-year-old to apply to a particular university. The strategy applies across the board.

The hon. Gentleman presented a critique of our student finance strategy. The system that we have put in place is not subject to the failures that the hon. Gentleman outlined, but the system that we inherited failed in many respects. In his important report, Lord Dearing recognised that universities were seriously underfunded during the previous Government's time in office, which saw a dramatic fall in unit funding from public resources. Between 1989 and 1997, there was a 36 per cent drop, which is a drastic decline in standards. A further cut was planned for the subsequent two years. It is vital to get right the balance between quantity—with more of our young people going to university—and quality. Spending on higher education was also regressive, as the great majority of taxpayers who did not benefit from it paid for the minority of people who went to university and who came, predominantly, from the higher socio-economic groups. Until recently, the state spent almost twice as much on the education of graduates as on the education of people who left school at 16. Graduates benefit from higher earnings and are less likely to be unemployed.

The facts speak for themselves. In 1960, more than a quarter of the 18-plus group from the top three socio-economic groups went to university, but only one in 28 from the lower groups did so. Mandatory awards were introduced by the Education Act 1962, giving student support and paying tuition fees for most students. By 1990, however, participation by the top three socio-economic groups had risen to more than one in three. In the bottom three groups, however, barely one in 10 went to university. By the mid 1990s, the participation rate for the top three groups had risen to almost one in two, or 50 per cent., whereas for the other groups, it had risen to only one in six. Whatever was good about the old system, it did not crack the problem of socio-economic inequality.

The plain fact is that mandatory awards did not promote the increase in participation by the lower socio-economic groups for which many had hoped. We were determined to tackle that problem, which meant some tough choices about what was needed. Consequently, we accepted the Dearing recommendation that those who benefit from higher education should contribute towards its cost. The arrangements that we have put in place mean that we can provide the extra funds that universities and colleges need to widen access without damaging quality.

The income we receive from student contributions to fees has helped us to plan more than £1 billion of additional funding over the four years from April 1998, which is an 11 per cent. increase after allowing for inflation. The costs of higher education are now shared more fairly between students, their families and taxpayers generally. I was unsure whether the hon. Gentleman was suggesting that he would change that policy, but if he was, he did not say how that change would be funded. Not everything can be funded from that famous 1p on income tax. If the Liberal Democrats are to be taken seriously, they must spell out their funding and taxation priorities.

We have also ensured that students from less well-off families do not have to pay fees. Indeed, already more than 40 per cent. of all students are exempt from making any contribution. That will rise to 50 per cent. from next year because we shall raise the contribution threshold. I repeat—poor students do not pay fees.

We recognise that much more needs to be done on the issue of access. The recent data produced by the Sutton Trust and others are not new but are very worrying. We must do more to ensure that all our talented young people, whatever their background, get the chance they deserve in higher education. It is not satisfactory that only 17 per cent. of young people from lower socio-economic groups go into higher education, or that someone from a private school is almost 30 times more likely to get into university than someone from a disadvantaged background, or that 65 per cent. of those with three A-levels at A grade are educated in the state sector, but only 52 per cent. of entrants to Oxford and Cambridge in 1999 were from state schools or colleges. Many people are angry about that lack of equal opportunity. I am surprised that Liberal Democrat Members do not share that anger, and that they could not suggest one or two ways in which to improve the situation.

I applaud the work that has been undertaken by Peter Lampl and the Sutton Trust. The trust is sponsoring six separate university summer schools at Oxford, Cambridge, Nottingham and Bristol. The schools will run this summer and will be open to able 16 and 17-year-olds throughout the United Kingdom who fulfil the necessary criteria. Quite rightly, the focus will be on inner-city secondary schools and colleges where participation is still too low. We support that work and are contributing to its cost.

In addition, as the hon. Gentleman recognised, we are contributing £4 million towards piloting our own summer schools, which will start this month as part of the excellence in cities package and will offer opportunities to children from disadvantaged backgrounds. More generally, through the Higher Education Funding Council for England, we are allocating £30 million this year for initiatives to widen participation. A 5 per cent. funding premium for universities was introduced last year to recognise the extra costs incurred in recruiting students from disadvantaged backgrounds. I know that at Oxford that money has been carefully focused on the recruitment of students who might not otherwise aspire to study there. We have also introduced premiums for students with special needs and are supporting networks of universities, further education colleges and schools to enhance progression into higher education. We have provided £10 million for "opportunity bursaries" of up to £1,000 from autumn 2001, which will be aimed at young students from disadvantaged backgrounds.

We intend to build on that work to ensure that all universities have professional recruitment and selection systems that maximise applications from able students of all backgrounds. We will also ensure that schools and colleges not only raise the expectations of their students, but assist them in preparation for applications, interviews and selection examinations, which are crucial areas where there is much inequality within the different school systems.

I welcome this debate. The test for all of us will be how we move on. A great deal is being done to widen access, but a great deal still needs to be done. The Government and Oxford university recognise that. The issue is simple and has been debated in the House for more than 100 years. We are determined to offer every one of our citizens of high ability, whatever their social class, whether they are poor or rich, the opportunity to go to one of our top universities. This debate and that stimulated by the Chancellor's remarks have been useful, because they have provoked clashes between the forces of elitism and the values of equality. We know where we stand. I wonder whether the spokesman for the Liberal Democrats knows where he stands.

It being One o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 5 July 2000

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Euro

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dowd.]

9.30 am

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): I am delighted to have secured this debate in this parallel Chamber on the cost of changeover to the euro. I welcome my hon. Friends and the Minister.

The debate is especially timely. The press is full of spin and counterspin on whether the euro should be debated in public. The only time I have ever agreed with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was when he said that a proper debate should be held on the subject. I wholeheartedly agree, as do most of my constituents, who feel that a debate should be held to enable the general public to be thoroughly familiar with the issues involved so that, when a referendum is held, they can make a properly informed decision.

Eleven countries met the Maastricht criteria. Phase 3, to lock irrevocably the national currencies of the 11 countries, took place on 1 January 1999. The currencies of those countries will cease to exist on 1 January 2002. Interestingly, Greece, too, has now been admitted to the system. Denmark will hold a referendum on 28 September, the result of which will be eagerly awaited by the peoples and Governments of not only this country but Sweden, where Danish developments are anxiously watched.

In October 1997, the Government set out five economic tests that must be met before we can join the euro. I refer to box 2.1 on page 21 of the Government's Budget 2000 Red Book—interestingly enough, there is just three quarters of a page on the euro in the entire book. It is almost as though Mr. Brown personally wrote the Red Book to ensure little discussion of the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should know how to refer to other right hon. and hon. Members of the House.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: It is almost as though the Chancellor personally wrote the Red Book to ensure little discussion of the euro. That scant three quarters of a page sets out the five economic tests that must be met before a decision to join can be made. They are:

> whether the UK has achieved sustainable convergence with the economies of the single currency; whether there is sufficient flexibility in the UK economy to adapt to change and unexpected economic events; whether joining the single currency would create better conditions for business to make long term decisions to invest in the UK; the impact membership would have on our financial services... and, ultimately, whether the single currency would be good for employment.

Those five tests could be stretched to mean almost anything to anyone. I suppose that the first test is the most important and regularly cited. It relates to the problem with our exchange rate and the fact that our economy is out of synch with those of other European countries.

Some of my constituents who advocate joining the euro say that that will be a magical way to ensure either that the euro rises or the pound drops, placing us in a realistic position to accede to phase three. Commentators generally estimate that we need an exchange rate of DM2.60 to DM2.70 before it would be feasible for us to join. Surely if we magically achieved that exchange rate, the argument that manufacturing businesses would be put out of business would cease to exist. The core economic argument about whether to join the euro would then be the exchange rate of the euro against the United States dollar and the other major currencies of the world. It is worth noting that an exchange rate is an expression of the economic performance of a country or a group of countries. It is not some artificial mechanism.

That is where the argument becomes difficult. Economic tests have been set as to why we should join the euro, but on the major tests it seems that the United Kingdom economy does better outside the euro than it would inside it. The euro has dropped and our exchange rate has remained relatively strong against the dollar, the currency of our major trading nation. On inflation, which is one of the major reasons for wanting to join the euro, our rate is lower than those in all 11 countries on an adjusted basis. More importantly, our unemployment is favourable in comparison with that in other countries, and considerably so when one remembers that the average rate of unemployment in the European Community among those aged 25 and under was a staggering 18.4 per cent., almost twice our rate. On the major economic tests, there is good evidence to show that there is no urgency to join the euro.

The Government's case has been shot out of the water by some helpful figures from the Invest in Britain Bureau. One of the Government's major arguments is that we are losing out on inward investment, but an article in Sunday Business of 2 July blows a hole in that. It states:

> More than 40% of US investment in the European Union locates in the UK. And more than 25% of all investment in the EU comes to the UK.

It goes on to state that > 70% of US businesses succeed in the UK compared with just 42% in Europe.

Some of those points will be made at a conference later this week that the Chancellor will attend, so no doubt he will get into an even more dormant mode about publicising the benefits of the euro.

The Government have announced the second outline national changeover plan, which said that preparations for joining should continue in the public and private sectors. I want to concentrate on those aspects. Through the introduction of secondary legislation on negative procedure, which is difficult to challenge in the House, the Government have given themselves wide powers to spend almost unlimited and certainly unspecified sums—whatever is necessary—on the changeover to the euro. That especially applies in terms of spending by the Inland Revenue and the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Each Department has produced its own outline changeover plan. By the end of February, £6.3 million will have been spent in planning. Her Majesty's

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

Customs and Excise and the Department of Social Security will have invested £20 million in planning by the end of the year. That is a thoroughly good thing. The conclusion of the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury that was published on 22 April 1998 states that if we are going to go into the euro, proper planning will be absolutely essential.

Paragraph 9 of the report draws a useful parallel, stating that the European Commission frequently cites the UK's decimalisation programme as a good example of the implementation of a complex programme of change. The Committee recalled that one feature of its success was the fact that the decimalisation board consulted closely with retailers throughout and implemented the lessons that it learned.

Paragraph 9.2 reflects on the fact that preparations were in hand for five years, with no change for the value of the pound. Very few coins had to be replaced on decimalisation day itself, and there was general popular support. Despite all those factors, people working in shops in February 1972 say that that day was the worst of their working lives. The challenge of the euro is significantly greater, and one would expect people working in shops to find it difficult. Similar difficulty was anticipated on euro changeover day on 1 January 1999 but, despite the considerable numbers working in the City, the change itself was smooth. Whatever happens, everyone would admit that, in the unlikely event that the British people decide, in a referendum, that we should go into phase 3 of the euro, it is essential that the Government carry out proper planning. There is no doubt that considerable planning is taking place behind the scenes.

If the euro could be phased in over a longer period, costs to the taxpayer and private industry could be reduced. Existing systems would expire over their natural life, rather than being replaced prematurely in an accelerated programme to join the euro. The greater the warning before we join the euro, the lower the cost will be.

What is happening out there in the private and public sectors? It is worth examining the situation out there on the ground. In the past year, only 40,000 euro accounts were opened, only 4 per cent. of the total number of business accounts. London has 20 per cent. of the euro deposit market—my source is the Wholesale Market Brokers Association. London's global share of foreign exchange, at 32 per cent., compares with Germany at 5 per cent. In derivatives, London's share is 35 per cent., France's 10 per cent. and Germany's 7 per cent. My source for those figures is the Bank of International Settlements. People say that we are missing out by not joining the euro, but take-up of the euro is small in trade terms, especially among non-euro nations. The City of London is not at a disadvantage because we have not joined the euro, although it is often cited as being so. People can trade perfectly securely in a range of markets in London, which continues to have the lion's share of that trade.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): I apologise because a Select Committee engagement means that I will miss the last part of my hon. Friend's speech. It is hardly surprising that large firms and the City are making so few preparations for changeover, given that everybody knows that between 60 and 70 per cent. of the British people are opposed to scrapping the pound and replacing it with the euro. Why should businesses or the City want to spend great sums of money when they know that, if the referendum is ever held, the Government will lose it?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, which I was going to make myself later. There is also a more pragmatic reason for not making preparations. If there is no necessity to spend money on the changeover because business systems or trading patterns work perfectly well outside the euro, what is the incentive to spend on huge preparations for something that may or may not happen, on an uncertain time scale?

The Bank of England produces updated reports about practical issues, and it monitors the financial effects of the euro alongside the euro preparation units within the Treasury. Another problem, beyond the preparedness of the private and public sectors, is the production of euro notes and coins, which will have to take place in the 11 eurozone countries by 1 January 2002. Minting of all eight denominations of euro coins is also under way throughout those countries, and production is broadly on track to meet the requirement for 56 billion coins on the changeover date. Nine billion notes will need to be in circulation to meet transactions in the first fortnight after that date. It is a huge operation by the 11 eurozone countries, and it may be fortunate that we are not part of it. Those countries can allow their systems to settle down, and, should we ever want to go into the euro, we will be able to learn from their experience and see what the problems are.

What are the practical implications for Britain remaining outside the eurozone? The December 1999 edition of the Bank of England's "Practical Issues" report, to which I referred, states:

> All the available evidence indicates that, since the launch of the euro, London has fully maintained its market share. Statistics for the change in London's market share are not yet available in every market. However, the latest figures serve to demonstrate the extent to which the City is not just a UK asset but an asset for the EU as a whole.

That applies whether we are in or out of the eurozone. In a number of aspects, London is transacting the lion's share of the eurozone business. For example, it has more foreign banks and subsidiaries—537—than Frankfurt, Paris and New York, which have 242, 187 and 275 respectively.

I want to deal with the technical aspect of preparation in the public sector, as well as the private sector, money-handling sectors and opinion on the ground. This month was the deadline for all national health service trusts, which run our hospitals, to create a product initiation document. I have referred to the changeover document that every Department was required to produce, and trusts will be required to produce such documents by the end of this month. At a time when trusts are financially and physically stretched—out-patient lists, and waiting lists to get on to waiting lists, are growing every day—they are being saddled with the additional responsibility of producing a changeover plan. A document was presented to the Salisbury Health Care NHS trust by its finance director, who said, devastatingly:

> there are no known benefits from this project just a great deal of hard work.

Perhaps more importantly, no additional funding has been made available to pay for the huge amount of work and new equipment involved. That is an indictment of this Government, who are making preparations in the health service for something that may or may not happen, on a time scale that may or may not be certain, yet people's lives are at risk every day. It is incumbent on the Government to provide the trusts, and every other Government Department whose work is being hampered by changeover plans, with the proper funding and expertise to do the necessary work. It should not expect it to be funded out of existing budgets.

From my work on the Public Accounts Committee, I know the huge amount of money that has been wasted on highly expensive information technology systems that do not work properly. People's pensions were affected by the huge delay in getting the IRS2 computer up and running in the Benefits Agency. It is still not up and running properly. There have been problems with IT systems in the Crown Prosecution Service, the health service, the Ministry of Defence and the Passport Agency, just to mention a few. The Government grant of £20 million to update IT systems for the change to the euro, which is far bigger than any envisaged for those systems, is a drop in the ocean. It will be an interesting project to work out the true cost to the public sector.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The United Kingdom is variously rated as the fourth or fifth largest economy in the world, the second biggest overseas investor in the world, and the third most attractive location for inward investment in the world. Does my hon. Friend therefore agree that it is absurd that the Government are spending vast public sums on such an ill-conceived project? In the circumstances, should the Chancellor of the Exchequer be subject to a cash point fine?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The sums to be spent on a changeover plan must be considered carefully. In the public domain, two tranches of £20 million have already been spent and considerably more will doubtless be spent. I shall concentrate on the total spent by the private and public sectors as well as the cash-dispensing and note businesses because future and uncertain benefit could be gained against the present cost.

I have dealt at length with public sector costs and I shall now refer to private sector costs. Various studies have been undertaken into those costs. For example, Chantrey Vellacott, a firm of accountants in the City, has produced a well-founded plan showing that the costs to the private sector have already been £36 billion or 4.2 per cent. of gross domestic product. Some have criticised the company's figure as being unreliable, but KPMG's recent study of the 600 largest companies in the country shows that £12 billion has already been spent—and that was just by the 600 largest companies. It is reasonable to suppose that costs are at least double that, and that they probably amount to £24 billion. If we add to that figure the costs that have been spent in the public sector and the £1.7 billion that will need to be spent by the coins and note business, we will see that the costs amount to a significant proportion of GDP.

The costs represent 10 per cent. of the total wealth of the economy in one year. On 27 January 2000, the Daily Mail compared the cost of changeover of the euro with the Y2K problem and the necessity for business to invest in new IT and other systems to deal with the growing trade of e-commerce. All such matters must be put into context because they are all costs that business will have to bear and which will come off their bottom-line profits. The article stated:

> Y2K is a known cost, whereas EMU estimates have been increasing over time, so it is likely that EMU will represent an even higher multiple of Y2K costs.

It admits that the costs of preparing for the euro could divert companies from developing e-commerce strategies. Europe is already lagging behind the US in selling products on the internet.

There does not seem to be a particular imperative why the Government's five key economic tests should be met. On exchange rates, inward investment, employment, inflation and growth, it appears that no damage is being done to the UK economy. Indeed, there is ample evidence to show that trade with the United States and the far east has been growing since 1 January 1999, when the 11 eurozone countries came together. Britain could continue to be a magnet for inward investment throughout the world. It should trade with the rest of the world

One of my great fears is what will happen once we lock ourselves in. Under the Maastricht treaty, we would make an irrevocable decision to lock our exchange rate reserves into the system once we agreed to drop our opt-out against joining. The British people will need to think long and hard about the economic benefits. However, the economic benefits will not ultimately be the test. There will be a referendum. The British people will have to decide whether they want to join a system that will lead inexorably to a single European economy, following which we will have gone a long way towards having one European state. If, in the referendum, the British people decide to join, they would be taking one of the most far-reaching decisions made by the country since the second world war. No doubt the Government, through their spinning machine, will try their level best to persuade us that that is the right thing to do but there is much evidence on the other side to show that there is not necessarily any advantage to joining.

9.56 am

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): British business wants certainty, on which it can base investment decisions, as do potential overseas investors in Britain. A Conservative Government would bring certainty. It is certain that a Conservative Government would not introduce a referendum on the single currency during the lifetime of the next Parliament. That is settled Conservative policy, and it would be the outcome of a Conservative win at the next election.

We have, however, no clear indication of the consequences of a Labour win at the next election. There is an effective policy vacuum on the issue. I have no doubt that the Minister will say that the Government have set five tests, but they are not tests and they do not constitute a line to be taken. The five economic tests are merely a policy mantra. I suspect that there are five of them because a Minister in difficulty on the "Today" programme or the "World at One" can simply recite them so that even the commentator becomes bored and moves on to something else. The Government's tests are merely a mantra.

As everyone now appreciates that there is no policy but only a mantra, leaks are inevitably emerging throughout Whitehall, from the Department of Trade and Industry to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The British people perceive that the Labour party and the Government want no debate whatsoever on the subject, this side of an election. The Room that we are in provides clear evidence of that: unfortunately, under the guidelines set up by the relevant Committee, the television cameras can focus only on the hon. Member who is speaking, and that means that they cannot show the area in which one would expect to see Labour Back Benchers, which is entirely empty. Not a single Labour member of the Select Committee on the Treasury, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry or the Select Committee on Education and Employment has managed to tear himself out of bed or from other activities to attend the debate.

The Labour party does not wish to engage in debate on the euro. It has sent the Minister, who of course draws his pay and rations from the Treasury, and I am sure that he will elegantly and eloquently recite the mantra of the five economic tests—but that will be it. That is all that we will hear from the Labour party, despite the fact that senior officials in the Department of Trade and Industry are talking about a meltdown. Andrew Fraser, the chief executive of the Invest in Britain Bureau—today renaming itself Invest UK—has referred to a manufacturing meltdown. Having given advice to the permanent secretary and others, the poor man was allowed to go to the media—not to renege on his advice that there would be an economic meltdown in manufacturing if we did not settle a policy on our membership of the single currency, but simply to apologise for the leak.

Our ambassador to Japan in a memo to the Foreign Secretary commented:

> we flagged up increasing concern about the level of Sterling and uncertainty about British policy on the Euro. We assessed that "in the absence of new developments, Japanese companies in the UK will probably sit tight for another year or so in the hope that the Government will succeed in moving public opinion towards acceptance of Euro membership.
> This is broadly what has happened, but with two new negative factors. First, we have seen some actual closures and moves to source outside the UK as a result of price pressure. Secondly, as prospects for early entry into the Euro are perceived through media coverage to be receding, companies are beginning to see £ Euro unpredictability as a long term disincentive to investment in Britain.
> More generally, a perception has been spreading among economic opinion formers that the UK is not at present a safe bet. For example a former vice minister of finance said at a Welsh seminar on the Euro recently that "Until the UK decides to join the Euro, there is an element of risk which makes the UK a difficult choice for investment."

Against that background, Madam Deputy Speaker, all Ministers can do is repeat the five economic tests. From whichever perspective one comes, a debate is needed on this issue. The London chamber of commerce recently carried out a survey that found that almost three quarters of London businesses want Britain to join the single currency. Nine out of 10 executives who feel that a decision matters to their own company back entry. Yet not a single London Labour Member of Parliament is present to express the concerns of those businesses.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): The relevance of what my hon. Friend is saying is borne out particularly strongly by what is happening to companies like the big brewer in my constituency, Shepherd Neame, which must decide within the next two or three months whether to have tills capable of taking euro coins and notes. In Kent, particularly, places like Leeds castle and Shepherd Neame pubs will be forced to take the coins and notes, whether or not we join the single currency. If we cannot debate these issues, how can companies make an informed decision?

Mr. Baldry: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's comments. I fear that the British people will feel that the Government are involving them in one of the greatest spins ever. It is a deception, and it is disingenuous to have no public debate on the single currency between now and the next general election, and beyond. The electors suspect a sleight of hand, and, if and when a referendum is held on the single currency, they will feel that they have been cheated of a debate. Even worse, if, perchance, there were a Labour Government after the next general election and if they held a referendum, the public would feel that it was part of some plan in which they were expected to take the role of patsies. We all know that our constituents dislike that role and would reject those who put them into that position.

As Peter Riddell wrote in The Times yesterday, in some wise words that everyone should read,

> What the Gomersall memorandum really reveals is that the debate on euro entry is already alive, and kicking, and cannot be put off until after the next general election.

Our discussion shows that the debate is alive and kicking only in the Conservative party, while the Labour party is running from debate. Labour Members want to do nothing more than recite the five tests as a mantra. Those tests are meaningless and politically self-seeking, and Labour Members could suddenly decide at any time that they were being met.

Mr. John Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that Ministers are divided only over tactics, and not over their absolute determination to abolish the pound and join the euro? Does he also agree that the Prime Minister is hell-bent on dragging Britain into the euro at a cost that he cannot calculate, for a benefit that he cannot quantify and at a risk to the self-government of the British people that he dare not admit? It is a pity that the Prime Minister does not have the decency to reveal those crucial facts to the British people.

Mr. Baldry: I should not necessarily use exactly the language that my hon. Friend employs, but if that is the Government's collective view, it would be much healthier for democracy and the United Kingdom if they said so and initiated a decent debate. All that we have now is some shadow boxing in the Cabinet and elsewhere. A proper debate is not taking place. That is disingenuous and dishonest, and discredits UK politics.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, especially as I have had the Floor for the bulk of our debate. Does he agree that when the Government participate in the debate, they will have a duty not to put a highly pro-euro case, but to balance the argument properly, in our schools and elsewhere?

Mr. Baldry: There will be no difficulty in having a proper public debate. I have no doubt that people in business, public life and politics will speak robustly for and against our membership of the single currency.

Whether we join the euro is one of the most important questions facing the country in the early part of the millennium yet we are in a policy vacuum, in which the only people with the guts to speak up are officials and ambassadors, who are then immediately chastised and accused of deliberate and orchestrated leaks. I do not believe that those people leaked, but if an honest and open public debate is not led by Ministers, who have a responsibility to make clear the view of Her Majesty's Government, leaks from officials and others are inevitable, because that is the only way in which they can vent their frustration with the Government.

Madam Deputy Speaker, my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) has done us a service by initiating the debate, which has provided the graphic picture of the empty Labour Benches. Labour Members are engaging in a conspiracy of silence to ensure that a proper public debate does not take place.

Mrs. Marion Roe (in the Chair): Order. I remind hon. Members that when I am in the Chair I should be addressed as Mrs. Roe, not as Madam Deputy Speaker.

10.8 am

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): Mrs. Roe, I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I shall refer only to the narrowly defined issue of the costs of euro preparation.

A couple of years ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer established a committee on euro preparation, in which all parties were invited to participate. It is unfortunate that the Conservatives opted out, because that committee is questioning expert witnesses on many of the valid questions that Conservatives ask about the costs to the Government and the private sector. Participating in the committee at least removes some of the mystery and the elements of conspiracy that the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) saw. I amicably ask the Conservatives to take a fresh look at their participation.

At the most recent meeting, for example, we had a perfectly businesslike discussion with a Government nominee and the leader of the Welsh nationalists. I represented the Liberal Democrats. The fact that the Conservatives were not present robbed the debate of much of the flow for which one would have hoped. Their complaints about secret information and spin lose much of their legitimacy because they have passed up that opportunity.

In the broader context, I am not a fundamentalist, as most hon. Members are not. Doubtless there are people who would have us enter economic and monetary union at any time, while others would not join under any circumstances. A sensible approach is to consider the undoubted costs and risks of entry and those of exclusion, and to balance the two. That is what the debate is really about.

The hon. Member for Cotswold was primarily concerned about costs to the private sector. Attempts have been made to quantify them, and they are well worth considering. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Chantrey Vellacott study, a useful starting point that suggests substantial figures for the conversion costs. He alluded to a key point in that study: if capital stock is replaced as it becomes obsolete, there is no cost, because a new generation of investments would be required in any event. That is one reason why as much certainty and predictability as possible is desirable.

A whole set of studies has followed, one of which was made available to the Chancellor's sub-committee a couple of weeks ago. It dealt with the costs of preparation in Spain. Some detailed small-firm analysis was undertaken, which suggested that, if the UK experience was similar to Spain's, the cost would be a maximum of £1,000 each for about three quarters of companies—most of the small companies. We are talking about very small sums, although a lot more work clearly needs to be done.

The big question—this is where we get into the big debate about the five conditions—is whether the benefits of joining or the costs of exclusion are sufficiently large to outweigh the undoubted predictable conversion costs. As a result of the past two or three years' experience, we have a better understanding of the costs to the UK of both exchange rate instability and highly inappropriate exchange rates. Despite recent adjustments, the exchange rate is still, in real terms, higher than it was when we were members of the exchange rate mechanism. The costs of that are felt acutely by manufacturing industry.

Whatever the rate, exchange rate instability is a major cost that manufacturers in particular must bear. There have been fluctuations of 20 to 30 per cent. in both directions in the past few years. Clearly, if a rate can be fixed with trading partners who account for roughly 55 per cent. of our visible trade, one does not eliminate exchange rate instability, but one goes a considerable way towards mitigating its effects.

Mr. Rowe: I understand entirely the hon. Gentleman's concern about manufacturing industry, but it is my perception that the tourism trade, on which so much of our business depends, is also being hit very hard. Is not that also a considerable cost to bear?

Dr. Cable: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct. Perhaps I should more precisely have said that the trading part of the British economy, which is predominantly manufacturing, includes agriculture and tourism. All three sectors have been hit badly by instability and the over-valuation of the pound. The cost of exclusion from EMU is that the trading part of the economy would face indefinitely all that instability.

[Dr. Cable]

The second point—the debate is developing in an interesting way—relates to the impact on foreign direct investment. It is true, and this morning's figures show it, that Britain remains an attractive destination for foreign investment.

There was a revealing survey last week of the 10 leading foreign investors—American, Japanese and European—in the UK, nine of which made it clear that, although they were happy to continue to operate in the UK, future investment would be heavily dependent on whether they could see Britain making progress towards entry to EMU. The impact of exclusion on foreign direct investment is unlikely to be viewed dramatically, but Britain's share of new foreign investment flows will decline. We can already see the relative share beginning to tail off. The consequences for jobs and the overall impact on the efficiency of British manufacturing industry—will become increasingly onerous as time goes by.

To add anecdote to statistics, the most telling example last week was Nissan, which has made a major impact in the UK because of high productivity at its Sunderland plant. The Japanese and UK management made it clear that they viewed the future of Nissan in the UK as conditional on participation in EMU within a reasonable time.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that exchange rates are not the only factor that companies take into account when they decide whether to invest in Britain? The wider macro-economic situation, including regulations and legal systems, is also important.

Dr. Cable: Exchange rates are only one among several factors, but the hon. Gentleman is complacent if he believes that the UK is far ahead of continental competition in other respects. An increasing percentage of foreign investment is going into France—traditionally regarded as hidebound by dirigiste controls. France is liberalising, at least partly because of the impact of the single market and EMU. For those faced with the brutal choice between liberalising European economies or the UK economy—still attractive in certain respects—EMU could make a decisive difference.

The third respect in which the costs of exclusion will prove important—and they are already making an impact—relates to the workings of the single market. As I enjoy pointing out to Conservative Members, the single market was Mrs. Thatcher's great historic achievement and it is having major consequences on European industry. The combination of the present single market with stable currencies is—as anyone in frequent contact with European business will know—having a major impact on the restructuring of European industry, fuelled by the rapidly growing eurobond market.

EMU has been an important catalyst. Both foreign and indigenous businesses across Europe are radically restructuring to take account of the realities of EMU, but British companies are not part of that process. As long as they are excluded, the long-term consequences on investment will be negative.

The costs of exclusion can be measured in terms of interest rates. Despite the fact that British short-term rates are moving upwards, the differential is about 2 per cent., which reflects long-term experiences of inflation. That amounts to a real cost for business and for domestic householders. The Government and the private sector will face conversion costs—and we should be honest about that—but the costs of exclusion will become more tangible and apparent as time goes by.

In conclusion, I share some common ground with previous speakers, who are absolutely right about the importance of debating these issues publicly. The Government have done us no favour by stretching out the uncertainty associated with British entry. Major uncertainty remains about when the referendum will be held and its likely results, which could have been reduced if the referendum had been tackled earlier in the Parliament.

Mr. Bercow: May I challenge the hon. Gentleman on what he just said? Interest rates rise and fall, and the proportion of variable rate mortgage finance in this country is substantially greater than in the member states of the eurozone. When calculating the cost of our becoming part of the eurozone, does the hon. Gentleman accept that he must factor in the surrender of our exclusive right to set our interest rates to people whom we do not elect and cannot remove?

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman makes a major point about sovereignty, and a more specific point about interest rates and mortgages. I shall respond to the latter. It is true that there is more exposure to inappropriate interest rates if there is a variable interest rate system in the housing market. The hon. Gentleman, who is interested in finance and economic policy, knows, however, that much experimentation is taking place by British institutions. For example, Standard Life, which survived a proposal for demutualisation last week, is leading the market in introducing fixed-rate mortgages. When that spreads throughout the City, many of the associated risks will disappear.

The Government were remiss in not accepting the challenge of public debate, which those who favour EMU entry would win. They should make it absolutely clear that entry to the EMU is right for the British economy and should not hide behind the five conditions. Secondly, they should state that they will hold a referendum at the earliest opportunity—at the start of the next Parliament. Thirdly, on the basis of the promise of an early referendum, they should set out a timetable to prepare United Kingdom business to join.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I congratulate my hon. Friend for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) on securing the debate, which affords the Government the occasion to report on the changeover. If the Minister gives a full report of what is going on, we shall learn some interesting truths.

The debate is not about whether we are for or against the euro. First, the citizens of this country are not stupid; they know that, for a long time, the British economy has been broadly in synch with that of the United States, not Europe's, and that our exchange and interest rates therefore move in tandem with those of the USA. Secondly, events in Asia have shown how important it is to allow the exchange rate to take the strain, even though doing so may cause pain. It could be argued that that is the reason why the United Kingdom and the United States have enjoyed an extra three years of strong growth.

I take issue with some of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold. Europe is restructuring because that is what its business desperately needed to do; the feebleness of the euro reflected Europe's economic weaknesses. Restructuring in the UK started long ago as part of the Thatcherite supply-side reforms and it continues here, as it does in the USA.

Our debate focuses on the mechanics of the changeover and the costs. The Finance Act 1998 required the Treasury to be transparent about financial matters, and the Government's policy on the euro is relatively clear: they are pledged to join the euro when five conditions have been met. As has been stated several times, it is Government policy to prepare for possible entry by putting in place the necessary mechanisms, so that entry is not delayed by lack of preparation.

Making preparations is consistent with Government policy, but what has been happening in reality? What progress has been made and what are the plans? As with any commercial undertaking, one needs to know first about the costs to the public and private sectors. I acknowledge that capital equipment will need to be replaced, especially where such equipment relates to cash. It will not be difficult to produce figures for gross costs and estimated net costs to the public and private sectors. I hope that the Financial Secretary will take this opportunity to report estimated costs in the light of money spent and efforts made. We have seen only the Chantrey Vellacott report and KPMG estimates. According to Government data, Marks & Spencer estimates a gross figure of £100 million, and Tesco estimates £20 million. Lloyds-TSB estimates the cost of system conversions to be about £300 million. I assume that all that homework will ensure that we leave this Chamber much better informed about estimated costs.

The national changeover plan has allegedly identified the measures necessary to prepare the business sector, but I have read the reports, and to be frank, much of the information is guff. No clear analysis is provided of what is to be done and when. As hon. Members have pointed out, the process cannot compare with decimalisation—a relatively modest process that was successfully planned and executed over five years.

According to current Government figures, £6.3 million was spent on planning to the end of February and there is a further budget of £20 million. Although that may be wasted money, it is not very much to finance the grand changeover plan. The expenditure of such a sum would not prepare this country for joining the euro, were we foolish enough to decide to do so. Some £20 million has been budgeted for the Department of Social Security—what is that about? What will the health service be obliged to spend, given that it often has other, more pressing priorities?

In short, what is the plan? What are the plans for the public and private sectors, and what costs will they incur? Last year, many businesses voiced strong objections to being pressed to spend money before a decision has been taken. Last week, I made several inquiries and found to my surprise that very little has been happening. In most cases, there has been all talk and no action. As I shall explain, the perception throughout the private sector is that the matter is on the back burner and, unlike a year ago, is not being addressed actively.

The Bank of England is the one body that soldiers on doing a splendidly professional job. Although its Governor has made it clear that the Bank does not think that it would be a good idea for this country to join the euro, it has set out for the financial sector, both institutional and retail, what would be involved, what needs to be done and what sort of detailed plan needs to be drawn up. I commend the Bank, as ever, for its diligence and professionalism.

The Government formed an organisation called BAG—the business advisers group—to go round visiting private sector businesses to tee them up, tell them what to do and gather information. I have received personal representations from several of the main banks: as far as I can tell, BAG has done precious little and nothing much has happened. Businesses are focusing on and concerned with the regulatory changes, taxes and UK employment burdens that have been imposed on them, but they are certainly not focusing on planning for euro membership. I understand from the banks that they have effectively told the Government that they have no intention of improperly wasting shareholders' money on the necessary technical changes until Government policy has been sharpened up considerably. They have also told me that it would take at least three years from now to put the economy in a financial position suitable for euro membership.

The Government are in exactly the position that they said that they did not want to be in. Even if—unlikely as it now appears—they were to win the next election and hold their referendum, they could not possibly meet the requirements within the time scale that they have set, because the necessary organisation and preparation has not been done.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware of an article that was published in The Times on 17 February, which described an ICM survey of 1,001 company chief executives that revealed that 87 per cent. would not make any significant preparations for the euro before a referendum, and that 73 per cent., compared to 63 per cent. last March, were opposed to joining?

Mr. Flight: I thank my hon. Friend for that extremely relevant intervention. He reminds me of another survey—which he has, no doubt, seen—revealing that only 15 per cent. of Japanese businesses that have invested in this country have any material concern about whether we join the euro—they have invested here because of the quality of our law, our language and the fact that we do not have expensive employment taxes. The myth that international investors believe that everything hangs on whether we join the euro is peddled for political reasons by those who want to join the euro, but it is manifestly not true.

The key issue is the Government's timetable. One of the few concrete things to have come out of all their planning is their bold and important argument that, if they get back into power, they expect to take four months between proposing to join the single currency and holding a referendum, and 30 months between the referendum and joining. Given the state of organisation in the private sector—and, I assume, the public sector, although we have little knowledge of what it has been doing—it is clear that there is absolutely no way in which that timetable could be met. In 1999, regional forums were held around the country, but little emerged from them, because, as my hon. Friend pointed out, almost 90 per cent. of businesses are, rightly, not prepared to waste their funds until the Government show greater clarity of policy.

The events I describe reflect the fact that the wise people in the Treasury have quite rightly gone cold on the euro. I dare say that they have come to appreciate the sound economic and political reasons for which the Conservative party has, for some time, opposed euro entry. A major division between the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry, and between individual Ministers, has become apparent.

The Chancellor recited as usual the mantra of his five principles in his Mansion House speech. However, it is telling that, toward the end of his speech, he said something that struck me as a coded signal against membership of the euro. He stated:

> We cannot pre-judge the five economic tests. To do so before we have secured sustainable convergence would risk repeating past failures, mistaking exchange rate stability for stability across the economy and prejudicing our commitment to move Britain from the instabilities of a stop-go economy to greater long-term stability. The Government will not agree to a short-termist approach that would put at risk economic stability or the discipline that has created sustained growth, rising investment and—so many new jobs.

Despite the coded nature of that statement, the crucial point is that there has been no material development towards convergence. As Europe gradually comes up, and the United States and the United Kingdom go down, as is likely after eight years of growth, there may be some coincidence of interest rates and inflation rates. However, in terms of economic cycles, the United Kingdom is ever more in tandem with the United States, while remaining at a 180-degree variance with continental Europe.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): The hon. Gentleman said a moment ago that the Conservative party was opposed to entering the single currency. My understanding of the Conservative party's formal position is that it would not take Britain into the single currency during the life of the next Parliament. Will the hon. Gentleman clarify his party's position?

Mr. Flight: I am glad to hear that the Financial Secretary knows Conservative party policy and that he describes it correctly. The essence of our position is that, on both economic and political grounds, it would be against the interests of this country to join the euro. However, no one can ever claim to have perfect wisdom, so we say, "Let us see what happens." We could be wrong, and the lifetime of a Parliament is a reasonable period in which to determine whether we are wrong. That is common sense.

Treasury Ministers appear to be moving fast toward the same policies, in complete contradiction of the official policy of the Prime Minister and the Labour party. It is hardly surprising that the pro-euro camp in the Government has resorted in recent weeks to slightly desperate spin and public relations, led by the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry, for Northern Ireland, and for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who are spinning as hard as they can against the shift in policy that the Chancellor is attempting to initiate and to control.

As I said earlier, the Labour party is committed to entry, and, if it wins the next election, to holding a referendum as soon as possible. It is also committed to ensuring that the country is organised to join the euro if all those conditions are met, and to ensuring that delays do not occur because the pre-planning and organisation have not been carried out. However, if one focuses on reality, not on spin, one can see that little has been done in connection with the national changeover plan. The Government have given no advice to the nation or its businesses about what the true costs are likely to be. If the Minister acknowledges that and says that the approach is not part of a deliberate Treasury slowdown, he will have to say, by default, that incompetence is involved.

Representatives from the real business world, including the Confederation of British Industry, banks, companies and trade representatives, have told me that the issue is definitely on the back burner. The Government's measures mean that they have plenty of other things to do. Last year, they thought that they were being kicked and cajoled into making progress, but that has stopped and they have heard nothing for the past year or so.

I conclude by repeating the request that I put to the Minister at the start of my speech. What is going on? What will the costs be, what are the Government doing in the public sector, and what do they want to achieve in the private sector?

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) secured this debate. We have had an interesting discussion, and I congratulate him. To some extent, the discussion has trodden on familiar ground but I am pleased to have this opportunity to set out, once again, the Government's policies on these important matters.

Our policy can be summed up in the slogan, "Prepare and decide". That summarises the policy set out to Parliament by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in October 1997 and reiterated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in February 1999. We announced our commitment in principle to economic and monetary union and our belief that the decisive test for United Kingdom membership should be whether there was a clear and unambiguous case for us to join. That is why we set out five economic tests, to which several hon. Members have referred, which will have to be met before any decision to join can be taken.

I remind hon. Members that those tests are: first, whether the UK economy has achieved sustainable convergence with the economies of the single currency; secondly, whether there is sufficient flexibility to adapt to economic change; thirdly, whether joining the single currency would create better conditions for businesses to make long-term decisions to invest in the UK; fourthly, the impact that membership would have on the financial services industry; and, fifthly, whether joining the single currency would ultimately be good for employment.

In view of the magnitude of the issue, we have said that, as a matter of principle, if, having assessed those five tests, the Government decide to enter, the decision should be put to the British people in a referendum. If we are to join the single currency, the Government, Parliament and the people must agree. We want to give Britain a genuine option to decide whether to join, if that is what the Government, Parliament and the people want to do.

We are keeping open the option of making a decision early in the next Parliament. That involves ensuring that those parts of the economy that would be central to changeover, such as the Government's revenue Departments, the wholesale financial markets and the retail banks, should continue to plan effectively. I welcome the point made by the hon. Member for Cotswold about the importance of having those plans in hand and of making progress. The second outline national changeover plan makes it clear that, thanks to the targeted work that has been carried out individually and collectively during the past year, the strategy is firmly on course.

I can tell the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) that we have had continuing discussions with key stakeholders in the private sector. The illustrative timetable—the period of up to 40 months set out in the latest edition of the changeover plan, published in March—remains valid. It has been endorsed by the Confederation of British Industry, the British Chambers of Commerce and the Trades Union Congress, so the fears that the hon. Gentleman expressed are ill founded.

Mr. Flight: Has it been endorsed by the all-important institutions, namely the banks? The Minister will recall that I mentioned that my soundings with the heads of some of our main banks had pointed towards a three-year programme.

Mr. Timms: As I said, the period envisaged in the changeover plan is 40 months. The plans have been endorsed by the banks. The hon. Gentleman said that the Bank of England had done a great deal of work with the financial services industry. Last month, it published a report on the practical issues arising from the euro. Progress has been made, and is continuing satisfactorily.

Our approach to preparing for the possibility of joining the single currency is to co-ordinate planning and facilitate the appropriate level of preparation. That involves, first, identifying areas key to a smooth and cost-effective changeover. Secondly, we will work with the key parties to agree effective ways forward. Thirdly, we will provide a framework within which organisations can take forward their planning. Fourthly, we will set out a critical path for the process. Fifthly, we can give a lead by planning for the public sector.

Following publication of the first outline national changeover plan, Ministers agreed that all Departments should advance internal planning and prepare outline changeover plans by the end of 1999. Departments used a template-based planning approach. Officials worked with consultants to design a model—Ernst and Young was involved—that was piloted and rolled out to all Departments and designated key agencies. All Departments prepared internal planning documents before the end of 1999. Departments considered the services that they might provide during changeover and how they might convert their systems to the euro. They identified key planning activities and lead times for carrying them out. That exercise confirmed that only the Department of Social Security and the revenue Departments have lead times that require them to start detailed development before a referendum. Many public sectors are drawing on the experience of member states in the first wave and are working with the private sector in developing their planning.

With the private sector, we have facilitated a series of discussion groups, involving suppliers and users of financial services, to produce a set of common assumptions on the likely pattern of demand for euro services during a UK changeover. Those discussions will form the basis of future work to develop an understanding of the likely pattern of demand. The work will take into account the experiences of first wave member states and the evolving expectations of suppliers and customers.

The process has involved the retail banks, the utilities—through the Utility Buyers Forum—the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise, the Department of Social Security, the Association of British Insurers and the British Retail Consortium. The City euro group is working on the needs and expectations of those in the wholesale financial markets who rely on retail linkages—for example, the fund management industry. There will be further consultation, including discussions with representatives of the large and small corporate markets. Contrary to the impression that was given earlier, a great deal of work is going on.

We are also learning by monitoring what happened in the first wave member states. We have an opportunity to see how the 11 participating member states managed the changeover to the single currency. They successfully converted their wholesale financial systems in time for the locking of currencies. That evidence backs up what United Kingdom businesses that have considered making a changeover are saying: that demand for euro services early in a transition period would be limited mainly to wholesale financial markets and larger businesses.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but as well as detailing the considerable amount of consultation, will he speak about the financial cost to the public sector using the Salisbury Health Care NHS trust example that I gave, in which patient care was being put at risk because the health service has received no additional budget to meet the cost of the changeover plans?

Mr. Timms: I shall certainly comment on the financial aspects, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that there has been no diversion of resources from front-line patient care to planning work. I shall speak about the costs that have been incurred by the public sector and respond to his intervention.

[Mr. Timms]

We have continued to give regular updates on our changeover work and, of particular importance in the context of our debate, the cost of the work that we have carried out. We provided details in the second outline changeover plan, published in March, on spending to date on preparations for the possibility of United Kingdom entry, which is some £6.3 million. That includes £1.6 million by the Department of Social Security, £1.8 million by Customs and Excise, £1.3 million by the Inland Revenue, £600,000 by the Bank of England and £500,000 by the Treasury's euro preparations unit. That investment has allowed us to undertake analysis and design work. We recognise that further work will be necessary in the key departments, and legislation has been implemented to allow Departments on the critical path—revenue Departments and the Department of Social Security—to invest in preparation for their large and complex information technology systems. References have been made to £20 million, which has arisen because three Departments—the Department of Social Security, the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise—plan to invest around £20 million during the current financial year. That will ensure that the public sector is ready for the possibility of a decision to join early in the next Parliament and to follow the illustrative 40-month timetable set out in our published changeover plans, if required.

Mr. Rowe: I do not wish to distract the Minister from his argument and, if I have intervened too early, perhaps he will forgive me. Will he say something about the likely impact on the local economy of the circulation of notes and coins, and their acceptability across counters?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. Major stores in Oxford street already accept notes and coins of other currencies, and I have no doubt that they expect to accept euros. The hon. Gentleman may be right: there may be a wider decision to accept euros in tourist areas in the United Kingdom.

I turn to spending beyond a positive referendum result. We must distinguish between the costs incurred by the public and private sectors. We have not estimated the total cost to the public sector of a changeover because planning is still incomplete, so we are not able to do so. However, the cost of a changeover would essentially depend on the approach adopted by the public sector.

We recognise the importance of continuing to monitor the position closely. In the event of a changeover, any spending would be scrutinised by the Treasury in the usual way, just as departmental spending has been. In the private sector, the cost would depend on the approach taken to a changeover by each firm and the extent to which the euro had been considered in investment decisions prior to joining. Those are commercial decisions for individual companies.

I am a little sceptical about the value and the feasibility of trying to produce overall estimates for the whole private sector. A major survey would certainly be necessary for the production of a robust estimate, the conduct of which would place a significant and unnecessary burden on businesses. However, we are working hard to ensure that a changeover would be cost effective. We are consulting widely to establish the key issues in a changeover and how they might be addressed, and we are monitoring the experiences of the first wave countries. We are consulting their key customers and learning from the experience of the first wave member states. The revenue Departments believe that the best use of resources would be to phase in euro services, ensuring that they invest only in those services for which there will be real demand.

I wish to respond to a couple of points that were critical of the Government's position. Hon. Members have asked why businesses should spend on something that might never happen. I agree with the hon. Member for Cotswold that people should take steps to prepare for a changeover. Each company has to decide on its own approach. Some sectors, such as the retail banks, the wholesale financial markets—to which the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs referred—and retailers are critical of the changeover process, because they provide the infrastructure on which other parts of the economy depend.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to the Minister for being exceptionally courteous during the debate. Are the Government considering whether returns for value added tax and income tax may be filed in euros and, if so, when is that likely to happen?

Mr. Timms: That is one of the issues that the revenue Departments are considering. A gamut of matters will need to be addressed. As the hon. Member for Cotswold said, changeover planning will take money from front-line services. All parts of the public sector must undertake analysis and planning for the possibility of UK entry. The hon. Gentleman was right to support that planning and, by undertaking it now, the Government will ensure that any changeover takes place in a smooth and cost-effective way. It will be a management exercise and such work will be developed to ensure that it does not disrupt front-line patient care, for example. Proper preparation will help to deliver a smooth and cost-effective changeover and ensure that public services will not be significantly disrupted.

Our policy on the single currency can be summed up neatly as being to prepare and to decide—the policy set out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in October 1997 to Parliament and by the Prime Minister in February last year. I am grateful for the support expressed for preparations to be made in Parliament so that, should the economic tests be met, a decision to join the single currency can be made early in the next Parliament. Without preparation, that would not be a practical option. We need a framework for businesses that want to plan ahead. We have a unique opportunity to learn from the experiences of the first wave member states. Where expenditure might be required in the public sector—for example, in the revenue Departments and the Department for Social Security—legislation has been passed that will allow planning for that.

Parliament should be asked to provide permission for such expenditure. We have been open about our investment in pre-planning work, and our changeover plans set out what we have achieved and invested, the direction of our future changeover work and the amount that the public sector has spent on preparations. We cannot estimate the cost of changeover at this stage. Interestingly, even the first wave has not produced official estimates of the cost of changeover work.

Mrs. Marion Roe (in the Chair): Order. We now move to the next debate.

Organic Food and Farming

11 am

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I am grateful for the opportunity to introduce a debate on Government support for organic food and farming. I am only sorry that it coincides with the Select Committee on Agriculture's taking evidence in its inquiry into organic agriculture. Perhaps that merely proves the subject's topicality.

My interest is long-standing, and was greatly increased by my involvement with Sustain, the coalition of organisations that drafted the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill. I first raised the issue in the House as a ten-minute Bill in the previous Session, and the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) introduced it this year as a private Member's Bill. I pass on his apologies for his absence for the early part of the debate; he hopes to join us later.

I acknowledge the Government's support for organics, and especially the interest shown by my right hon. and hon. Friends. Last year, more than £11 million was allocated to farmers who wanted to convert to organic production; in 1997, the figure was just £1 million. I was delighted by last month's announcement by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that a further £140 million will be made available over the next seven years.

The number of farms that have converted has trebled. In 1994, there were only 715 certified organic farms in the United Kingdom; by November 1999, there were more than 2,000. Research funding has increased, too. I do not know the details of today's announcement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the extra £1 billion for science, but I hope that some of it might find its way into the sector.

As in many other aspects of Government policy, much has been done, but there is much more still to do. The Government's declared policy and strategy is to expand organic farming in an open-ended way as far as the market will allow. I must tell my right hon. Friend that there is great scope.

UK farmers currently supply only 30 per cent. of the organic market—a market that is set to treble by April 2003. Given such a rapidly expanding market, there is an urgent need for more research, for expansion in certification capability and for infrastructure building. Much of the demand for organic produce stems from objections to genetically modified foods. Yet organic farming is set to receive 1.8 per cent. of the research budget allocated to agriculture this year, while biotechnology and genetic modification will receive more than 23 per cent. That equates to £2 million for organic farming and £26 million for biotechnology research, although organic farming has a huge market, and GM foods almost none.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will take the opportunity to tell us how she plans to increase the amount of organic food grown in the UK. Demand is already growing at 40 per cent. per year, and Iceland's welcome decision to go 100 per cent. organic, along with plans to set up dedicated supermarkets all over the country in the next four years, suggests an even greater acceleration. The irony is that that demand cannot be met by crisis-ridden UK farmers, as the organic farmers scheme ran out of money eight months ago and will not reopen until April next year. Farmers will naturally hold off until incentives are in place, while other countries take advantage of our growing demand.

The Government's information line has received more than 2,000 inquiries about conversion to organics while the scheme has been closed. Can my right hon. Friend give any encouragement to those who are seeking to convert now? Are there any prospects of additional funding that could enable her to give guarantees of retrospective funding for farmers who could start converting before April 2001. I also invite my right hon. Friend to give us her estimate of market demand and the financial support necessary to achieve the Government's objective of meeting that demand. She will know that I, and the supporters of the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill, estimate that £90 million per annum, or £70 million more than has been promised, would be necessary for English farmers in the new organic farming scheme if the targets in our Bill were to be met.

I now turn to the wider picture. The current EU average for the percentage of land farmed organically is 2.2 per cent., so we can be pleased that the UK figure of 3 per cent. is above that target. That is partly due to the Government substantially increasing the amount available for conversion. However, we are nowhere near the top of the league table for European countries. In Sweden, more than 11 per cent. of the land is organically farmed. In Austria the figure is 10 per cent., and in Denmark and Finland the figure is around 6 per cent. Some—but not all—countries have had a longer period of conversion, but there are significant funding differences. First, the total funding that is paid to organic farmers in the UK is lower than in many other EU countries. Secondly, two of the 14 countries also pay on-going maintenance payments to farmers after the conversion period has ended. I suggest that we are considering a straightforward competition issue here, which my right hon. Friend might use in any conversations with the Treasury. I would be grateful for her comments on that.

Finally, UK organic farming is at a comparative disadvantage because the four European countries with the most organic farming are those that have set targets and developed a strategy to achieve them. That is no coincidence. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary has acknowledged that targets can be useful in terms of fixing aspirations and underlying commitment. I guess that our competitors agree.

Organic farming straddles so many sectors and Government Departments that it is increasingly clear that its sustained and balanced development cannot be achieved without one clear target for all interested parties to work towards. Denmark made no fewer than 65 recommendations in its action plan, which resulted in increased investment in research and training, increased agri-environment support and the removal of barriers to increased organic production. We need to do the same. We need to examine the barriers to the development of the organic sector and find ways to overcome them. That need not mean extra Government funding in every area. In some cases, the Government could simply act as a catalyst, analysing problems and promoting market support.

What should the Government do to benefit from increased organics demand? How can the Government put the UK among the best in Europe, rather than it being just one of the rest? Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends agree with me that the Government should adopt a target based on projections for the market. We believe that the market will require 30 per cent. of agricultural land to be organic by 2010. A strategy should also be developed to achieve that target, as suggested in the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill, as proposed by the hon. Member for North Cornwall. The Government's strategy is to expand the organic sector only to the extent that the market will accept. That clearly has an undeniable logic, but it is far too passive. Even a strategy designed to follow the market has already fallen way behind it. Setting targets and a strategy to meet them has many advantages, as the experience of other countries demonstrates.

Most of us believe that farming in this country is in crisis, and farmers have been encouraged to get themselves out of it through Government plans to help them diversify. The last thing farmers need is to plan to diversify by converting to organic farming, only to find six months later that the Government's money has run out again. That could result in financial ruin, and farmers will clearly not undertake the risk. They need to have confidence in the sector, and they need to see that the Government have a strategy and a clear direction.

We need to change from an organic sector that is developing in fits and starts, grinding to a halt when money runs out, to one that is set on a sustainable course of growth. A strategy to ensure that would need to be based on analysis of past demand and trends to predict demand from farmers and consumers. Enough money could then be allocated to the organic farming scheme to guarantee its continuity. The confidence of farmers and the industry in the sector would be raised enormously by a clear Government commitment to targets and a strategy to achieve them.

Such a strategy would also reduce imports. As a result, our farmers, wildlife, environment and economy would begin to benefit from the increased demand for organic production. The Government have found targets useful for procuring progress on many other subjects, such as poverty reduction. Why should organic food and farming be any different? Increasing organic farming through a target will not distort and restrict Government priorities. Instead, it will help to deliver current Government objectives on other matters, such as the environment, health, jobs and animal welfare.

The benefits of organic farming are now being well documented, but I would like to emphasise a few of them. There are major biodiversity benefits. Wildlife figures are plummeting, especially in farmyards, which is a major Government concern. Research carried out by the British Trust for Ornithology found that populations of most farmland bird species were higher on organic than conventional farms. That is one of the main reasons why the well-respected Royal Society for the Protection of Birds supports the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill.

There are human health benefits too. Organic food is less prone to synthetic chemical residues. For example, a quarter of conventionally grown new and salad potatoes tested for pesticide residues in 1998 were found to contain them, but none of the organic potatoes tested did. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food still advises the peeling of fruit and vegetables because of concern about pesticides. The continued use of lindane in this country is a specific worry, due to its link to breast cancer. Male fertility levels have fallen by about half since the second world war, and a new Dutch study suggests links to pesticide exposure. The steady rise of food poisoning costs between £1 billion and £3 billion a year, and is thought by many to be caused by some of the methods used in intensive food production. No agriculture debate can take place without reference to the BSE crisis, which cost £4 billion and the loss of 37,000 jobs, while the organic sector was BSE-free.

Organic farming also has benefits for the economy. It is estimated that between 10 per cent. and 30 per cent. more jobs can be created in organic systems. Importantly for the Government, organic farming, through delivering those benefits, eliminates some of the enormous hidden costs of conventional production, which have been estimated by Professor Jules Pretty of Essex university to be about £2.3 billion a year. Water companies estimate that it costs around £120 million a year to remove pesticides from drinking water. I urge my right hon. Friend to attempt some audit to find out how much a widespread take up of organic farming would reduce costs to the Treasury and other Departments and organisations, such as the national health service.

I tabled early-day motion 51 in support of the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill, which will target 30 per cent. of land to be organic by 2010. That early-day motion has been signed by 221 right hon. and hon. Members. In addition to that support, 71 groups representing more than 3 million people within their membership, also support the Bill. All sectors of society are represented in those groups, as are many private-sector organisations, including four of the largest supermarkets—Asda, Sainsbury, Waitrose and Marks and Spencer. The British public clearly want to green not only the fringes, but all of agriculture, and I believe that it is time for the Government to catch up with them.

The time is right for a total re-evaluation of Government agriculture policy. It would cost £90 million a year to ensure that the targets in the Bill were met in England. Although that represents only 3 per cent. of the £3 billion being spent under the common agricultural policy, it would be a highly constructive investment for the agriculture industry. In only a few years, there has been a colossal change in public attitudes to food standards, animal welfare and the environment. Food processors and retailers have been quick to respond.

As someone who buys as much organic produce as I can find in my local Sainsbury and Tesco—sadly, there is no local Waitrose—I am conscious that the supermarkets are monitoring my purchasing patterns. I am the target of mailshots that give me increasing amounts of information about the organic products that are available so, for a change, I am delighted to receive junk mail.

There is clearly a risk that expansion in market competition could undermine the benefits that I have extolled today. That is why the Government need to take a lead. Conservation standards and accreditation will undoubtedly become real issues in the continuing expansion, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will have something to say on those matters. Choosing organic food used to be the preserve of a tiny minority of the better-off, but today it enjoys widespread popular support. Research commissioned by Iceland, the food retailer, shows that 53 per cent. of people questioned said that they would like to be able to do a complete organic shop. Iceland mainly serves the less well-off in the community, but it has led the way in organics.

In conclusion, Madam Deputy Speaker, there will be enormous beneficial possibilities for this country if the Government give us a greater lead by embracing the targets in the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill. I urge them to accept those targets, or some of their own devising, to ensure that we seize on the great opportunity that will deliver real health, environmental and economic benefits. Such a course of action has widespread support.

Mrs. Marion Roe (in the Chair): Before we continue, I remind hon. Members that I should be addressed as Mrs. Roe when I am in the Chair.

Joan Ruddock: On that point, I have previously been told precisely the opposite. That is why I did not follow the previous speaker.

Mrs. Marion Roe (in the Chair): Perhaps I should clarify the position. Deputy Chairmen have been appointed to take the Chair in this Chamber, but I have been nominated from the Chairmen's Panel. That is why hon. Members should address me as Mrs. Roe.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): Thank you, Mrs. Roe, for giving me the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I would like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) on securing the debate.

My hon. Friend mentioned that the Agriculture Committee is taking evidence, in connection with which it visited a successful and long-established organic farm in my constituency. I want to raise some points mentioned to me by local organic farmers and farmers who are trying to become organic, so that my right hon. Friend the Minister can respond. I acknowledge the huge increase in support that the Government have given to organic farming. I welcome that, but I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford that more help now could make a huge difference in the future.

The first and most crucial point is that money to help to convert to organic farming has stopped for this year. There is no more available until next April, which is frustrating for farmers who want to get on with the conversion programme. A farmer in my constituency has 80 per cent. of his land already covered by the conversion scheme and wants to get further involved by going 100 per cent. organic. He cannot do that because that extra 20 per cent. of the land cannot be covered by any other grant. It is a shame that someone who is enthusiastic cannot get extra support this year. When consumers are crying out for more organic food, and when farming is in such huge difficulties and has a real need to diversify, that situation seems crazy.

There is a growing demand for organic products across the board; the way in which the markets are increasing month after month, with no prospect of the demand falling back, is a salesperson's dream. More support now would make a big difference, especially in light of concerns raised over genetically modified crops and the other directions that farming might take. More support for organic farming would be widely welcomed by communities.

In organic farming, we have a golden opportunity that should not be missed. I say that for three reasons. First, Iceland has bought up supplies of organic food; that retailer would have liked to buy more from this country, but that has not been possible, so it has had to go abroad. Every month the number of GM crop imports increases, exceeding the growth of United Kingdom production in organic food. Therefore, every month the trade deficit widens. I would have thought that the Chancellor might want to consider that; perhaps he should discuss the matter with my right hon. Friend the Minister.

Secondly, the Government should invest more in organic crops because farming makes a huge contribution to biodiversity and would help to achieve the Government's sustainable development targets. As those involve the percentage of land farmed organically and change in the number of farmland birds, having more organic land would help us to achieve them. The Soil Association recently produced a report containing not anecdotal, but real evidence that organic farming contributes to biodiversity. The report brings together the findings of nine studies on biodiversity and organic farming. Lowlands were the main focus, but the study's conclusions can be broadened to other areas. Organic farming was compared to conventional farming systems.

The studies found greater levels of abundance and diversity of species on organic farms. There were five times as many wild plants in arable fields and 57 per cent. more species. Several rare and declining wild arable species were found only on organic farms. As to bird species, 25 per cent. more were found at field edge; 44 per cent. more in field in autumn and winter; and there were 2.2 times as many breeding skylarks.

Greater biodiversity was found in vertebrates; there were 1.6 times as many arthropods, which are important as bird food; three times as many non-pest butterflies in crop areas; one to five times as many spiders and one to two times as many spider species. On crop pests, there were significant decreases in aphid numbers and no change in the number of pest butterflies. Those significant findings provide concrete evidence that organic farming makes a positive contribution to biodiversity.

Farmland represents 76 per cent. of the UK's total area, so organic farming can clearly make a major contribution towards the conservation of our biodiversity. Organic farming is not limited to species that we can see in the fields. It also offers huge biodiversity benefits for soil and aquatic ecosystems, while reversing the dangerous trend of falling agriculture and genetic diversity. For all those reasons, we should support a major increase in organic farming.

Another reason for seizing a golden opportunity and finding more money from every budget in MAFF relates to jobs. The Government rightly made the creation of jobs a priority and succeeded in doing so through the new deal. Conversion to organic agriculture could create even more jobs. Sustain, the alliance for better food and farming, estimates that 17,000 more full-time jobs—in rural areas, significantly—could be created. Job creation schemes can be less successful in rural areas, so rural employment is important.

It is widely acknowledged that organic farming creates more jobs—by somewhere between 10 and 30 per cent. Sustain adopted a middle course and estimated that 20 per cent. more agricultural jobs could be created. Increasing the current 3 per cent. of land farmed through organic methods to the 30 per cent. target in the Bill that we all support would create an additional 17,000 jobs—and perhaps even more down the line, through local markets and so forth. That should not be ignored; it could make a real difference.

Finally, I should like to raise a couple of specific issues mentioned by farmers in my constituency. The first is from a farmer who wanted to convert: he received his grant payment, but decided for several reasons not to proceed. One reason was that he did not own his land: he was a tenant and, although the grant came to him as a person, the land was separate from him. If the land were not farmed for the requisite number of years, he, as an individual, would have to pay back the money to the Treasury.

That is unfair because part of the problem is outside his control. If something went terribly wrong, and he had to move off the land, he would be in danger of having to pay back the grant if the next tenant did not want to farm the land organically. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that there might be some flexibility in future to accommodate circumstances in which a farmer unexpectedly cannot continue to farm the land and someone else takes it over?

The farmer's second problem was that the banks put a lot of pressure on him, querying whether the market would exist for organic food. Banks are known to be prudent but that is taking prudence to extremes. They argued that because Iceland is buying up the market, prices would drop. Iceland has said that it does not want to drop the support that it gives to farmers and that it does not intend to drop its prices. The banks, however, were using the mere fact that it has woken up to this and has quite rightly bought up some of the organic supply to argue that they do not know what will happen in future. That is regrettable. There is obviously some concern out there.

The other concern, which has been raised by a dairy farmer who is converting in my constituency, relates to the different time limits. It takes a minimum of two years and three months to convert from milk to organic in the UK. In some other European countries it is possible to convert in three to 18 months. Denmark and the Netherlands were mentioned as areas where conversion takes place more quickly. Surely there should be a level playing field. Is it perhaps a question of different accrediting bodies in different countries? Will we get to the point where farmers in Britain go to Denmark or the Netherlands to ask for accreditation? We could end up with two different definitions of organic in this country. Consumers want to know that a product is genuinely organic and properly registered. They would rightly expect organic food from France and organic food from the Netherlands to be the same as that from this country. Any comments that my right hon. Friend the Minister can make on that would be much appreciated.

I am pleased that we are having this debate. It is very timely as the Select Committee on Agriculture is in South Swindon today. I congratulate the Government on everything that they have done on organic farming. There is a golden opportunity: please can we find some more money to convert more farms to get closer and closer to that target of 30 per cent. of land farmed organically in this country?

11.32 am

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am a member of the Agriculture Committee, which is taking evidence at the moment, so, had I not been given leave of absence, I should trying to be in two places at once. I should preface my remarks by saying that I do not intend to go into our investigations, other than in general terms. The Committee is fortunate to have the evidence of the House of Lords inquiry, which looked into organic farming and the European Union a couple of years ago, and I shall dwell on some of the ideas contained therein. A lot of evidence has already been provided by my hon. Friends the Members for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) and for South Swindon (Ms Drown) and I shall not go over that again. Instead, I shall raise some points that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State might want to consider before she and her ministerial colleagues give evidence to the Select Committee.

I support the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). It is important that we stand up and argue the case for organic food production. That case is clearly gaining momentum, as shown by Iceland's decision and that of millions of individual consumers. They have decided to go organic in part because of the problems with genetically modified organisms—the scandal I could say—and, more particularly, because of the BSE difficulties. There is also a positive aspect, which is that people genuinely want to know what they are eating, where it comes from, and what the possible impact on their own health and general disposition will be. That is a jolly good thing.

One of the arguments against the Bill is that its supporters are setting unrealistic targets that interfere with the natural market mechanism, which is not the right way to go about the problems: if the movement is driven by the consumer and the retailer responds, why are targets needed? That argument is wrong in two respects: first, there are stop-start problems, so there should be some smoothing of the conversion pattern, and to set a target for annual improvements enables the allocation of appropriate sums for the purpose. Secondly, we should take a more humane and sensible approach to agriculture per se than is possible in the madness of the common agricultural policy. We want to discuss the matter with other European Union member states and within the World Trade Organisation, so that we can learn the extent to which organic farming can progress, and how it can be measured and encouraged.

Much of the evidence accrued on organic farming is anecdotal. An objective study of its environmental, economic and consumer benefits is needed; a study should also be made of the controversial subject of health benefits. I am in favour of organic farming, but I am not necessarily against conventional farming. There should be no trade-off. The notion that organic farming is good and conventional farming is bad is not the way forward. Objective research can benefit everyone. Besides helping those who wish to go into organic farming, research will also drive up standards in conventional farming, which will be no bad thing. There is much evidence for the benefits of integrated crop management schemes and reduced use of pesticides and fertilisers.

I am confused by the regulation and certification processes. Evidence to the House of Lords inquiry showed that the United Kingdom register of organic food standards—UKROFS, as it is lovingly called—is under pressure. There is a dispute about the role of the state in setting good standards for organic food, and it is argued that UKROFS should become the regulator in such matters. Self-regulation may be all very well, but the role of advocate must be separated from that of regulator if organic farming is not to fall into the same traps as those to which conventional farming has fallen victim. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will comment on the role of the regulator.

Finally, I want to give the diversity of the organic movement a quick plug. I have in my constituency a biodynamic farm, Koliska: biodynamic farming is a pure form of organic farming. People use the term "organic farming" to suggest that it entails a massive changeover to a Soviet-style approach, but it is not like that at all. Organic farming is a philosophy and those who believe in it know that there are different types of organic farming, of which biodynamic farming is one.

The debate is timely both because the issue is being investigated by the Select Committee on Agriculture and because of a consumer-led upsurge of interest. We are right, as parliamentarians, to tease out some of the issues. If we are not careful but simply allow events to unfold and arrangements to fall into place, adverse consequences may follow. I support the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for North Cornwall and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford on securing today's debate.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): I welcome the opportunity to make three brief points on matters that are almost side issues, but which I believe are pertinent to the thrust of the debate.

First, organic farming requires a somewhat higher level of skill than is needed for conventional farming. Therefore, it is essential that we put enough resources into training courses, particularly in places such as Duchy college in my constituency, which now offers people involved in farming more opportunities to acquire the additional skills needed to manage organic farming properly. I hope that we will not forget that it is necessary not only to encourage new entrants to organic farming, but to give those farmers that want to change their methods the opportunity to hone their farming skills.

Secondly, many people are switching to organic farming because they can obtain premium prices for produce, so the Government should recognise that the premium should not be eroded. We must ensure that new entrants' margins meet the expectations on which they base their business plans, and that can, in part, be achieved by not allowing supermarkets to attain a dominant position. At present, supermarkets are scrabbling around to find organic produce and they are prepared to pay higher prices than they would normally expect to pay. However, as supply increases to meet demand, the supermarkets will slowly and inexorably reach a dominant position. I hope that the Competition Commission report due out shortly will deal with fair trading contracts, which ensure a fair contractual arrangement between primary produce growers and retailers. We cannot allow the supermarkets to reach a dominant position from which they can squeeze farmers and growers, as they have done in other sectors dependent on supermarket trading.

Thirdly, the danger grows that unscrupulous traders will jump on the wonderful bandwagon and threaten the integrity of the organic farming movement by passing off non-organically grown produce as organic to obtain a much higher price for it. We must ensure that the powers of trading standards organisations are strengthened so that only truly organic produce can be presented as organic. If the public become less supportive because they feel that they are being conned, the process of regulation will be undermined. Trading standards organisations need the powers and the resources to assure consumers that when they choose organic produce, they get organic produce.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I am delighted to contribute to the debate, but I apologise to you, Mrs. Roe, to the Minister and especially to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) for being a few minutes late, as I was involved in a Select Committee.

If I am the adoptive parent of the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill, the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford undoubtedly is its godmother. I pay tribute to her for all her work and for succeeding in securing the debate. I have not the slightest doubt that if that Bill does not reach the statute book, she, other hon. Members and I will redouble our efforts to ensure that we make real progress.

I am delighted that the Bill has attracted cross-party support. As the Minister will know, it is supported by not only a number of former Ministers, such as the right hon. Members for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but a cross-section of all parties and people of wide experience in agriculture and related sectors. I am interested in the subject for a number of reasons, not least because my constituency is agricultural and is suffering a great deal as a result of the decline in mainstream agriculture. Organic food and farming represent an extremely important opportunity for diversification by a hard-hit part of the rural economy.

I pay tribute to other hon. Members, some of whom have spoken this morning, who do not have a huge number of farmers in their constituencies. However, the Bill has attractions for us all. I have the pleasure of being a neighbour of my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), who is our party spokesman on food and farming. In the previous Parliament, I was responsible for that policy. Therefore, I approach it with some experience.

I take as my text—having been properly brought up in a churchy family—the important statement made by the Prime Minister to the annual general meeting of the National Farmers Union on 1 February. He said:

> Our plans envisage a trebling of the area under organic farming by 2006.

I have discussed with Ministers whether that is a target, pledge, promise or merely an aspiration. I do not want to play semantic games. I take that statement as an encouraging sign. I think that all hon. Members will acknowledge that organic food and farming is an idea whose time has come. We may differ on the mechanisms by which our objective is achieved. However, we are all concerned to ensure that our fellow citizens, who are crying out for more choice of organic food, get that choice, with the assurance of quality, integrity and, if possible, that the food comes from British sources. I emphasise that point.

At present, British farmers supply less than a third of the organic food that appears on our retailers' shelves. I participated in an extremely interesting conference on 14 June, organised by Marketing Week. As far as I was aware, there were only one or two farmers in the audience of 100, but the representatives of the retail sector were there, clamouring for more choice, sourcing and supply from British producers. That is the challenge that faces the Government and, indeed, Parliament.

For reasons that have been well advanced by hon. Members, it is incredibly important that we enable British producers to meet the demands of the market. It is important to get a sense of the relative investment that has already been made. The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), to whom I pay tribute for being a dogged defender of the organic sector of British agriculture and an effective champion on its behalf, referred to research. Organic farming is set to receive 1.8 per cent. of the total research budget allocated to agriculture in the current financial year, while biotechnology and genetic modification will receive £26 million. Organic food has a huge potential market. As we all know, genetically modified food has a very small market and it is probably declining. I would like to know how we should address that discrepancy.

Retailers are making it only too clear that the discrepancy in demand is huge. Unless we can speedily bridge the balance of trade gap, to which the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) referred, we shall have a difficult problem. The evidence of retailers speaking at the conference that I mentioned is that they will simply have to source elsewhere.

I take to heart the comments made by a number of hon. Members about quality control. Perhaps the Soil Association can be reasonably confident of comparable standards in other EU states, but I am afraid that we cannot be entirely confident about the current monitoring of food imported from other parts of the world. I imply no criticism—that is a fact of life. However, it is clear that we cannot rigorously monitor production methods and the supply chain in distant countries.

It is therefore extremely important that we investigate quality control on imports. Conservative Members have raised this issue in this Parliament, and I support them in that regard. I raised it in the previous Parliament, when the Conservative party was in government and could have made a start on the problem. There must be quality control, so that British farmers can be confident of—to repeat the expression used by the hon. Member for South Swindon— an even playing field.

I shall speak only briefly, because I want to give the Minister maximum time to respond to this debate. There has been no full statement on the Government's position in recent months, but I realise—and hope—that things might be changing. I endorse everything said by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford, who opened the debate, and other hon. Members, but I should add two specific points that relate to my own part of the country, the south-west.

First, as my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall said, the Duchy of Cornwall has taken a pioneering role, and I welcome the Duke of Cornwall's setting a practical example of what can be achieved. I hope that it will not be taken amiss if I describe the Duchy of Cornwall as a large operation—it is certainly a lot larger than most farms in my constituency. It is easy for such land-owning organisations to take a long view, but given the current state of the market and the profitability levels to which my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall referred, it is extremely difficult for smaller organisations to take a risk on conversion. In the light of the hiatus in support to which reference was made this morning, diversification by small farmers, who are the backbone of the rural economy in the south-west, presents them with a major problem.

We must put the figures in perspective. Last month, when I asked about the total amount paid under the common agricultural policy to farmers in the United Kingdom in 1999-2000, and what percentage of that money was paid to organic farmers, the Minister produced the following figures. Under the CAP, total forecast UK and EU expenditure on national grants and subsidies was £3,172 million, but the figure for the organic aid scheme was just £11.35 million. I would argue that that discrepancy is too great.

The second issue is of particular significance to the south-west, but it is also important elsewhere. In a number of areas, the relationship between methods of agricultural production and various forms of environmental protection is very close. That is true not only in the south-west but in East Anglia, where pesticide residues in the water supply present a major problem. They raise health concerns, but they are also expensive to deal with; indeed, they could even prove a major problem for water undertakings and water consumers in your constituency, Mrs. Roe.

Water charges in the south-west are already extremely high. I should hate to think that we had to pick up a bigger bill for environmental protection and reduction in pollution simply because we failed to invest positively in a better form of agricultural production. That is an important issue, to which reference was made earlier. The rural White Paper, which is due in a matter of weeks, must contain a balance sheet showing the investment in organic food and farming and the benefits of reduced expenditure in other Departments because of the value that organic food and farming can give the rural economy.

In summary, the Bill is a win, win measure. There will be no losers in agriculture, because farmers who continue to farm conventionally will not lose out if some of their neighbours move over to a different form of production. Indeed, there could be a useful spin-off for conventional husbandry at a time when many farmers are really up against it and are seeking opportunities to diversify. There would be huge advantages for them if they could obtain this support, especially after their first conversion. Maintaining and sustaining the organic conversion is so important. Other European Union countries have been a great deal more successful than we have in that area, which is why we are comparatively far down the league table.

Major environmental advantages will be gained by promoting biodiversity, as the hon. Member for South Swindon said, and by reducing pollution and its related costs. There will be huge health advantages for consumers. I have tabled many questions on that subject. I regret that, so far, the health advantages have not received the attention or the research investment that one would have hoped. Water companies will also enjoy great advantages, at a time when they face increasing problems relating to chemical residues.

Rural communities will benefit from the employment opportunities. I would not go to the stake over the figures produced by SUSTAIN, but there are clear advantages in a more labour-intensive form of agriculture. Anyone—such as Mrs. Roe and I—who avidly listens to "The Archers" will know that Tony and Pat Archer work themselves into the ground. Sometimes, I think that they slightly overdo it. If they went to a real, modern organic farm, they would find that it was not quite as bad as we are given to understand.

The biggest single change will be the huge advantage for food retailers and processors. Market demand has leapt in recent months, and I was told by one of the most revered forecasters and analysts in retailing, at the conference to which I referred, that that increase in demand is unprecedented. Nothing has ever hit the retail sector with such speed and on such a scale as the demand for organic produce.

Last but not least, the Government are in a win, win situation. Having set their hands to this plough, they will reap great benefits if they are prepared to go the whole way, and to set clear targets and strategies for the development and expansion of this sector. I have noted hundreds of targets in publications from various Departments. There are so many that I have not managed to count them. Even the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has more targets of various kinds hidden away. I have no doubt that when the rural White Paper emerges in a few weeks, it, too, will contain targets. Those who have sponsored my Bill simply ask that there should be a target for the expansion of organic food production in this country. We have set a realistic time scale of 2010, and we look forward with considerable appetite—and, we hope, cheerful digestion—to the approach that the Minister will take.

Finally, if we can do anything to assist the Minister, to strengthen her arm and to give her any support and encouragement that she needs in terms of another statement that the Government will make shortly on the comprehensive spending review, she has only to ask us.

11.59 am

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) on securing this important debate.

Frankly, the Government's record to date on organic farming is a sorry one. It is characterised by an underestimation of demand, incompetent planning and inadequate resourcing. The Minister of State will doubtless claim that the Government have greatly increased funding for organic farming under the organic aid schemes and the organic farming scheme. However, the Government are being less than honest with us because they compare the situation with that in May 1997, when British consumers' demand for organic produce exploded. Before May 1997, the organic market was tiny, but that did not stop the then Conservative Government setting up the organic aid scheme as far back as 1994.

The real question is whether the Government have capitalised on the opportunities of the organic boom that is taking place or thrown them away and held back the British organic farming sector at a crucial phase of its development. As has already been said, the organic farming scheme in England opened for applications in April 1999. The Government set a budget of £6.5 million for 1999-2000 and of £8.5 million for 2000-01. However, they massively underestimated demand from the farming community. That two-year funding ran out in six months because the scheme was over-subscribed. In October, the Government pulled the plug and said that no more money would be available until April 2001. Incredibly, they slammed the door on the growth of Britain's organic farming sector just when demand for organic produce was booming.

In an excellent briefing paper sent to hon. Members, the Soil Association stated:

> To us it seems unacceptable that while UK agriculture is undergoing such a serious crisis and organic farming is one of the few sectors with an undersupplied and growing market, that its development in the UK is now on hold and foreign producers are taking advantage

Late last October, the Government were shamed into providing £10 million in additional funds for the organic farming scheme, but that was sufficient only to clear the backlog in applications. They have since confirmed that they will not consider further applications until April 2001. By shutting off the flow for the new conversion payments for 18 months, they have ensured that foreign producers will tighten their grip on our organic market.

The Government say that they will reopen the organic farming scheme in April 2001, when they will start providing £18 million or thereabouts each year for the sector through the England rural development plan. During that plan's seven-year period of operation, the Government are committed to making £140 million available through the organic farming scheme. The Soil Association says that that is not enough. On 15 June 2000, Simon Brenman stated in Farming News:

> At least £25 million a year is needed to meet the demand.

It is interesting to note that £25 million was needed to satisfy demand from farmers during the six months in which the organic farming scheme operated before it was shut down.

Spending under the England rural development plan will amount to £140 million over the next seven years. The Soil Association calculates that that will take the level of organic farming to about only 8.5 per cent. in England by 2010. In view of the fact that domestic supply currently constitutes only one third of the market, which is expected nearly to triple by 2003, there should be enough funding to increase current supply, in the Soil Association's estimate, by 10 times by then if the Government's aim is to be met. Extrapolating forward, the Government should plan for 30 per cent. to be converted by 2010. In the Soil Association's calculations, the English scheme would need annual funding of £87 million a year. The Soil Association estimates that the Government's suggested figures are wildly out.

Mr. Drew: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Opposition are committed to the 30 per cent. target and will fund it accordingly?

Mr. Moss: I do not have much time, if the Minister is to respond.

The signs are that the Government are no less complacent now than they were at the outset of the organic farming scheme. Commenting on the first six months, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food told the Farmers Guardian:

> There was an enormous rush. But I suspect we have reached a peak in those two years. We think the new money is enough to manage a careful expansion of the sector. We must have a steady increase, because if it is too sudden it could damage the market.

Such comments are patent nonsense. For a start, the peak was not reached in two years, but in six months. In the remaining 18 months, until the OFS is reopened, it is likely that demand for conversion payments will accumulate, not dissipate. Furthermore, as demand for organic produce is increasing at 40 per cent. a year, while British supply increases at only 25 per cent., failure to step up the rate of organic farming will weaken further the share of the domestic market held by British farmers. As a final twist, the Government have confirmed that farmers who start conversion outside the OFS—that is, those who convert during the 18 months for which the scheme is closed—will not be eligible for OFS payments, once the scheme reopens.

The Government's support for organic farming is more than a matter of finance, although the Government fail in that respect, too. Little has been done to control imports of food that calls itself organic, but which falls well below the organic standards legally required of British producers. Most importantly, the Government's incompetent policies on genetically modified crop trials have placed the future of the British organic sector in some doubt. Organic farming is threatened by the Government's insistence on pressing ahead with the commercial planting of genetically modified crops, before research into their environmental impact has been completed. A survey by the National Pollen Research Institute puts the risk of cross-pollination as high as one in 93. Organic farmers have the right to farm without such a threat from neighbouring farms. Indeed, the Government do not seem to care about genetic pollution of GM crops. On 18 January 2000, Baroness Hayman told the Select Committee on Agriculture:

> The organic movement has to recognise and find a way of living with...contamination from conventional crops.

The organic market is one of the fastest growing sectors of British agriculture, as it attempts to meet consumers' demands for new food sources. Organic farmers should benefit from common agricultural policy reforms that encourage less intensive and more environmentally sustainable methods. All European Union member states support farmers who convert to organic methods, and we feel that the Government should match the help afforded by their continental counterparts. The next Conservative Government will fund increased payments by redirecting the rural development regulation and seeking our share of the redistribution of the tobacco subsidies paid under the CAP. The research and development budget for agriculture has been skewed by the Government's over-hasty endorsement of genetic modification. We would redirect the £120 million research and development budget and increase the £2.1 million allocated to organic farming. The Government's mismanagement has obliged farmers to spend money to start the conversion process, only to learn that funding has run out. The next Conservative Government will reform the system to guarantee support to suitably qualified farmers, before they embark on conversion.

As I said, the Government's record on organic farming is sorry indeed. The Soil Association believes that the Government fail on three counts, and we concur with some of its findings. First, there has been no forward planning. Secondly, specific problems have not been addressed—for example, the poor conversion rate in the horticultural sector and the fast-growing imbalance between conversion of the livestock and arable sectors. Thirdly, there are no targets. It is no coincidence that the countries with the highest levels of organic farming in Europe have all adopted targets and a strategy to meet them. Based on an analysis of targets in other countries and the development of the market here, the Soil Association believes that a target of 30 per cent. by 2010 is desirable and practicable. The Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill proposes such a target.

Wherever one turns and whoever one listens to, this is a major opportunity for British agriculture, but the Government are failing agriculture by failing to support the embryonic and fast-developing organic sector.

12.10 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Ms Joyce Quin): We have had an interesting and worthwhile debate with a number of thoughtful speeches. I welcome the opportunity to discuss an issue that is important to the future of agriculture and food production.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) for introducing the debate. The House recognises that she has considerable knowledge of the sector and that she has taken an interest in it for many years. I am glad that she and most other speakers acknowledge the greatly increased commitment to the organic sector that has been shown by the Government. Like other hon. Members, I welcome the fact that the Select Committee on Agriculture is investigating the issues. We were fortunate to have in attendance the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who is a member of the Select Committee; the Government look forward to the outcome of its investigations.

My hon. Friend said that I might be giving evidence to the Committee, but that is unlikely. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, who has shown great commitment to the organic sector, is responsible for the matter in the Department, but he is away at an international conference at the moment. However, I am an enthusiastic supporter of the organic sector and more than happy to be responding to this debate.

The exception to the interesting contributions was that of the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), who speaks for the Conservative party. He could at least have recognised that we are spending more than 10 times the amount that the previous Government spent on the organic sector. It is bizarre to witness, as we so often do, Conservative Front Benchers talking about unspecified but huge increases in spending on whatever subject is under consideration when their party has an apparent tax guarantee policy based on decreasing public expenditure. The figures quoted by the hon. Gentleman this morning do not add up.

One of the obstacles to the Government's providing money for rural development generally has been that we were held back under European rules by the historically low level of funding that our country has spent on that matter and which we inherited from the previous Government. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was able to increase the amount of European support for rural development measures, including organic production, by around 30 per cent. Those historically low levels have caused us real problems when trying to reach agreement at European level on the way forward for the rural development regulation.

I hope to respond to several of the issues raised in the debate, especially the detailed points made by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) in connection with his Bill. However, I do not have any dramatic or particularly good news to give him other than that which he has already received.

Organic production has made great strides, especially in the past two years. It has certainly caught the interest of a much wider consumer base and is well placed to consolidate and expand. This is an exciting period in the history and development of the organic movement, which holds great promise for its future development and expansion. We all know that consumers take a considerable and increasing interest in being better informed about the food that they buy. They take a much greater interest in what they eat and in the quality of food, and their considerable purchasing power can obviously effect changes in types of food consumption. The degree of that consumer interest must be regarded as a healthy and welcome development.

Consumer pressure can lead to changes in the behaviour of retailers and processors, and in recent months we have witnessed such changes. That is particularly true in respect of the sale of organic food in multiples, through which about 70 per cent. of organic food is sold. We all witnessed a great expansion in the range and quantity of organic produce that they now offer. As well as increased interest from supermarkets and multiples, there has been welcome expansion in the number of specialist outlets, for example through box schemes and farmers markets, to which reference has been made this morning. I recently visited a farmers market in London and it was good to hear the dialogue between farmers and customers, much of which focused on issues such as the safety and quality of the food on offer.

Mr. Breed: Sometimes when people want to set up a farmers market, they are prevented from doing so by an ancient charter relating to a nearby city. Will the Minister not give consideration to such matters? Is it not time to sweep away such arrangements, so that farmers markets can be established where they are wanted?

Ms Quin: I certainly accept that, in some areas, there have been difficulties arising from antiquated arrangements. It is important that we look for ways to encourage farmers markets in areas where people want to establish them. In some cases, changes in legislation are needed, and they take time, but it is sometimes possible to exploit more flexible interpretation of planning guidance and planning rules. I agree that it is a matter to which we should give our attention.

One of the commitments made at the farming summit on 30 March was to work with planning authorities, especially on issues such as farm diversification. Farmers markets are an important part of the diversification of British agriculture, so we need to address and solve the problems that have frustrated the farmers market movement. None the less, we should rejoice in the fact that the number of farmers markets has increased so dramatically: from having almost no farmers markets a couple of years ago, we now have about 100 of them flourishing and doing well, and the movement continues to gather momentum.

Farmers are obviously seeking new ways in which to sustain their livelihoods. Those in the United Kingdom have become more environmentally aware and sensitive in recent years, in part because of financial incentives that encourage them in that direction. It is also part of a wider trend that reflects the growing desire in society as a whole for environmentally benign and environmentally friendly methods of production.

Ms Drown: Is my hon. Friend conscious of the distinction between other agri-environment schemes, which are funded continually and which, I am glad to say, farmers throughout the country have taken up, and organic farming, which does not receive any more funding once the farmer has converted? Will the Government consider that issue?

Ms Quin: Organic farmers are eligible for participation in other environmental schemes and some take advantage of such provision. We should not consider aid to organic farmers solely in terms of the organic farming scheme or its successor under the rural development regulation. Several agri-environment and other schemes under the rural development regulation are of interest and benefit to organic farmers.

I stress the worthwhile nature of agri-environment schemes. Yesterday, I visited the Royal show, where I was pleased to see some of the pilot work that is being done in arable stewardship, by which I mean arable farming that promotes bio-diversity, the habitats of farmland birds and a tremendously welcome array of wild flowers and plants. It was a pleasure to see fields of colourful poppies and other flowers that were once prevalent in the English countryside, but which have disappeared in the post-war years. It is important that organic farmers consider such schemes, as they can have a real impact on British agriculture and on the countryside generally.

The demand for aid under the organic farming scheme shows the considerable interest of farmers in organic farming. Organic farming is not necessarily an easy option: it demands commitment. It is not simply a matter of not doing things—for example, not applying synthetic pesticides, herbicides and fertilisers—but one of disciplined and positive management. Close attention must be given to the health of crops and livestock and to the early management of pests and diseases. Above all, it requires the adoption of an holistic approach to the farming enterprise based on an effective rotation that ensures soil health and fertility, and many farmers have grasped that approach with enthusiasm. None the less, organic farming certainly needs to be undertaken with a sense of responsibility and commitment.

The Government's general ambition is for British farming to be prosperous, forward-looking and sustainable. It must be competitive and sufficiently flexible to be able to respond quickly and effectively to market changes and consumer needs.

Mr. Moss: Before the Minister finishes, will she enlighten the Committee on the Government's forward-planning approach for organic farming?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. This is Westminster Hall, not a Committee of the House.

Ms Quin: Those are precisely the issues that I intend to address. The Government have a strategy for the organic sector that will have a positive part to play in agriculture in future. However, I accept some of the views expressed about there being a great deal more to do. The area now under organic cultivation in the United Kingdom is modest, as are sales of UK organic farms in our shops and supermarkets. I recognise the potential for replacing imports, to which many hon. Members have referred: we can supply considerable amounts of some organic produce through domestic production, but the amount of some other types of produce supplied by the UK industry is disappointingly small—I refer to fruit and vegetables, although some of them grow better in climates warmer than ours. However, I am convinced that a considerable increase in UK organic production is possible, and I hope that it will take place in the next few years.

We want organic farming to prosper and succeed. The schemes that have been in place since the Government took office have channelled a huge increase in money into the organic sector. Under the new scheme and the rural development regulation, the aid available from next year will be more than 20 times that which was available under the previous Government. That sum will increase in the next six years, which is the period of the regulation. The extra money that we have brought in has enabled us to tackle the backlog, which is important. We are aware that several farmers were frustrated by the fact that, especially under the previous Government, money was limited and that the incentive to go organic was therefore not as strong as they would have liked.

It is worth mentioning that some farmers are converting without aid. The sector is so attractive that there is a movement to go organic even among farmers who have not been successful at achieving aid so far. We are conscious of the fact that aid during the conversion period is especially important, as that is when various measures that result in a loss of income to the farm have to be taken. Despite the fact that farmers expect increased income once the conversion period is over, there is a difficult period to get through first. We have been especially eager to target aid on the conversion period, rather than on a system of on-going aid, as is the case in other European countries.

The Government have increased aid to research and development in organic farming; that support is now worth slightly more than £2 million a year, and organic farmers benefit from some of the other research programmes that my Ministry administers, for example, some of the £8 million aimed specifically at research into biological methods has a direct and beneficial spin-off for the organic sector. Public expenditure on organic research in the UK is significantly higher than in most European countries. We should welcome that, although I am not averse to hon. Members telling me that we could do more, as that is also true.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall referred at some length to his Bill in respect of targets. He will be aware of the reaction to the Bill of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary. He referred to the Prime Minister's words at the farming summit—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up. We now move to the next debate, which is a standard half-hour Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones).

Human Rights (Saudi Arabia)

12.30 pm

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Two weeks ago, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), spoke at the conference on investing in Saudi Arabia held at the Four Seasons hotel in London. He extended an especially warm welcome to Prince Abdullah bin Faisal bin Turki, president of the Saudi General Investment Authority, and expressed his delight at the presence of His Highness in the United Kingdom, which, he told the prince, > we like to think is your second home.

During his speech, my hon. Friend made much of the fact that Britain is the second largest investor in Saudi Arabia, with investments of $3.5 billion. He listed a string of well known British companies with investments there, and exhorted British business men to regard Saudi Arabia not only as a market for goods and services but as a joint venture and investment partner. He said:

> You will have the... Government's full backing.

including Export Credits Guarantee Department support, and added:

> There is ample capacity under the Department's Overseas Investment Insurance Scheme to help with projects in Saudi Arabia.

No doubt that would include the export of military equipment, given that almost half of total British arms exports go to Saudi Arabia.

Hospitality to the Saudi royal family continued this week, during the eight-day visit of Prince Salman bin Abdul Aziz, governor of the capital, Riyadh, who was welcomed by the Deputy Prime Minister and received by the Queen at Buckingham palace, as well as by the Lord Mayor of the Corporation of London at a luncheon given in the Prince's honour. I understand that Prince Salman also accompanied Prince Charles to a polo match, at which he presented the prizes, and had meetings with other Ministers, including my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Meanwhile, back in Saudi Arabia, a different sort of hospitality was being provided for my constituent, Mr. Mohammed Chaudhry, who continued to languish in a Saudi jail in Riyadh, the area under Prince Salman's jurisdiction, where Mr. Chaudhry has been detained without charge since 23 June last year. As has been well documented by Amnesty International and other organisations, Mr. Chaudhry is just one of many people who have been denied their basic human rights by the Saudi authorities. We must ask why the Government are prepared to subordinate the human rights of people such as Mr. Chaudhry to the interests of the arms trade and other economic considerations? The purpose of this debate is to highlight his plight, which has already been the subject of early-day motion 810, which was signed by 120 Members from all parties, and to give the Government an opportunity to explain to the House what action has been taken to secure justice for that British citizen.

I shall briefly outline the events that led up to my constituent's arrest. From 1988, Mr. Chaudhry was employed on an annually renewable contract as a manager in receipts and storage distribution at Riyadh military hospital. Every December, he was responsible for annual stocktaking in the supplies department. Midway during the 1998 stock take, Mr. Chaudhry was mysteriously suspended from duty by his immediate superior, Captain Meshal Al Meshal. No reason was given, but Mr. Chaudhry was asked to return to work after one week. On his return, he found that his job had been taken over, which amounted to constructive dismissal. He felt that he had no option but to hand in his resignation, which was accepted by Captain Meshal.

Mr. Chaudhry believed that Captain Meshal wanted to replace foreign nationals with Saudi staff. He was required to work three months' notice to receive the full benefits of his term of employment, and planned to return home with his wife and two children on 25 March 1999. However, when stocktaking was completed, without further involvement by Mr. Chaudhry, a deficit of 20 million riyal was found. The hospital chief executive, Colonel Musa, dismissed Captain Meshal and reinstated Mr. Chaudhry, who was asked to investigate the deficit. As a result of miscounting by inexperienced staff, which Mr. Chaudhry identified, the deficit was subsequently reduced to 8 million riyal—about £1.5 million. However, the stocktake was never completed as it was cancelled in writing by Colonel Musa.

At about the same time, in February 1999, Shahid Bukhari, a storeman from Pakistan who worked under Mr. Chaudhry, was caught in the act of stealing medical supplies from the warehouse. Everyone working in the supplies department came under suspicion, and Mr. Chaudhry was told that he would not be allowed to leave the country until investigations had been completed. As he was required to remain in Saudi, Mr. Chaudhry's contract, which was due to expire, was renewed until 6 August. He was asked to help with inquiries, which he did willingly. All members of staff, including Mohammed Chaudhry, were questioned by hospital security. During questioning, Shahid Bukhari claimed that one Egyptian and one Saudi national had also been involved in the theft of supplies. The men were arrested and the matter was passed on to the military police, under Colonel Abdullah Al Mughari—the head of security who is believed to be a friend of Captain Meshal— and then to Colonel Ali Johani from the Ministry of Defence.

Mrs. Chaudhry, who is in Westminster today, says that she was told in a telephone conversation with Simon Lovett, then British consul in Riyadh, that Captain Meshal was given a court martial, fined and imprisoned, and that Colonel Musa was arrested. That has since been found to be inaccurate. Colonel Musa remains chief executive at the hospital, but Captain Meshal was moved within the Ministry of Defence.

The investigating authorities never completed the stock take begun by Mohammed Chaudhry to establish the exact value of missing supplies. Instead, the matter was referred to the Saudi Ministry of the Interior, which took the decision to arrest Mr. Chaudhry, apparently at the request of the military hospital. He was detained on 23 June 1999, five months after the irregularities had first been identified. During the first few days of his imprisonment, Mr. Chaudhry was interviewed twice. He co-operated fully and was assured by Saudi officials that there was no evidence against him. He was led to believe that he would be released after answering all their questions. Sadly, that was not to be the case. He remains in prison even though no further interrogation has taken place.

The family fear that the involvement of Colonel Musa, who was arrested and then released, brought a political dimension to the case, and that Mr. Chaudhry is being detained as some kind of smokescreen. The conditions in which he was detained at Sulemaniya police station were appalling—a 12 ft sq basement cell with only one toilet, which had to be shared by 22 occupants. After six weeks he had become infested with bugs. Following the involvement of Simon Lovett, who visited Mr. Chaudhry on 4 and 10 July 1999—but who was not allowed to see him when he visited on 23 and 26 June, as it takes five working days for the British consul to obtain permission for each visit—he was transferred to Malaz prison, where conditions were better.

As can be imagined, Mr. Chaudhry's family, by then back in the United Kingdom and expecting him to follow them home, were distraught at news of his arrest. Mrs. Chaudhry has tried to maintain continuous contact with Simon Lovett at the British Embassy, and Liza Gibb, consular desk officer for Saudi Arabia in London, but her efforts at communication have not always been reciprocated. The family has been fortunate that Mr. Chaudhry's brother-in-law who has also been working in Saudi Arabia has been able to visit him and pass on messages. That relative also appointed a lawyer, but the British authorities have not been able to persuade the Saudis to let him see his client, other than on one unofficial occasion when he was not allowed even to discuss the case.

After Mrs. Chaudhry told me of her husband's plight, I, too, began protracted correspondence with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and received replies from the Ministers responsible for consular matters—first, from Baroness Symons who told me that it was not possible to interfere with the legal process of another country and, subsequently, from Baroness Scotland whom I thank for confirming much of the information given me by Mrs. Chaudhry.

On 29 December 1999, the control and investigation board in Saudi Arabia told the British embassy that Mr. Chaudhry could be released into the custody of his sponsor, the Riyadh military hospital. However, the hospital told the British consul that his contract had been terminated in August, so he was no longer under its sponsorship. The police said that Mr. Chaudhry could be released on bail if an unlimited financial guarantor could be found. None of Mr. Chaudhry's friends was in a position to provide such a guarantee. The embassy wrote to the governor of Riyadh, none other than Prince Salman, asking if one of Mr. Chaudhry's friends could give an appearance guarantee instead.

Eventually, on 22 February, the director of the governor's office, Dr. Nasser Daoud, said that Mr. Chaudhry could be released on bail only on the same conditions as the other defendants in the case, who had somehow managed to secure an unlimited financial guarantor. Meanwhile, I had written to the Saudi ambassador to ask him to meet Mrs. Chaudhry and me. He replied in January 2000, around the time when Mr. Chaudhry was returned to the Sulemaniya police station as discussions about bail were taking place—which, to the dismay of the family, came to naught. The ambassador suggested that the matter was best dealt with by the British embassy in Riyadh.

On 18 May this year, as the anniversary of Mr. Chaudhry's detention without charge approached, I wrote again to the Saudi ambassador informing him that, although British consular staff had continued to raise my constituent's case, no progress seemed to have been made either in bringing forward his release or in the Saudi authorities bringing forward any case against him, despite having had 16 months to carry out investigations. I informed the ambassador that preparations were in hand to draw my constituent's plight to the attention of the British Parliament.

I received the ambassador's reply on Monday, in which he noted that the Egyptian and the Saudi who had been arrested had been released on bail after investigations. While the ambassador did not specifically mention it, Mrs. Chaudhry also believes that Shahid Bukhari is free. The ambassador told me that nobody offered bail for Mr. Chaudhry. He said that the British embassy knew about the case and had said that it was not its policy to provide bail. Hence, Mr. Chaudhry remains in custody. The ambassador ended his reply by stating that, because of the unusual situation, Mr. Chaudhry's case is now being expedited.

It would appear that a person caught in the act of stealing and his named accomplices are free, as are Mr. Chaudhry's superiors—the senior military officials who prevented Mr. Chaudhry from properly carrying out the work that he had always completed satisfactorily. At least, however, there is some hope that his case will be expedited. That means that the Saudis are now prepared to release Mr. Chaudhry on an appearance guarantee only, on condition that he remains in Saudi Arabia and is available for questioning while inquiries continue—as if he could go anywhere while his passports and documents are retained.

Understandably, Mr. Chaudhry and his family want to reject that offer. The Saudis have had 18 months to question him and have failed to do so. Furthermore, there is no sign of an investigation taking place. Mrs. Chaudhry is extremely worried that her husband could be kept in Saudi Arabia indefinitely. She wants the whole business brought to a conclusion. She fears for her husband's health if he is left in jail, where he can exercise only once a week. If he is let out, she worries about his safety and wonders how he will survive with no employment. Mr. Chaudhry eventually agreed to bail, but it is still not clear whether he is to be released.

Let us hope that the Saudi ambassador was right when he said that the case was to be expedited. If relations with the Saudis are as cordial as they appear on the basis of the reception given here to members of the ruling family, how can a British citizen be treated as badly as Mr. Chaudhry? Why has it taken 12 months to get bail on reasonable conditions?

Will the Minister explain why the British embassy was not prepared to offer an appearance guarantee for Mr. Chaudhry when another member of staff did so for another British detainee? Why has Mr. Chaudhry had no access to a lawyer? What information has been obtained about the likely length of the continuing inquiry? What guarantee can the Government, who are encouraging better relationships with the Saudi regime, give to British citizens that their basic human rights will be protected if they travel to that country? Mrs. Chaudhry, is present today, and I hope that the Minister will respond to those questions.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. John Battle): It is usual to congratulate an hon. Member on winning an Adjournment debate, as if the choice of topic were an achievement in itself. I certainly want to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) on her presentation this morning and on the manner in which she set out the facts of the case. I know that she has championed this case assiduously ever since she was informed about the arrest. I have a sheaf of letters in front of me, which were written by my hon. Friend on behalf of her constituent to various Government Departments from 5 July last year. She also tabled an early-day motion. She demonstrates exactly what Adjournment debates should be about—championing the cases of individual constituents, but also highlighting what Members of Parliament view as flaws in the structure of operations.

The case of Mr. Mohammed Chaudhry, who is in prison in Saudi Arabia, is a matter of great concern to me and, indeed, to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office generally. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has closely followed the case and our ambassador in Riyadh has actively pursued it. I have in front of me a chronology of developments—from Mr. Chaudhry's arrest on 23 June 1999 to the proconsul's visit at the police station on 4 July and beyond—and I am happy to make the information available to my hon. Friend. It shows that more than 40 direct representations have been made, as well as regular contact every other week. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that we have actively pursued the case.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has raised the case at the highest levels in the Saudi Government. On Monday this week, he raised Mr. Chaudhry's case directly and personally with the governor of Riyadh: he asked for the case to be expedited and for due legal process. It is wrong to convey the impression that the Government, the Foreign Office and the embassy have stood idly by. That is not true, as the evidence shows, and as I know my hon. Friend would acknowledge.

I do not accept that it is a case of human rights being made subservient to commercial interests in Saudi Arabia. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), said, in a speech to which my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak referred, greater openness will improve mutual understanding, develop common values and increase respect for international standards on human rights. That is why my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised the case personally with Prince Salman on Monday. I hope that the House will accept in good faith that we do not resile from raising such matters when they need to be raised. Our commitment to human rights cannot be reduced to commercial interests.

The case highlights concerns about human rights in Saudi Arabia. It also highlights the difference that can be made by trying to be proactive, firm and sensitive to achieve results. I must emphasise to my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak that no single international law applies throughout the world. Different countries have different laws. French law is different from UK law, as is Sharia law. I underline that point, because we cannot assume that our law can override everyone else's. I know that that point has been taken.

I will summarise the case that my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak has outlined. Mr. Chaudhry was a manager at the military hospital in Riyadh, looking after medical supplies. On 23 June last year, he was arrested, along with three colleagues, following the apparent loss of £3 million-worth of supplies.

Our consul tried to visit Mr. Chaudhry that day, but was not allowed to do so, as the investigating officer was not there. He was unable to see Mr. Chaudhry until after the Saudi weekend, three days later.

The case was investigated twice—once by the police and once by the control and investigation board of the public prosecutor's office. In November, its report was sent to the public prosecutor. In December, it was recommended that all the detained men be freed on bail, pending the final outcome of the investigation. That recommendation did not benefit Mr. Chaudhry. He could not put up the unlimited financial guarantee that the Saudis required, and his former employer, the military hospital, would not sponsor him.

Our embassy lobbied the Saudi authorities at the highest levels to get them to drop the requirement for a financial guarantee. Our ambassador raised the case with Prince Sultan, the Defence Minister ultimately responsible for the hospital in which Mr. Chaudhry worked. The lobbying worked, because the Saudis said that Mr. Chaudhry could be released with only an appearance guarantee. That remains the condition, so the terms changed a little.

Mr. Chaudhry initially rejected that offer. He said that he wanted to be free and allowed to leave the country, or charged. I understand that he has now reconsidered and accepted the offer. We are pressing for his immediate release.

The case raises difficult questions. First, why was Mr. Chaudhry held for almost a year without charge? I emphasise that the Saudi system is radically different from ours: a suspect can be held without charge. We cannot demand that the Saudis change their system. However, we can lobby for our nationals to be given bail, when the length of time in jail becomes unacceptable, as it clearly has in Mr. Chaudhry's case. Therefore, we lobbied hard and our tactics achieved some benefit.

Secondly, why was Mr. Chaudhry not allowed to see his lawyer? We believe that all people charged with criminal offences should have the right to a lawyer to defend them. That is accepted in our law. Speaking to a lawyer is an integral part of our justice system, but that right does not exist in the Saudi justice system of Sharia law. We cannot assume that the Saudis will immediately adopt our practices. We would like that right to be extended internationally to all. In this case, we did what we could to mitigate the problem, meeting frequently but separately with Mr. Chaudhry and his lawyer.

Thirdly, why is the case still going on, given that Mr. Chaudhry has not been reinterviewed since his arrest? Again, we have lobbied the Saudi authorities at the highest levels. We have been told that this is a complex fraud investigation and the truth will take time to uncover. We know from our experience in the UK that fraud cases are complex and lengthy. The key point is that Mr. Chaudhry does not now have to stay in prison until the investigation is completed. I think that we can hold that line.

I know that hon. Members wish—as the Government do—that we could do more for Mr. Chaudhry, but there are limits to what we can do. We cannot physically get him out of Saudi Arabia. Mr. Chaudhry is accused of committing a crime in that country. He is therefore subject to Saudi law and justice. We cannot decide whether he is guilty or innocent. That is a matter for the Saudi courts.

Dr. Lynne Jones: May I pick my hon. Friend up on one point? He said that Mr. Chaudhry is considered to have committed a crime, but has not been charged. Surely that is the crucial point.

Mr. Battle: Yes, but there is a difference between the law in the UK and that of Saudi Arabia. In our understanding of law, Mr. Chaudhry has not been charged, but under Sharia law the fact that he has been picked up and accused of a crime is considered part of the process. That is the difference between Sharia law and our law. We cannot simply override the process. We all agree that the situation is unsatisfactory, but what can we do about this man? We cannot give him legal advice. Our consular staff are not lawyers and it is obviously a job for lawyers. Even the legal advice structure is different under Sharia law because there is no habeas corpus in Saudi Arabia. That is the crucial difference. We have built that into our law, but it does not exist there.

We must live with the reality of the situation and press as hard as we can. It does not mean that we can do or have done nothing. Our staff have visited him 38 times and on four other occasions they reached the prison but were not allowed to see him. They have taken him clothes, toiletries and letters from his family. They have supported visa applications for his mother, brother, wife and children to enable them to visit him and arranged for him see a doctor and get medicine. Our embassy in Riyadh has raised his case with the Saudi authorities on 46 separate occasions, often at the highest levels. They have raised the subject of bail. They have urged the Saudis to conclude their investigations. They have complained formally about the quality of some of his food.

Our approach throughout has been determined by the need to do the best we can for Mr. Chaudhry in the constraints of the circumstances. As in the whole of our consular and human rights policy in Saudi Arabia, the key is getting results. We believe that Mr. Chaudhry should soon be able to leave jail on bail as our result of our lobbying. We will continue to press the case and do our utmost for both Mr. Chaudhry and human rights.

Hon. Members may know that we have concerns about human rights in Saudi Arabia. We take, and will continue to take every realistic and responsible step to press for improvements. At bilateral meetings, before, during and after the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in 1999, British officials encouraged the Saudi authorities to co-operate more closely with such UN human rights bodies. At the same time we joined our European Union partners in a public statement of concern at the shortcomings in criminal procedures, freedom of expression, assembly and worship and women's rights. We urged Saudi Arabia to become a party to the remaining core international human rights instruments: the international convention on economic, social and cultural rights, the international convention on civil and political rights.

The UN Commission on Human Rights concluded that Saudi Arabia had responded sufficiently to complaints about human rights violations, including its judicial system, for consideration under the 1503 procedure to be discontinued. I can only emphasise that in welcoming the commission's decision to discontinue consideration of Saudi Arabia under the 1503 procedure, the Saudi Arabian Government announced their intention to accede to those international conventions and covenants. We will continue to press for early accession.

Throughout the whole of 1999 we maintained a policy of constructive engagement on human rights with the Saudi Government through frank and private exchanges, meetings and visits. In April 1999, at the invitation of the British Government, the Saudi Minister of Justice attended a British Council seminar in London on "Britain and Islam" which included debates on aspects of human rights, education, gender, race and religion. The Saudi Minister met the Lord Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to discuss human rights and Sharia law and relations between Muslim and non-Muslim communities in the UK and Saudi Arabia.

During a visit to Saudi Arabia in October 1999, my hon. Friend the Minister of State raised human rights with the Saudi Deputy Foreign Minister. They agreed on further bilateral exchanges. That was followed in December by a debate at the UK-Saudi Joint Cultural Committee in London, a forum specifically established to develop relations between Government and non-Government organisations. We intend to keep up the pressure and to continue to focus on human rights and the differences that Sharia and UK law throw up in particular cases such as this one.

On 22 May at the European Union Gulf Co-operation Council ministerial meeting, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary debated human rights with his Saudi opposite number. My right hon. Friend emphasised the importance of the universal declaration of human, economic and social rights and the UN mechanisms designed to protect individuals.

On 20 June, my hon. Friend the Minister of State spelt out the importance of human rights at the investment conference to which my hon. Friend referred. I hope that she accepts that we want Saudi Arabia to ratify the United Nations conventions and we welcome the efforts to bring its law into line with them; but Saudi Arabia is an Islamic country in which justice is based on Sharia law, which has a major bearing on rights in the kingdom. Of course, we must have a dialogue on human rights—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. I regret to tell the Minister that time is up and we must move to the next debate.

Parades Commission

1 pm

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): I welcome this opportunity to debate the second report of the Parades Commission. The Minister will recall that the commission was set up following troubles with various parades in Northern Ireland. Parades had previously been a public order matter, and the responsibility of the Chief Constable.

Those of us from Northern Ireland vigorously opposed the Bill setting up the so-called independent commission. The policing of parades is a public order and operational matter for the police; they should take the decisions because they are the people on the ground, who know the local situation.

We objected to the fact that the Parades Commission was a quango—an unelected body not answerable to the people of Northern Ireland. It consisted of people who, in many cases, did not know the facts and were unfamiliar with the situation on the ground.

The fundamental issue relating to the Parades Commission is the right to freedom of expression. That right has been described in many cases in the European Court, which states:

> As the Court has consistently held, freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, one of the basic conditions for its progress and for the development of everyone. Subject to paragraph 2 of Article 10, it is applicable not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive, or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that shock, offend or disturb the State or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broad mindedness without which there is no "democratic society".

Thus, provided that they act and march peaceably, the Orange Institution and the loyal orders have the right under British and European law to march the highway without let or hindrance.

When the commission was set up, we argued that instead of making the situation better, it would make it worse, and the facts confirm that. Last year's report stated that 132 parades were contested, and as a result, 119 route restrictions were placed on those parades. This year's report shows that the situation is worse. A total of 297 parades were contested and route conditions were imposed on 152 of them. It is therefore obvious that the commission is making the situation worse. There are more contested parades, and more determinations are changing the routes. Those are indisputable facts.

Last year's report at least gave the impression that two sides were involved in the disputes, because it contained a picture of Garvaghy road, on which many flags of a foreign state were flying, as usual. It also contained a photograph that, from the pictures and banners shown, appeared to be of a nationalist march. However, it is difficult to find any pictures of a nationalist march in this year's report. That gives the impression, which we have always contended, that the commission is more interested in curtailing Orange and loyalist marches than nationalist marches. Although, as I have said, it is difficult to find a picture of a nationalist march, I do concede that one is included. I can determine that it is a nationalist or Ancient Order of Hibernians march only because a well-known Member of the Northern Ireland Assembly is shown objecting to it. The Parades Commission should be more circumspect with its photographs and show that there are two sides to the dispute, not one.

On publishing its annual report, the Parades Commission issued a statement, which makes clear what it considers to be important. It said:

> Finally, we are keen, above all, to promote genuine engagement between parades organisers and those affected by parades. We attach real weight to evidence that people have sought to address the legitimate concerns of others and to accommodate those concerns where it is within their power to do so.

In other words, the Parades Commission attaches great weight to liaison between those who organise parades and those who oppose parades. It attaches such great weight that it has often changed the route of a parade because its organisers had not reached some accommodation with the protesters.

If one has a right, one should not have to seek permission from someone else to exercise it. One should not be prevented from exercising that right because someone has refused to agree with the exercising of that right. That is a fundamental issue.

I shall now deal with some of the Parades Commission's determinations, starting with that relating to Newtownbutler. The commission said:

> We note that this is a traditional evening church parade, and that it will not of itself bring about undue disruption in Newtownbutler. We recognise also that the route which the organiser has notified represents a curtailment of a past route, and that the parade proposes to proceed direct from the Orange Hall to the church.

That is a small distance. The commission continues:

> However, it is clear that the organiser of this parade continues not to take account of the Commission's consistent message in relation to the parades issue in Newtownbutler. The continuing refusal to come to an agreed form of engagement with the residents' representatives ensures that there can be no possibility of addressing the issue, or resolving it...It is also clear to us that the unchanged position of the loyal orders may place considerable strain on the acceptance by residents, in principle, of the right to parade in Newtownbutler. We therefore consider that for this parade to proceed on both its outward and return routes would have an adverse impact on local community relations.

One must question what is meant by a parade placing > considerable strain on the acceptance by residents, in principle, of the right to parade in Newtownbutler.

If the parade has the right to proceed along the route, it makes little difference whether the residents accept that right in principle: it should retain the right to proceed. However, because those who wish to march did not follow the behest of the commission and enter into dialogue with the residents' group, they will be penalised. They may march to the church, which is a short distance, but they may not march back. That is ridiculous, and shows that members of the commission want to impose their views on the loyal institutions.

I turn now to a Parades Commission determination that relates to a parade in the village of Mountfield, which is in my constituency. The commission states:

> We have noted that this is a small traditional annual church parade, comprising 70 people and one pipe band. Previous parades have been conducted in an orderly manner, and the parade in itself would cause minimal disruption to the life of the community.
> In issuing a decision in respect of this parade last year, we understood that organisers had expressed a willingness to consider how aspects of the parade which are perceived by some residents > as problematic might be addressed. We considered that such a willingness represented a significant expression of respect on behalf of the parade organisers and we took this into account when assessing the impact of the parade on relationships within the community. However, we have been informed that no efforts have been made by parade organisers in the interim period to address these concerns. In the absence of any form of dialogue which might address the perceived problems we do not see how a parade as notified could proceed at this time without having a detrimental impact on relationships within the community.

Again, the Parades Commission has used the phrase > a detrimental impact on relationships within the community

If people have the right to march peaceably, it makes no difference what the community thinks.

I know Mountfield well. When the Parades Commission banned the parade in 1998, it took 150 policemen to enforce the ban. Last year, it allowed the parade to go ahead—as it should—and only 12 policemen were needed to police it. This year, the parade was re-routed again, and 130 policemen were needed to enforce the ban. How ridiculous can a situation get? In fact, the police are more adept than the Parades Commission, and we were allowed to march up the footpath, because there is apparently no law to prevent anyone from doing so. The Orangemen consequently got to their church service and returned happily, without any problem.

In the case of the parade at Parkmount Junior Orange Lodge in Portadown, the Parades Commission stated:

> We note that this is a very small parade, comprised principally of children and young people accompanied by their parents. The parade has taken place along the notified route for many years, and organisers and parade participants have complied fully with the Code of Conduct. We are aware that there have been considerable disturbances at the parade over the past two years, and are advised that there is the possibility of public disorder irrespective of our decision.

The Parades Commission should be more honest and tell us where the disturbance at that parade is likely to come from. It will not be from the parade, but from those who do not like the parade and who wish, by breaking the law and creating a public disturbance, to get the Parades Commission to stop it. Any action taken should be directed towards those who act against the parade rather than the parade itself. Happily, on that occasion, the Parades Commission allowed the parade to go ahead, having asked its organisers > to take all reasonable steps to ensure that the parade disperses no later than 5.30 pm.

Another decision taken by the Parades Commission relates to the Altnaveigh LOL 37 parade in Newry, and states:

> The Commission notes that the purpose of this parade, following a religious service, is to dedicate a new banner, and as such is not a traditional parade. The parade is scheduled to begin between 8.30 pm and 9 pm and to last for a maximum of one hour. As the parade occurs on an evening when there is late night shopping in Newry there will be a level of disruption to the life of the community. We are informed however that the parade organisers will co-operate with police to ensure that this disruption is kept to the minimum extent possible. The Commission is aware that there is no record of disorder or damage having been caused by participants in this parade. There are however significant sensitivities about loyal order parades in Newry, a largely nationalist town. While we note that the Newry community have generally shown a greater tolerance of church parades than for other loyal order parades, there remains a significant degree of opposition to parades in the locality...The Commission does not feel that this parade could take place at this time along the entire notified route without having a detrimental impact on relationships within the community.

The commission therefore placed a condition on the parade that it should not proceed along a certain part of the route, despite the fact that there was no likelihood of any trouble being caused by the parade.

I turn now to the decisions relating to the most important areas, in terms of trouble at parades. I shall refer particularly to the Ormeau road, where there has been a great deal of trouble, and which has been in the news constantly. The decision made in relation to the Belfast Walker Club Apprentice Boys of Derry parade stated:

> The Commission has noted that this is a traditional parade held by the Belfast Walker Club of the Apprentice Boys of Derry...prior to their departure to the Annual Easter Monday Apprentice Boys of Derry Parade, due to be held this year in Tobermore. The Commission notes that this is a small parade, comprising 50 participants including one band, and that the outward journey is scheduled to leave Ballynafeigh Orange Hall at 8.15 am, proceeding by way of Ormeau Road, Donegall Pass, Charlotte Street, Lindsey Street, Maryville Street and Ormeau Avenue to Linenhall Street. The return journey is notified to proceed from Dunnes Store at Annadale Embankment at 6.30 pm via the Ormeau Road to return to Ballynafeigh Orange Hall...The Commission has set out its position in relation to loyal order parades along the Ormeau Road in its document—"Lower Ormeau Road"...In the Commission's determination in relation to the parade notified by the Belfast Walker Club along the Lower Ormeau Road on Saturday 14 August 1999, the Commission noted the evidence it had received of meetings between the representatives of Belfast Walker Club ABOD and the Lower Ormeau Concerned Community (LOCC) between 10 May 1999 and 20 July 1999. The Commission noted the stated willingness of the Belfast Walker Club ABOD representatives to address the legitimate concerns of the residents of the lower Ormeau community, where they were able to do so. The Commission further noted undertakings made by the Belfast Walker Club, both with regard to the parade notified to take place on 14 August 1999, and, notably, to a winter programme of dialogue with residents, regardless of the decision reached by the Commission regarding the 14 August 1999 parade. While the Commission regretted that a mutually acceptable solution had not been possible, it was satisfied that the direct dialogue that had been entered into represented "substantive, sustained and genuine engagement". With conditions imposed to ensure, so far as possible, that the parade could be carried out in a peaceful and dignified manner, the Commission decided not to impose route conditions. The event did not pass off peacefully and there were scenes of violence. We note that the parade was conducted with dignity and that it was the unlawful actions of persons sitting on the road so as to block the passage of the parade that caused the intervention of the police. We would add that unlawful protest effectively and on that occasion, dramatically, detracts from any engagement that has been entered into by the party engaged in that unlawful protest.

The determination continues:

> We, as members of the recently appointed Parades Commission, have read further minutes detailing a series of meetings between the Belfast Walker Club ABOD and the Lower Ormeau Concerned Community on 5 August 1999, 16 September 1999, 25 October 1999, 19 November 1999, 24 January 2000, 8 February 2000, 28 February 2000, and 14 March 2000. In addition we have read the previous minutes and papers relating to the earlier meetings. We acknowledge that our decision on the August parade was a difficult one for the LOCC, and while particularly disappointed with the events which ensued on the day of the parade, we are pleased that the talks between the two parties resumed again in September.

It goes on to state:

> We have spoken to representatives of both the Belfast Walker Club ABOD and the LOCC, as well as other interested parties, including elected representatives, about the parade notified on

[Mr. William Thompson]

> Monday 24 April 2000. From the evidence available to us it is clear that there is no room for optimism that any agreed solution may be imminent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. The hon. Member for West Tyrone (Mr. Thompson) is presenting a very detailed case, and we respect that. However, a half-hour Adjournment debate is supposed to allow for a full ministerial response, and there are only eight minutes left.

Mr. Thompson: I am conscious of that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is why I am rushing as fast as I can to get finished.

The determination concludes:

> In the absence of local agreement, and following consultation with the police, we are aware of the very real danger of serious public disorder should the parade proceed as notified. While disruption to the life of the community would be minimal in terms of the timing and size of the parade, there would be a negative impact on relationships within the whole community.

That parade was banned. The commission realised that the residents had put in for two parades, which, it said, was to stop this legitimate parade.

The determinations show that the Parades Commission is acting unreasonably in many ways, and is doing more harm than good. I await the Minister's reply to see what he proposes to do about that.

1.23 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): I am grateful to the hon. Member for West Tyrone (Mr. Thompson) for the opportunity to comment on the work of the Parades Commission in its second year as a statutory body. It would be appropriate for me to begin by commenting on events since last Sunday, which emanate from a determination of the Parades Commission.

Since the Drumcree parade on 2 July, we have seen disgraceful scenes both in Portadown, and more widely throughout Northern Ireland, in defiance of the lawful rulings of the Parades Commission. That violence could easily have led to death and serious injury. Blast bombs have been found and used, acid has been thrown at police, vehicles hijacked and acts of sectarian intimidation carried out. The police and the Army are well prepared for that sort of violence, which is, regrettably, familiar from previous years.

If the rioters believe that their actions will bring about a change in the determination of the Parades Commission or the Government, they are very much mistaken. The Secretary of State has made it clear that we will not be bullied into a change of course by such thuggery. The violence should stop now before it descends into an even worse climate of public disorder.

I turn to the substance of our debate, although I doubt whether I shall cover all the issues raised—

Mr. Thompson: I endorse all the Minister's comments on violence. We do not want any violence in Northern Ireland—we want peaceful parades. I hope that people will eventually accept that and that there will be tolerance in Northern Ireland. I condemn any violence, from whatever source.

Mr. Ingram: I gave way because I thought that the hon. Gentleman would respond in that way.

The hon. Gentleman and I were perhaps never likely to agree on the commission's merits and role, about which we have argued time and again. I express the Government's support for the commission and the way in which it set out to deal with the fundamental issues that were so comprehensively analysed in the North report, which gave birth to the commission.

When the North report was published in January 1997, decisions about parades and marches rested with the Chief Constable and were based on the provisions of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. The North report agreed that it was inappropriate to focus solely on the public order consequences of parades. It took that view because it argued that doing so ignored the right to peaceful assembly, the rights of those in the areas through which parades passed and the rights of the wider community. Moreover, the report considered that it was undesirable for the police to be seen to decide whether conditions should be imposed and to enforce them. Accordingly, it set out the case for an independent body that would take views from interested parties, encourage local agreement and, where that was not forthcoming, come to a view on what, if any, conditions should be imposed on what are called contentious parades. Furthermore, it would base its decisions on a broader range of factors than was previously the case, including the impact of a parade on relationships within the community, in addition to its impact on public order and the likely disruption. In one of their earliest actions in Northern Ireland, the Government legislated for the conclusions reached by the North report.

The Parades Commission is taking forward the objectives that were so clearly identified in the North report. It is doing so on the basis that determinations are a last resort, and should be made only when local agreement has not been possible. The Parades Commission takes all such factors into account when it responds to parades and marches—that matter was discussed by the hon. Member for West Tyrone.

When the commission makes a determination, it has to balance a complex series of conflicting rights. It recognises the right to march, and the competing rights of others. In a democratic society, rights are not absolute when they collide. The hon. Gentleman read out details from a European judgment. I shall write to him explaining my response to the issues that he raised.

As the North report observes, events surrounding parade disputes, such as those in Portadown, continue to dominate the public's awareness of parades. That inevitably colours the public's perception of the commission and its role. However, the report, and the previous year's report, show that the number of parades on which route restrictions had to be imposed represented a tiny proportion of those that were notified. The hon. Gentleman said that there were 132 cases last year and 152 this year. It is interesting to note that 52 of this year's 152 cases involved marches and parades in the Portadown area. He said that the Parades Commission had made the situation worse. The absolute number of parades that the commission has had to consider overall was 3,198 last year and 3,403 this year. There was a substantial increase in the total number of parades over which it has had to give a determination.

The Commission does not underestimate—indeed, it understands only too well—the difficulties that are inherent in dealing with the parade from Drumcree church down the Garvaghy road. That understanding is reflected in its determination on the parade notified by the Portadown district Loyal Orange Lodge No. 1 for this coming Sunday, 9 July. In its own way, the commission is addressing both sides of the debate. It continues in its efforts to find an equitable resolution of the Drumcree situation and it contributes to the increasing stability of relationships elsewhere in the Province.

The hon. Member for West Tyrone recited a whole range of parades over which he said that there could be a debate about how they were dealt with. He did not refer in detail to the Drumcree—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must stop the Minister because time is up and we must move on to the next debate.

Asylum Seekers (Inner London)

1.30 pm

Mr. Iain Coleman (Hammersmith and Fulham): The central point that I want to bring to the Government's attention today is narrow, but vital to inner London boroughs. Before doing so, I want to make clear the climate in which we are operating.

The issue of asylum seekers and the way in which the Government have tried to deal with the backlog of applications have caused considerable controversy in recent times. This sensitive area of policy has been subject to disgraceful and dangerous propaganda by some newspapers and by some of the tactics employed by the Opposition. A proportionally large number of asylum seekers have settled in the London borough of Hammersmith and Fulham and I am aware from my contact with many of them that the majority have been through deeply scarring and traumatic experiences. I do not have time today to detail the brutalising and often horrific treatment to which many of them have been subjected, but I believe that the majority that I have seen are genuine asylum seekers who have a right to expect to be treated fairly and with the proper dignity that is enshrined in the 1951 convention to which our country is a signatory.

I regret to say that some of the measures in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 are unnecessarily harsh and reactionary and caused considerable disappointment and even shock to many supporters of our Government. In particular, the decision to operate a stigmatising and inefficient voucher system, which is expensive to administer and open to fraud was a serious policy mistake. The level at which support for such vulnerable people has been set is unacceptably low and many of my constituents who are seeking asylum are suffering as a consequence, especially many of the innocent young children who have been caught up in the system. I want to make it clear that I dissociate myself from the language of the Opposition and much of our national press who have covered the matter so hysterically and dangerously.

The central issue that I want to raise is the fact that clear evidence demonstrates that a number of local authorities have not secured full funding from the Government for the care of asylum seekers. I shall demonstrate that with evidence gleaned largely from my constituency, although I am aware of a similar pattern of underfunding in other inner London boroughs.

On 2 June this year, the Audit Commission published a report that was concerned principally with the dispersal arrangements and the impact on asylum seekers and the areas receiving them. A careful analysis of the report clearly supports the case in some instances for additional funding over the current maximum available grant. Page 16 of the report states:

> Local Authorities that have been unable to support Asylum Seekers with current grant thresholds will continue to subsidise this expenditure from their General Revenue Budget, as Authorities will not have made provision for this in their 2000/2001 budget since they expected this duty to be passed on to the national Asylum Support Service from Aril 2000.

That is beyond doubt.

Page 82 of the report refers to the immense pressure on local authorities and the importance of ensuring that the funding regime for asylum seekers meets the reasonable costs of key local services. In Hammersmith and Fulham, the average cost of supporting asylum seekers with children for the previous financial year was £370 a week. The maximum grant available is currently £240 a week. The council has been supporting an average of 500 such families a week, leaving a shortfall of £130 a week for each family. A simple mathematical calculation shows that that leaves an overall bill above the grant available from central Government to my local authority of approximately £3.25 million a year—just for social services. Page 85 of the report refers to the variable costs of different local authorities. Average accommodation costs in Hammersmith and Fulham are £230 a week and with subsistence costs the figure ranges between £350 and £380 a week per family.

The Government have correctly and justifiably asked why the costs in Hammersmith and Fulham, and other inner-London boroughs such as Camden, Wandsworth and Westminster, are significantly higher than those in other areas of the country. There are several reasons. First—and crucially—the boroughs in question easily have the highest accommodation costs in the UK, if not the whole of Europe. They have a high number of asylum seekers and the uncertainty about the legislative position and Home Office policy on asylum seekers means that it has been very difficult to forward plan strategically. Another factor that places great pressure on Hammersmith and Fulham, which has made it difficult to place families in potentially cheaper boroughs or in immediately neighbouring boroughs, are families who, as port-of-entry applicants, were initially accepted as a housing responsibility but who were transferred to the responsibility of social services.

The regulations published by the Government made it clear—regrettably in my judgment—that councils should entirely disregard choice of placement, but other regulations require the councils to take into account the welfare of the families concerned. I know many families in my constituency who have been in their accommodation for well over 12 months. There is clear legal advice, which councils are bound to consider, that the longer the family has been in a particular area, with the children in a particular school, the more inevitably powerful are the arguments, on welfare and compassionate grounds, for not moving them to another area.

The uncertainty about the strategy for supporting asylum seekers has undeniably led to other problems, particularly in such areas as Hammersmith and Fulham and Westminster, where temporary accommodation of any kind is at a premium. Potential providers of block accommodation sought long-term contracts that the council was unable to negotiate because of uncertainty about how long its duty would last.

What reason have the Government given for failing to pay the bills submitted by local authorities that have exceeded the set expenditure maximum? The one possibly hopeful reference for the Government in the Audit Commission report is at paragraph 88, which states that > service provision for asylum seekers should be subject to the same value for money scrutiny as other services.

I agree with that. However, the Government have been paying £300 a week or more per family for accommodation in Glasgow. The costs in

Hammersmith and Fulham have been the subject of both internal and external audit, although the Government have not said, as far as I am aware, that the costs are bogus; they accept that they were genuinely incurred in supporting asylum seekers and their families. The last annual district auditors management letter in Hammersmith and Fulham was entirely positive and particularly praised the authority's sound financial management. The district auditor said that > the council continues to adopt a financially prudent approach to the management of its affairs. The authority secures tight control to keep within spending limits and demonstrates effective arrangements for ensuring value for money.

There is no question of irresponsible or lavish spending occurring and no hint of the figures having been massaged. The council has not hesitated to open up its books for close and careful scrutiny. Indeed, it has said that it would welcome an inspection of its expenditure. The Audit Commission report, if read comprehensively, strongly supports the inner-London boroughs' case for additional funding.

My concerns are twofold. First, central Government must clearly take responsibility for support for asylum seekers. It is central Government who set down the rules governing the support mechanisms that local authorities have been allowed to use. The aggregate of external finance in my borough has been set to increase by just 1.5 per cent. in the current financial year. Over £16 million of cuts, in a budget of less than £200 million, have been made in just five years. There is little or no scope for use of balances, which stand at less than £2 million. If the council is now obliged to cut services to the local community yet further, or to raise the council tax significantly, local people will not understand why the situation has been allowed to arise. I plead with the Government to think again about the extra costs incurred by the inner-London boroughs.

The Association of London Government has calculated that the expenditure incurred by the boroughs in question above the grant level last year was £27 million. In inner London, authorities have worked hard to provide a quality service within the boundaries set out by central Government, and they believe that they have been financially penalised for seriously tackling the brief that the Government gave them. In other areas, no such financial penalty has applied when local authorities have been less willing and less enthusiastic to carry out their duty. The inner-London boroughs hold the view that he who provides least and complains most has been treated best. That cannot be right.

The effect of the shortfall could be serious for the financial position of some local authorities affected, including my own. The chair of the Association of London Government, Councillor Robin Wales, has pointed out that the current levels of grant do not reflect the actual cost to the borough. The London boroughs currently support 63,000 destitute asylum seekers. That is a difficult job, and it has been made more so by the underfunding that I have sought to highlight. I urge the Government to consider the issue again, and pay in full the real and actual costs incurred to all the local authorities that now find themselves out of pocket to such a large amount, through no fault of their own.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. Two hon. Members have said that the initiator of the debate has given them permission to speak, and that they have notified the Minister of that. I shall be happy to call them both if they will be extremely brief, but I want an opportunity for the Minister to reply in full to this important debate.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to my hon. Friends the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Coleman) and the Minister for giving me a few moments to contribute to the debate. I endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham about the general aspects of asylum-seeker policy. I was and remain unhappy about many aspects of the operation of asylum legislation.

I differ from my hon. Friend in one respect, in that I support the general principle of a dispersal programme. I believe that a national solution is necessary, given the numbers of people seeking asylum. Like him, I represent an area with a large number of asylum seekers, many of whom are highly traumatised individuals with tragic histories. My experience is of victims of torture, families torn apart by war and shattered lives.

I congratulate the Government on having made progress on meeting the cost and policy issues connected with asylum seekers since 1997. Progress was made immediately after the election in dealing with the shortfall of costs bequeathed to us by the disastrous Asylum and Immigration Act 1996. For the reasons outlined by my hon. Friend, several inner-London authorities still carry a significant shortfall.

I shall give figures for the two boroughs that I represent in part. The total net expenditure after Government grant borne by the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea in 1999-2000 was £1,493,000 in direct costs of housing and supporting asylum seekers, and an additional £1.7 million in indirect costs. Those costs are recognised by the Government as being spent on matters such as the assessment and the administration of asylum applicants. The royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea is, unfortunately, excluded from the otherwise extremely welcome grant from the Department of Health for unaccompanied asylum-seeking children. That has left it with an additional shortfall of £593,000.

In the London borough of Westminster, the net cost to social services was £4.6 million in 1999-2000 for adults and families, and £4.3 million for asylum seekers for whom the council had a housing duty. The 2000-01 estimates offer a £6 million and £3.9 million shortfall respectively, assuming that the National Asylum Support Service takes over responsibilities for new adult and family applicants in the near future.

As my hon. Friend explained, the inner-London boroughs are now in competition with the National Asylum Support Service for accommodation. That has been intensified by the extreme shortage of temporary accommodation in the capital. Boroughs cannot negotiate long-term contracts for temporary accommodation as the National Asylum Support Service can, and that has added dramatically to their costs. The inner-London boroughs cannot sustain the costs of running void properties, which has made it extremely difficult for them to achieve the cost savings available to NASS. That helps to explain why the unit costs are so much higher for those London authorities than for others.

I have not always seen eye to eye with Westminster city council about asylum seekers, just as I have not on virtually every other policy. However, the council, along with the other London boroughs and the Association of London Government has been supportive of the Government's dispersal strategy. Politicians there have responded to the issue in a commendably restrained manner, given the intense pressure on their finances and services.

I do not believe that either of the local authority areas that I partially represent, both of which are controlled by the Conservative party, are relaxed in principle about the costs that they have to bear and the provision that they must make for asylum seekers. They and other London authorities are struggling to find reasonable quality accommodation and support services at a reasonable cost, and should be fully remunerated for doing so.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I endorse much that has been said during the debate. I was formerly a member of Westminster city council, and served on the housing committee. I saw the problem in the light of the dilemma not only over the increase in asylum seekers, but over homelessness in general. People would focus on Westminster and the central boroughs and refuse to move across the river to places such as Peckham, where accommodation was available. I should like the Minister to deal with that in her response. Reserve powers are there to require the regions and even outer London boroughs to offer accommodation, which is in short supply, because very few regions have taken up the opportunity to contribute a solution to the problem. The Minister might also comment on the possibility that we could require asylum seekers to move to outer London boroughs and the regions.

I endorse what was said by the hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck). The National Asylum Support Service is competing with inner-London boroughs in attempts to persuade outer areas such as Glasgow to take asylum seekers. The Government programme allows contracts of several years to be offered in those areas, whereas boroughs such as Westminster cannot countenance that owing to their budgetary system and because they cannot afford to pay for voids, which are inevitable when a contract is taken out for three to five years.

The housing problem is not simply an asylum-seeker issue. Persuading homeless people or seekers of public help with housing to go even as far as across the river, where there is often spare accommodation, has always been a problem.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Coleman) on raising this issue. He is right to say that it is an important matter, and I will do my best to address the issues that he and other hon. Members have addressed during the debate.

I understand my hon. Friend's interest in these matters, and I know that he showed considerable interest when the legislation was passing through the House. He has some experience in these matters, and will know that I also represent a London constituency with high numbers of people seeking asylum.

The Government have a clear policy. We are committed to honouring our obligations under the 1951 convention, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham referred. We seek to ensure that, when people have a genuine claim under that convention, we recognise that claim as quickly as we can and give them the full package of refugee integration. However, we have a policy to deal as quickly as possible with people who make unfounded claims.

When the Government took office we faced a chaotic situation. That was due solely to the previous Government's removal of access to cash benefits for one category of asylum seekers—those who had applied for asylum in-country—without making any provision for their support pending the outcome of their asylum claim. Subsequent court cases determined that local authorities were responsible for those people. Given the pattern of asylum claims, the main share of the responsibility fell to local authorities in London and the south-east. Of course, the situation was not helped by people claiming asylum at the port, who still had access to cash benefits but could only turn to local authorities for help with housing. That exacerbated the problem.

At an early stage, the Government determined that that could not continue. As hon. Members will know, we devised a national asylum support scheme that would lead to the transfer of responsibility for the support of destitute asylum seekers from local to central government. As the scheme rolls out—it started on 3 April—we will gradually help with and remove the immediate responsibilities on local authorities for supporting new asylum seekers. Local authorities in London recognise that those measures will help them.

Of course, the question remains about the role of central Government, and what more they can do to help local government with the costs of supporting asylum seekers. Local authorities in London have done good work generally, and dedicated council officials have played their part. NASS works closely with local authorities, up and down the country, to ensure that dispersal away from London and the south-east is a reality, and that it provides an appropriate environment for asylum seekers.

I am pleased to say that more than 3,000 asylum seekers and their dependants who rely on the National Asylum Support Service have been dispersed outside London and the south-east. That is in addition to those whom local authorities were able to disperse under the voluntary scheme introduced in advance of the new provisions. I am not just talking about the ad hoc dispersal by local authorities—the figure of 3,000 is in addition to those dispersed under the voluntary arrangements that started on 6 December under the new legislation. I thank all those involved in the voluntary scheme, in which local government played its part. The reception of asylum seekers in the dispersed areas has involved a combination of work by the Government, local authorities and the voluntary sector.

All those measures, and the success of NASS so far, will bring welcome relief for local authorities in London and the south-east. Many local authorities will still accommodate asylum seekers who secured support prior to the introduction of the new scheme. In those cases, reimbursement will continue to be provided through grant aid. I cannot yet give details of this year's grant arrangements, which we are still in the process of finalising. The National Asylum Support Service currently applies to all new port asylum applicants and in-country applicants in Kent, and will shortly be extended to other in-country applicants. That will mean that there will soon be additional relief for local authorities as they will no longer have the job of providing housing to new claimants on a case-by-case basis.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham rightly concentrated on the costs incurred by his authority. The whole picture for London boroughs, based on last year's grant claims, is surprisingly varied. The figures are still subject to audit adjustments, but the wide range of costs that they reveal is interesting. Some boroughs have significant difficulty living within the unit costs. For example, Hammersmith and Fulham spent nearly £13 million on asylum-seeker support in 1999-2000, but only £10 million of that was recoverable under the weekly cost limits of the grant regime. That placed the borough second in the league of support cost shortfalls behind Westminster, which recovered £10 million from a total spend of £15 million. Five London boroughs, including Hammersmith and Fulham, and Westminster, accounted for more than half the London unreimbursed costs, but only a fifth of the total support costs for London. While some boroughs had difficulty living within the grant limits, seven London boroughs had their costs fully reimbursed, and that included two of the top five spenders on asylum support, Newham and Lambeth.

Hammersmith and Fulham's weekly unit costs were £144 for adult singles and £367 for families compared with the weekly grant levels of £140 and £240. At the other end of the cost spectrum, nearly half the London boroughs were able to support adult asylum seekers for £140 per week or less and, in some cases, weekly costs were well under £100. Thirteen London boroughs could support families for £240 or less. The picture is complex.

Given that many of the boroughs, including Hammersmith and Fulham, and Westminster, are dispersing asylum seekers out of their areas, it is difficult to understand why there is such a great variation. We have asked the Audit Commission to look further into cost variations between local authorities to see if any lessons can be learnt on ways in which to reduce them.

When we can announce it, I hope that the extension of NASS to cover in-country London cases will ease the pressure on authorities such as those that we have heard about today. We are taking the matter seriously, which is why we are investing resources in setting up a system that removes the responsibility from a few and co-ordinates a national approach to meeting our international and humanitarian obligations, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) referred.

We are not in a position in which the unfair share of the responsibility should fall on just a few boroughs. Along with all other European Union member states, we are facing a national problem, which demands a national solution. We are moving on from the mess created by the previous Administration. It has taken us time to do so, not least because we have had to introduce a major piece of legislation. We have set up the National Asylum Support Service and entered into contracts for the provision of a national voucher scheme, accommodation around the United Kingdom and provision of other support services. That was a major undertaking. We have engaged people from all sectors in meeting this challenge.

It is time that we recognised the enormous strides that have been made in the past 18 months. I certainly look forward to the benefits that will result from better management and co-ordination. We want to make sure that those whose asylum claims are being processed are treated with respect and dignity during that period.

Question put and agreed to.

Community Legal Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Betts.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. David Lock): I welcome the opportunity to debate the Community Legal Service. Its development is a manifesto commitment and the Government's flagship policy for reforming civil justice. The creation of the service is a radical programme, which will transform access to justice, make it easier for people to understand their rights and responsibilities, and enable them to resolve disputes, enforce their rights and, if necessary, seek the protection of the courts.

Traditionally, the legal world conjures up images of court rooms with judges and barristers in wigs, but that is only the tip of the legal iceberg. The vast majority of community legal work is unseen by members of the public and operates away from courts and often away from formally qualified lawyers. The CLS challenges the public perception of legal services. We are redefining the concept to make them relevant and important to all of us who take responsibility for the welfare of those whom we represent. This wider, more inclusive view of legal services in the CLS covers the full range of different levels and types of help, whether provided by public libraries which provide people with information about their legal rights and responsibilities, local advice centres which help people with debt problems and benefit claims, advisers doing casework on behalf of clients with immigration or employment problems, or lawyers who advise and represent people in court, at tribunals and in any other areas where legal rights are concerned.

Those providing legal services are not restricted to solicitors and barristers in private practice. They include professionals who work in the not-for-profit sector, advice workers, local authorities, including trading standards officers, and trained volunteers in advice agencies such as citizens advice bureaux, who do such valuable work throughout the country and work so closely with many hon. Members. All are part of the CLS and help the public to have better access to good quality advice on their rights and duties. It is no good people having rights in theory if they do not know what they are, how to exercise them or who to turn to for advice. Without that information, legal rights are merely illusory.

Some, including the president of the Law Society, have asked why we need the CLS. The answer is that, despite the efforts of many professionals and volunteers, in reality too many people are unable to access necessary legal services or obtain necessary legal advice.

A few areas of the country benefit from a range of good quality advisers, who form ad hoc networks to refer people to the right sort of advice and provide a better service to the public. However, that is the exception and too many areas are advice deserts or advice mazes through which those in need of help struggle to find the right adviser. That situation has arisen because of the fragmentation and lack of co-ordination in the funding of legal advice. For anyone who suggests that there are no problems, the research paper, "Paths to Justice", which was produced by Professor Hazel Genn and the National Centre for Social Research, is suitable bedtime reading. Professor Genn's paper is the most comprehensive survey ever of the experiences of people with problems that could ultimately end up in the civil courts. It does not make easy reading for lawyers or anyone who wants to defend the present situation.

The old civil legal aid scheme had to change because of several problems. Expenditure on civil legal aid was increasing year on year, while the number of people being helped was not. There was no way of targeting expenditure on the areas of greatest need, and no connection was made between legal aid expenditure and other funders' spending on legal and advice services. Lawyers had no incentive to provide services cost effectively or to provide the services that people really needed. Anxiety was increasingly expressed that too many weak and unmeritorious cases were receiving funding. However, it is not merely a question of money. Significant amounts of public money are already spent on legal services. About £150 million of local authority money is spent on purchasing legal services each year. Through the Legal Aid Board, the Government spent, in net terms, £780 million on civil legal aid last year, including £206 million on civil advice and assistance. This year, that figure will increase to £226 million.

Funding is also provided by other central Government Departments, charitable foundations and through the valuable contribution of the National Lottery Charities Board. A great deal of money has, therefore, been committed to ensuring that people have access to legal services. Civil legal aid spending has increased vastly over the past six years. How, therefore, have we ended up with advice deserts and advice mazes? The answer is that all those different funders have been acting in isolation, and sometimes even at cross purposes.

As a result of that failure to work together, a single funder has only a limited overview of an area's legal needs, and no consistent or comprehensive quality standard can be relied on in deciding whom to fund. As one local authority funder said,

> It's like doing a jigsaw puzzle with half the pieces missing.

In the past, the largest single funder of legal services, the Legal Aid Board, did not even have a jigsaw. Under the system that Opposition Members support, the Legal Aid Board simply acted as a cheque payer on demand, rather than as a purchaser of services that decided where there was unmet legal need, which services should be funded and how to use taxpayers' money to best effect.

Those are major, long-standing problems, which the previous Government ducked. They responded by cutting the number of people eligible for legal aid while doing nothing to tackle the fundamental problems—classic short-termism, year after year.

Throughout consideration and implementation of the Access to Justice Act 1999 the Opposition whinged and made personal attacks, but proposed no coherent alternative polices. I accept that they do not like the CLS. They have railed against it so often that I do not expect a Pauline-like conversion today. However, I hope that the Opposition will use today's debate as an opportunity to come clean with alternatives.

We know that the Opposition want to abandon full-cost recovery and transfer £300 million from court fees to general taxation. Do they also propose to revert to a demand-led legal aid budget? If so, would they put up taxes or cut other services in order to increase payments to lawyers? I hope that the single Opposition Member present today will show us whether there is any legal thinking on their side of the political divide. Do they have a policy or is this a Tory policy void? I refer the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) to "Macbeth". It is a case of full of sound and fury,

Signifying nothing.

I draw his attention to the first part of that quotation.

The Lord Chancellor launched the CLS in April this year. The launch marked the replacement of the existing civil and family legal aid budget with the CLS fund, and the implementation of three core policies for the CLS. Those policies are, first, CLS partnerships, which will take responsibility for planning local legal services; secondly, the CLS quality mark, which will be awarded to providers of legal services that achieve the required quality standards; and thirdly, the CLS website, called "Just Ask!", which contains a directory of legal services and guides users to the most appropriate sources of information and advice on more than 300 other sites.

CLS partnerships are at the heart of the community legal service. Each partnership includes the two players common to every area: the Legal Services Commission, which from April succeeded the Legal Aid Board, and the local authority. Working with other local funders and providers of legal services, they will support the creation of local referral networks of good quality services. CLS partnerships have four main tasks: to assess the extent of need in their area for legal and advice services and to prioritise those services; to identify how well the current supply meets the need in priority areas; to plan together how best to organise the funding that each partner brings to the table so as more effectively to meet priority legal needs; and to facilitate the creation of active referral systems in the local network of services.

The term "partnership" is not used lightly. The CLS does not involve a pooling of funds. Each funder—the Legal Services Commission, the local authority and the National Lottery Charities Board—will maintain its independence, distinctive approach and discrete responsibilities. The partners come together to gain the benefits of pooling expertise and knowledge so as to engage in activities that are of mutual interest and concern. By working together in that way, they are in a better position to share information, to understand what is needed in a particular area and to target individual decisions to achieve objectives. That process will be underpinned by concordats which will promote confidence and encourage trust between independent partners working together to deliver common objectives.

Before we hear special pleading on behalf of lawyers, I remind hon. Members that the sort of prioritising decisions the partnerships will have to make are precisely the sort that all public authorities providing services from large but, none the less, controlled budgets must make. How, for example, does a health authority balance health promotion and heart surgery? Those are tough decisions, and the views of local partnerships will be similarly vital in deciding how public money is spent on legal services.

The Legal Services Commission is able to participate fully in local partnerships because of the radical changes to legal aid made in the Access to Justice Act 1999. The previous civil and family legal aid scheme has been replaced by the CLS fund. Instead of the previous demand-led system, the CLS fund will enable us for the first time to target money on national and local priorities by awarding contracts to the providers best placed to deliver a quality service that meets local priority needs and is purchased in a best-value context. Contracts have been issued from the start of this year to providers throughout England and Wales.

A key difference is that, under the new CLS, funding is now allocated on the basis of priorities that have been decided locally and, at national level, by the Lord Chancellor. They include the welfare of children, domestic violence and helping people avoid or climb out of social exclusion. Those priorities are given effect by the introduction of contracts. By April 2001, all civil and family legal services will be provided by quality-assured suppliers that are under contract with the Legal Services Commission. The contracts enable the commission to choose what services it wants to provide and ensure that taxpayers' money is directed at the areas of greatest need. They also provide suppliers with an incentive to provide services cost effectively.

Another key difference between the CLS fund and the previous legal aid scheme is that the new fund replaces the old civil merits test with a new funding code. The funding code gives effect to identified priorities in terms of deciding which cases receive funding by setting more or less stringent tests according to the priority of the category of case.

Although the CLS is still at a very early stage, there have already been encouraging signs. There are now 109 CLS partnerships, which involve 184 local authorities and cover 50 per cent. of the population of England and Wales. We have, therefore, exceeded the Lord Chancellor's target of covering 33 per cent. of the population by autumn 2000, and are well on the way to achieving the targets of 66 per cent. by spring 2001 and 90 per cent. by spring 2002.

The CLS partnerships are delivering where it matters in the communities in which they serve. For example, the CLS partnership in Northumberland is involved in the local action against poverty initiative. It provides debt advice workers in general practitioners' surgeries and primary health care teams throughout the county, enabling health workers to refer on those in need of debt advice.

In the East Riding of Yorkshire, the Legal Services Commission and the local council are running a pilot scheme to improve access to services by providing advice kiosks at locations throughout the county, which will link with the local council's customer services centres. That highly impressive scheme was developed specifically to use information technology to overcome the problems associated with that type of rural area. We will be monitoring the pilot scheme closely to see whether it should be adopted elsewhere.

There are now over 5,500 solicitors and advice agencies with the CLS quality mark, and an increasing number of organisations are applying every month. I especially praise the involvement of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, which is fully engaged in working with us and will become the first external organisation to be accredited to award the CLS quality mark.

The CLS website, "Just Ask!", has already proved a winner. It has won a major award and attracts an average of more than 1,000 users every day and sometimes more than 2,000. We anticipate that the figure will increase steadily over the coming months, particularly as the design of the website is further enhanced.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): If I may, I shall talk about my own experiences in Stroud with the local citizens advice bureau. Debt counselling was clearly identified as a priority and I would support that because a large number of people go to citizens advice bureaux for advice on that. However, there is also a clear need for housing and employment advice. The problem that needs to be considered is how to achieve the second level of prioritisation through the franchising. Will my hon. Friend say whether there may be a revisiting of the priorities in due course?

Mr. Lock: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention. The priorities are being kept under review, and the fact that categories such as children's cases or domestic violence are not of the highest priority does not mean that we are not providing extensive funding for them. Housing, employment and immigration funding is being substantially increased as part of the extension this year from £206 million to £226 million for contracts for legal help. I am sure that suitable priorities will be identified in my hon. Friend's constituency, and I would be delighted if he wrote to me about any specific problems that he would like me to consider.

As long ago as 1968, the Society of Labour Lawyers wrote an influential pamphlet about the need to develop community legal services. That remained unfinished business for many years, but this Government have turned the ideas into substance and created the framework in which community legal services can be genuinely delivered for the first time.

I hope that the CLS will receive a warm welcome in all parts of the House, because those services will be delivered in all constituencies. I look forward to hearing about the needs and experiences of individual hon. Member's constituencies.

2.48 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock), is developing something of a reputation for trying to get his retaliation in first, and today appears to be no exception. Before addressing his specific points, I shall respond to his final statement, in which he said that he looked forward to hearing hon. Members talk about experiences in their own constituencies.

I shall start with an account from the sharp end, which is not the sort of thing to be found in the official Government brief that the Parliamentary Secretary has just read out, with its slogans and buzz words about sustainable legal services and solutions to social problems. I shall talk about reality, about what is happening on the ground, focusing on a particular firm of solicitors in my area. The firm is not based in my constituency, although it has many clients there; it covers a wide area and has several offices.

One of the partners, who is also an associate of the Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators, writes:

> We have a mix of both Private and Publicly Funded Clients. Our Private Client rates have risen over the years to take account of the cost of practising, the rising costs of the overheads which we have to bear, including the rising staff costs which we have to pay.
> Publicly Funded work has increasingly become more uneconomic. Our Accountants have advised us to restrict the amount of Publicly Funded work which we do within the general mix of our practice. Our Accountants have gone further and suggest that we should cease doing Publicly Funded work at all, because it is doubtful that we can do this work at a profit...there has been no increase in the rates of Publicly Funded work in the areas in which we practise for nearly eight years...it is unfair for Legal Aid rates to have been frozen for such a long period of time given the general increases in overheads which we have had to absorb.
> In truth the absorption of these overheads has been only possible by a conscious effort being made by the Partners of this Firm to increase the volumes of Privately Funded work whilst not seeking to increase the volumes of Publicly Funded work.

He states that the firm's office in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) > found it uneconomic to continue with a Criminal Law Department and the Woking office no longer carries out any criminal work.

As the Parliamentary Secretary knows, such work is one of the most vital aspects of service to the community.

Although we did not overlap, the Parliamentary Secretary and I were in the same west midlands chambers, which undertook a lot of criminal work. When I hear him read out a departmental brief that refers to bleats from lawyers, I start to believe that he has undergone a transformation—that he has ceased to be a lawyer. Perhaps some of the firms that instructed him when he was in chambers might agree. Despite the hon. Gentleman's comments, we must be conscious of the effect of the Government's plans on lawyers working at the sharp end. The example that I have given reinforces the view that the official Opposition have expressed repeatedly: that the so-called Access to Justice Act 1999—probably the worst misnomer of any piece of legislation introduced by the current Government—has become known, not only among Opposition Members, but generally in the profession, as the denial of justice act.

The letter to which I have referred also states:

> unless the whole system is properly resourced then there will be insufficient quality legal advice available.

[Mr. Nick Hawkins]

That is the reality. It continues:

> To attain a Legal Aid Franchise and subsequently a Contract for Advice and Assistance, this Firm had to make a substantial investment in systems to give the Government the quality assurance it required. This has substantially increased the administrative burden and this Firm's overheads in order to demonstrate that this Firm is able to deliver the quality legal advice demanded by the Government. However, in return, there has been almost no recognition in terms of remuneration rates.
> By seeking Franchise status and by taking a Contract, we wish to demonstrate our commitment to providing Advice and Assistance through the Community Legal Service. The problem, however, is that as a business we must make a profit. I sure that you will appreciate that any firm in a commercial environment which identifies an area of work which is unprofitable will be well advised to cease doing that work as to continue doing unprofitable work can only lead to the failure of the firm.

That is what will happen. Firms will either carry on doing such work and go out of business—which will not enhance the service to the public—or they will not do it. The Opposition, the Bar Council and the Law Society have warned the Government of that many times. They have got it wrong.

Mr. Lock: The hon. Gentleman cites with approval a statement that the current CLS budget of £1,600 million a year is not properly resourced. What are his resourcing proposals for that budget? How much would he increase it by?

Mr. Hawkins: The much-vaunted plans for the CLS that the Government introduced are not working. The Parliamentary Secretary will hear exactly what our proposals are in due course, when the time comes, as and when we have policies to put to the electorate, but today we are discussing what the Government are doing. This is their debate, not an Opposition-led debate. We are here to respond to the Government's—and the Parliamentary Secretary's—outrageous boasts that they are doing all the right things and that everything is working. I have cited a concrete example given in a letter that was written on behalf of many people. It is not the only letter that I have received on the matter; it just happens to be the best one and it is from a firm in my constituency. I am responding to the hon. Gentleman's challenge—he wanted to hear what was happening at the sharp end; well, the answer is that his plans are not working. He can smirk all he likes, but he will find that, along with the current chorus of disapproval will be heard a chorus of protest.

The letter goes on:

> Many firms have chosen not to continue providing Publicly Funded services. This Firm is now at a point in its development where that decision may have to be taken.
> Whilst we have Contracts in certain areas of law, we also provide a significant service to the community under the "Tolerance Provisions". We are currently considering whether we can continue to provide the broad spectrum of advice which historically has been given to Clients in our community. We are able to withdraw from that area of advice immediately. If remuneration rates do not improve over the longer term, then our existing Contracts for Family and Crime, may also not be renewed.
> The public perception is—this has been said repeatedly by both the Lord Chancellor and his Ministers—> that Solicitors are "fat cats". This is not an accurate description of Solicitors doing Publicly Funded work and if there is to remain a network of Publicly Funded lawyers, then the unfairness...needs to be recognised and remedied. I would, therefore, urge you to take the Lord Chancellor to task over this issue...Surely the basic requirement must be that it should be properly funded.

That is the response to the Government's much-vaunted policy: firms will either choose to stop offering the service or they will go out of business.

Despite such warnings, the Parliamentary Secretary says that the policy is a success. He believes that the problem is nothing other than lawyers' whinges. The Government do not recognise reality. I sometimes think that those in the Lord Chancellor's Department live in a dream world of their own, where everything is in line with the Government's press releases. Well, that is not the reality, and the Parliamentary Secretary and his colleagues must wake up to what is really gong in.

I shall now deal with the more general points that have been made by the Law Society, which is not just an individual firm, but the official organisation that represents solicitors throughout the country. It has a number of concerns about the partnerships. It states:

> It is unclear how those local authorities who have historically had no interest in advice provision will be encouraged to set up Partnerships. This is important given that their reluctance to do so could lead to patchy provision around the country.
> It is intended that there will be strong encouragement to local authorities to take the lead in setting up local Partnerships through the relationship with Best Value. We believe that the link with Best Value will be helpful in encouraging participation, but there is no way of compelling local authorities to fund legal services even where needs and priorities have been identified.

That is an important point to which I shall return because, once again, I have a local example of shocking attempts by the Lord Chancellor's Department to hold local authorities to ransom.

The Law Society points out that > the Partnerships will be led by funders of services—local authorities and the Commission. This could lead to conflict of interest when planning and funding decisions are taken. Many providers of legal services bring actions against the authorities that will be funding and planning services, and we believe that this may impact on the funding and planning decisions made.

That stands to reason: the Law Society must be right about that. It goes on:

> We believe that the tasks that the Partnerships are expected to undertake are both complex and resource intensive particularly in assessing need and planning provision. This will have serious implications for the main funding partners involved in the Partnerships as well as for providers and other groups involved in the Partnerships.
> Needs assessment is difficult and expensive. The Legal Aid Board, as it then was, estimated that its 13 Regional Legal Services Committees [RLSCs] cost £900,000 in their first year of operation.

The Law Society says that it has been made very clear that there will be no new money available for the establishment of the CLS. That will have implications for the partnerships. In addition, no analysis appears to have been made of the cost, as mentioned in research carried out by Richard Moorhead into the pioneer partnerships set up by the Government. Paragraph 2.41 of the research points out that there are significant resource implications, especially for lead partners, but also for others, in terms of investing time, supporting meetings and consultations, and drawing other resources into a partnership. The research also states that it was clear that the more in-depth work on needs assessment and user involvement required significant resources. The Law Society believes that that will be a major factor in determining the ability of the partnerships to carry out the majority of their key tasks.

I said that I would refer to some of the specific points made by the Minister. He quoted Shakespeare, but listening to him and having heard the arguments from him and his fellow Ministers so often called another literary figure to my mind. In this area of the law, the Government appear to believe a dictum of one of Lewis Carroll's characters, which is > What I tell you three times is true.

However, what they tell us is not true. I shall give a local example of how the Lord Chancellor's Department treats local authorities.

The Government, including the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor's Department, claim that local authority spending is discretionary, and they tell local authorities that what they spend money on is up to them. However, let us consider a practical example. A chief executive of one of the two borough councils in my constituency received a letter, signed in the Parliamentary Secretary's name on his behalf, which stated that there was no statutory duty on citizens advice bureaux in respect of the CLS, and no compulsion to participate in the CLS network. The chief executive responded to the letter as follows:

> on reading through the remainder of your letter it is clear that it is the Government's intention that all Citizens Advice Bureaux should be included in local networks. Furthermore, in correspondence with the Department of Trade and Industry they confirm that there will be costs falling to local CABs, at whatever level, in order that they might meet their compliance criteria for the CLS Quality Mark.
> Given that local Citizens Advice Bureaux offices are invariably funded almost entirely by the local authority to say that there are no new demands being required of local authority budgets is, I believe, disingenuous.

The chief executive is right: the Government have almost won awards for disingenuousness in many of their policies. He continues:

> This view is further supported in the sixth paragraph of your letter, where you refer to the two principal funders of legal services being the Legal Services Commission and local authorities. It is clear from this statement that you intend local authorities to commit more money in order to effect this new initiative, albeit that the Government, as always, is making no further money available to local authorities in support thereof.

There we have it—the poor local authorities are over a barrel. The Government tell them that a wonderful service, the CLS, has been introduced, but that they have to fund it in addition to having to fund citizens advice bureaux. Local authorities are caught between the devil and the deep blue sea: the Government will not provide any extra money to enable them to take on extra commitments. The Government are keen on announcing new initiatives while expecting someone else to pay for and deliver them. The example I have given is yet another illustration of the Government's control freak tendency. They want to centralise everything and to introduce amazing bureaucracy, but they are not the ones who have to work at the sharp end.

Mr. Lock: The problem that the hon. Gentleman seeks to illustrate is founded on the assumption that local authorities are compelled to take part in partnerships, but they are not—doing so is entirely voluntary. Has the chief executive in question contacted the Local Government Association, with which the policies were developed? The Lord Chancellor's Department received warm praise from the LGA for proposing local initiatives that are developed and delivered locally, not centrally. Surely the LGA knows what it is talking about, even if the hon. Gentleman does not.

Mr. Hawkins: In fact, the chief executive approached both the Department responsible for these policies—in other words, the Lord Chancellor's Department—and the Parliamentary Secretary personally. In his reply, the hon. Gentleman did not advance the argument that he has advanced this afternoon—but I shall let that pass. In any case, a local authority might suspect that it would not get unbiased opinions from an association led by supporters of the Government.

The chief executive's letter states that it is > the view of this Council that the Legal Aid system is a national system and, as such, should be funded entirely by the Government: it does not therefore recognise your statement that a local authority such as Surrey Heath Borough Council is a principal funder of legal services. Clearly this Council employs legal staff to deal with its own legal matters, but it has never—and may I say has no intention of so doing—considered the implementation of a public legal advice service, and, to my knowledge, I do not believe that any previous government administration ever envisaged that it should be incumbent on local authorities to provide such a service.

The proposals have been put to a local authority without any extra money being provided to that authority—or to any other—to implement them. The letter goes on to say:

> I have yet to hear from the Regional and Planning Partnership Manager with regard to the possibility of partnerships within the region.

I understand that that is still the case. The chief executive wrote to the Minister on 14 June and has yet to receive a reply. Perhaps that is because the points he made were so unanswerable that no answer could be given.

Before I conclude, I apologise to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and to the Parliamentary Secretary, for the fact that I might not be able to stay for the entire debate, although I hope to be here for most of it. I am sure that other Conservative Members whom I expect to join us later will have the opportunity to participate later in the debate.

I turn finally to the aspect of the Parliamentary Secretary's letter—it does not have his signature on it, but I assume that he must have authorised someone in his office to sign it in his name—that added insult to injury. The chief executive was outraged by the fact that it said that I—as Member of Parliament for that local authority area and for part of another local authority area—was the shadow Minister and suggested that the chief executive consult me for an explanation of the Government's policy. It is not incumbent on chief executives of local authorities to consult any Member of Parliament—they deal directly with Government Departments.

[Mr. Hawkins]

For the Parliamentary Secretary to attempt to score that kind of cheap political point in an official letter to the chief executive of a local authority is as unworthy of him as it would be of any Minister. It reveals the Government's bankruptcy of ideas. Their policies are in a mess—the professional organisations say so; they are not properly funded, and they will be a disaster.

3.8 pm

Mr. Keith Darvill (Upminster): Before commencing, I declare an interest as a practising solicitor in a firm of solicitors that participates in a local CLS partnership.

I welcome this debate. I supported the Second Reading of the Access to Justice Bill and was a member of the Standing Committee that considered it prior to its receiving Royal Assent last year. The legislation contained some difficult and tough measures, which were not popular. My view at the time and now is that the fact that the development of the CLS goes some way towards meeting the needs of vulnerable people in society compensates for the sacrifices made, especially in the provision of legal aid. Time will tell whether that judgment is correct.

We are at an important stage in the development of the CLS. It was launched in April this year with the aim of having the network of partnerships up and running in almost every area of England and Wales by the end of March 2002. That is a tough, but achievable, aim. In its recent report "The community legal service: access for all?" the Consumers Association said:

> The community legal service is one of the most important Government reforms of recent times. The stated aim of the reform—to help the most vulnerable in society—is a noble one, but the price of failure is great. The success or failure of these reforms will affect the ability of millions of the most vulnerable people in society to enforce and protect their rights.

The Consumers Association goes on to say that the CLS reforms will work only if major resources are committed to them. I broadly agree with that view.

The legal aid scheme and legislation introduced by the post-war reforming Labour Government in 1949 served the nation well until the 1990s, as did the legal aid and assistance, or green form, scheme. However, I doubt whether those provisions could have survived much longer. Inevitably, Treasury limitations and changes in society made legal aid unsustainable in the form it took prior to the Access to Justice Act 1999. The status quo did not provide access to justice for all, so improved access to justice was at the heart of the CLS. Hitherto there had been gaps in terms of coverage, inappropriate application of means testing and geography—my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary mentioned the "deserts". The 1999 Act provided a framework of provisions that potentially plugged many of those gaps and helped to fertilise the deserts. It provided a more co-ordinated approach to advice and assistance and ensured representation where appropriate. I use the word "potentially" because we have some way to go before the vision is realised. Today's debate is well timed, as local partnerships to deliver the CLS are being formed and steering committees across England and Wales are commencing their work.

In my area, the London borough of Havering, trading standards officers, representatives of local firms of solicitors and the voluntary sector and, chiefly, the citizens advice bureau have set up a CLS partnership which will be at the heart of the area's community legal service provision. It will bring together those who fund legal advice services, including the Legal Services Commission, the local authority, local and national charities and those who supply services such as lawyer and advice centres. The partnership will produce a strategic plan for the provision of services. There is considerable enthusiasm locally, and it is important that the Government recognise and encourage such enthusiasm whenever and wherever possible. I should be pleased to hear from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary about the steps that he is taking to nurture the enthusiasm of local partnerships. The steering group has begun the important mapping exercise to identify needs, which is to be used in producing the strategic plan.

I must flag up what I regard as potentially the most problematic issue: funding. When discussing the role of local authorities, the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) referred to the briefing that the Law Society has produced for this debate. It is unclear how local authorities are to play their role, and my area, Havering, provides an example of how difficulties can arise. The Havering citizens advice bureau is a registered charity—as most of them are—which is wholly dependent on the London borough of Havering for its core funding to provide the salaries of its three paid workers and the running costs of its offices at Hornchurch, Romford, Harold Hill and Rainham. The management committee, all of whose members are volunteers, has been informed that its grant for the whole of the service in Havering will be £109,380 for the year beginning 1 April 2000. For the past five years, the grant made by the council has been insufficient to meet costs in full, so the management committee has subsidised the shortfall from other income and reserves. Despite detailed and repeated representations to the local authority, the award of standstill funding has taken no account of the changes in service delivery and the increasing needs of clients.

In September 1999, the bureau introduced a 24-hour, seven days a week recorded telephone message system. It dealt with 11,000 calls in five months. In the year ending 31 March 1999, Havering citizens advice bureau dealt with 17,424 people and 29,559 problems, including issues relating to housing, debt, money, employment and discrimination. In London, in 1999, the average cost of an inquiry at a citizens advice bureau was £11; in Havering, the cost was £3.26. Havering council has paid less than 50p per person per year for a service that is freely available to all who live and work in the borough. The statistics help to underline the importance of the local service. The number of calls handled and the efficient way in which the service is provided mean that it is well regarded throughout the borough, by my constituents and people in surrounding constituencies.

Despite that, the future of the service remains uncertain, because of Havering council's poor financial settlement under the standard spending assessment formula. I know that we are not debating local government finance, but if we expect local authorities to play an important role in the provision of the service, we must acknowledge that standard spending assessments are relevant. The borough council has adopted the Government's modernisation programme and ensured that all the schools in its area are properly funded, in accordance with its standard spending assessment for education. The council, regrettably, has had to increase the council tax by 8 per cent. in the past two years, while having to reduce spending in other important areas, such as the provision of elderly people's homes. The borough council, despite embracing the measures wholeheartedly, finds it difficult to maintain the core funding of the citizens advice bureau. The Government should be aware of that.

I am wholly in favour of the CLS, and I know the local partners in my area. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Surrey Heath says, many voluntary and professional organisations, including private practice solicitors, want the service to succeed. None the less, local authorities play an important role, especially in respect of funding, so we should be aware that they will find it increasingly difficult to do so if they have to work with reduced finances.

Let me change the subject slightly to insurance, which could play an innovative role in support of the CLS and to which I referred on Second Reading of the Access to Justice Bill. Legal service insurance cover could be expanded significantly to help to bridge the gaps in cover. Work is being done at a national level.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I keep hearing from people in private practice who do legal aid work that some insurance companies draft their conditions in such a way that they drive the litigation and the client and the lawyer are mere adjuncts. How does the hon. Gentleman propose to cure that particular deficiency?

Mr. Darvill: The hon. Gentleman makes a relevant point. That is why the Government and the CLS should engage at a national level with the insurance industry to ensure that the small print of insurance cover meets relevant needs. Additionally, I want to develop a service that I call a health check, which could be carried out in conjunction with the information technology industry and insurance companies. Citizens advice bureaux would have a computer facility that allowed members of the public to input information about their insurance cover, and the software would give them information about the extent of that cover. In short, there are two ways to deal with the hon. Gentleman's point: first, at a national level, the Government and the CLS can work with the industry, and, secondly, people should be able to go into a citizens advice bureau or a solicitor's office for the health check that I describe. Different people—those who travel abroad, own property or engage in business—have different insurance cover demands. There is no reason why programmes should not be developed that can provide individual health checks. Indeed, there could be advantages in that approach, which would ensure better cover nationwide.

The relevant legislation on, and the Government's policies towards, the co-ordination of cover at a local level are right. I have received the draft report from the CLS in my area, which was developed in conjunction with a long list of service providers, including Age Concern, the Alcohol Advisory Service and many others. My experience as a solicitor and, since entering the House, as a Member of Parliament, shows me that individuals can go to various providers of information, although there is often duplication. The Government have stated the honourable aim of helping to co-ordinate different approaches, which should ensure that relevant cover is available locally and enable more efficient use of resources.

I am disappointed that not more hon. Members are present in the Chamber to participate in this debate. We should monitor the extent to which local partnerships are developing across the country. There is much support for the service, but we want the service to benefit all of our constituents. In my view, hon. Members are uniquely aware, through their advice surgeries and their contacts with the community, of individuals' need for advice and assistance. Their unique experience could help to ensure that the service works. We should have frequent—perhaps annual—debates on the subject; that would ensure that it was monitored by the House. If we did that and worked with the CLS, I am sure that the service would be a success.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I am pleased to speak in this debate. Unlike all the hon. Members who have spoken before me, I am not a qualified lawyer, but I am the chair of Slough, Windsor and Maidenhead CLS partnership. It has been a privilege to work with all of the partners in that group, which seeks to improve the quality of legal advice and assistance that is provided in the community that I serve and in neighbouring communities.

The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) raised the question of what can be done to encourage local authorities that are not particularly active in improving the quality of their advice services. Our partnership provides an example of what can be done. The hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Trend) had discussed with me the lack of free advice services in his constituency, so I persuaded our partnership to invite Windsor and Maidenhead to join us in discussing certain steps that we had taken to improve the quality of advice services in Slough. I am glad to say that Windsor and Maidenhead have become partners and are taking up that challenge. I believe that the quality of advice services in the Windsor constituency will improve in the long term.

I took on the role in the local CLS partnership because of my deep concern about access to legal advice—indeed, to all forms of advice—in the multiracial, multilingual constituency that I serve. I am struck by the contrast between the quality of legal advice and assistance that my constituents routinely experience, and that provided in the London constituency that I once represented at local council level. The single most important issue in respect of which my constituents seek my help is immigration, and many of them ask me to help them to unravel problems caused by the giving of, to be frank, very bad advice. Such advice is sometimes given by qualified lawyers and sometimes by agents who represent themselves as lawyers.

An urgent priority for our partnership was to improve the quality of legal advice on immigration available locally. I have learned over a long period that a legal qualification is not necessarily a guarantee of good-quality knowledge and advice on a particular issue. As I said, I have no legal qualifications, but I remember vividly an experience I had in the early 1980s, when I was general secretary of the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants. I received a telephone call from a high street solicitor, who said, "I've got someone sitting in front of me who wants his wife to come and join him in Britain, but I can't find any reference to such a circumstance in the Immigration Act 1971." When I said, "You need to look at the immigration rules", his response was to ask, "Immigration rules? What are they?" I asked, "Do you think that you should be advising this person?", to which his reply was, "I'm a solicitor, why shouldn't I?"

I do not think that that solicitor should have advised that person. Because the inquiry was not particularly complicated and because he was legally qualified, he felt that he was qualified to give advice—but he was not. One aspect of the CLS partnerships that I welcome especially warmly is that they are based on quality standards and the principle that those who do not know their stuff do not get funding, even if they are lawyers. That is a radical and important change, which will ensure that people get better quality legal advice.

In the concordat that forms the basis of the partnership in Slough, Windsor and Maidenhead, the core vision is of a network of good quality legal and advice services. Many are already of good quality, but improvements can be made, for example, we can use quality standards as a way to unite and improve the quality of different types of service. Moreover, we can invest more in training of all kinds for groups who provide legal advice and assistance—citizens advice bureaux and voluntary groups, as well as lawyers.

The second point in our concordat is that the quality partnership should be supported by co-ordinated funding, and I want to make a plea in that respect. One big problem facing voluntary organisations that give advice and assistance is the number of different masters whom they have to please and the number of different auditing mechanisms, quality assurance standards and reporting methods that they have to adhere to. A real priority must be to obtain agreement on common standards between the Lord Chancellor's Department, local authorities, charities and the national lottery organisations. We can immediately and enormously increase the volume of advice that voluntary organisations give if they have only to meet one set of standards. The big challenge facing our partnership is to ensure that we move faster towards that single standard, so that everyone is asked to jump through the same set of hoops. At the moment, people are asked to jump through one set of hoops on Monday and another set on Tuesday, and then someone tells them that they should be in a different financial year anyway. We must make a priority of changing that.

The third bullet point in our concordat is to deliver services to local communities. That was what motivated me to become chair of our partnership: I could see that there were little centres of good advice in Slough about which some people did not know. Also, many people had legal problems but did not know that they were legal problems: because they had no idea that their housing difficulty, for example, could be tackled effectively by good legal advice, they did not seek such advice. Many people thought lawyers were frightening and expensive, and not for the likes of them. I want a CLS in which no one thinks in that way, and through which everyone thinks that they have a right to help.

When seeking that help in a constituency such as Slough, the first port of call is probably not the high street solicitor, but a church, mosque or residents association. People turn to those to whom they talk daily and who might have practice of dealing with lawyers, whom they believe to be frightening and expensive. Such intermediaries might speak their language better and can help people to reach the point at which they can get a qualified advocate. One of the visions of our CLS partnership is to draw in that network of people in and make them feel included. Small voluntary and community groups all have copies of our referral handbook, and some have entries in it because they are knowledgeable. The Pakistan welfare association knows the language of some of my constituents, whereas few solicitors in private practice do. We need to set up a partnership in which that association can know where its competence ends and when it should refer cases on. Part of the purpose of the handbook is to help people to know their limits.

If we achieve our aims, that will make the delivery of better quality legal advice cheaper. Fewer people will barge into a solicitor's office if they know that the unemployed workers centre or the Pakistan welfare association can deal with their problems. More people will receive advice more economically, thus enabling us to invest in creating a referral system that ensure that, for example, the people who need judicial review of their immigration case have someone who can represent their case excellently. That might lead to some improvements in our immigration law and administration. Also, we could invest in extending the availability of advice. We need to create mechanisms whereby referral works well.

As part of the launch of our CLS partnership, we carried out an interesting survey of private and voluntary agencies in Slough. The survey found that several concerns were shared equally between solicitors in private practice and voluntary advice givers. The great advantage of that survey was that people gained a greater awareness of each other's roles. Claire Fitzgerald said at our launch:

> Clients come to solicitors for advice and are taken on and sometimes there is no real expertise in the practice to deal with the particular case, so it is handed to a junior member of staff. Solicitors and the voluntary sector must work hand in hand to try to establish the best way forward for a client. They should not worry about referring a client on either way. There should be trust between the private and voluntary sectors.

Creating a partnership is the first step in creating that trust.

Access is another important issue. Solicitors in Slough tend to be concentrated in the centre of the town, as do the voluntary advice services, but the people who need advice are often those who find travel difficult and whose mobility is restricted. There are no advice centres in the estates on the outskirts of Slough. I, as the Member of Parliament, am one of the few people who goes around the town and provides an advice service to deprived communities.

One of the groups within the partnership is the unemployed workers centre. The National Lottery Charities Board has funded the centre to carry out an access project: run by Keith Spencer, it is designed to deliver basic benefits and other elements of welfare advice to people in their homes. That is the beginning of an expanding partnership and network. Through the partnership, other people are getting to know about Keith's services and are getting him to help those of their clients who cannot travel to the centre of town. We are beginning to improve the delivery services to local communities.

Mr. Burnett: Without wanting to put words into her mouth, I ask the hon. Lady whether she will be interested to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary about the progress that has been made in giving franchises to the not-for-profit sector.

Fiona Mactaggart: In my constituency, it is difficult to identify or develop good quality not-for-profit immigration advice, just as it is in the private sector. However, I think that we should treat all kinds of advice centres equally, whether they are solicitors, or advice agencies in the not-for-profit sector, or community organisations. If they meet quality standards, they should have access to funds, not only through franchises but, by meeting those standards, through local authorities. I should be interested in hearing about the progress that is being made, and it is possible that it is not happening fast enough. However, I am glad that we are taking steps down that road. Let us continue to do so.

The fourth point in our partnership's concordat is that the CLS should be in accordance with an effective assessment of local needs. That is the bit of the challenge that we have found most difficult to get right. Legal advice services in Britain have traditionally been provided according to where lawyers want to set up their business, or where voluntary organisations are established—services have been producer-led, which is a problem, because the best services are needs-led. Huge needs are hidden in a constituency such as mine, because people do not know that they need legal advice; they know that they have a problem, but not who can help them to tackle it.

One of the challenges that CLS partnerships face is reaching the sort of organisations to which I have talked, such as churches, mosques, residents associations and so on, and ensuring that they have a clearer awareness of what constitutes a legal problem and when someone needs legal advice so that they can more clearly express local needs. I hope to hear imaginative ways of doing that, because unless the CLS reaches those people, it will not have met the challenge.

On balance, it is right not to throw out the baby with the bath water by saying, "We will have a national legal service in the way that we have a national health service." Instead, we must say, "Let us improve quality by building partnerships with existing voluntary and private organisations and with bodies such as local councils which give quasi-legal advice to residents." However, to achieve that objective, we need to challenge all those providers to improve their act, to reach the parts that they are not reaching, to meet quality standards and to challenge other bodies that are not even thinking along such lines—for example, libraries—to ensure that people know whether their problem is a legal one and, if it is, where to go for help. The referrals handbook that I mentioned is available in Slough libraries, as well as in the other kinds of organisations to which I have referred.

We also need to ensure that people whose first language is not English get access to good quality legal services. I hope that that issue will be addressed. At present, there are often problems in funding interpretation services for people who need legal advice. The CLS cannot tackle all the problems in the first year of its existence, but that one must be tackled, because an inability to speak good English is a real barrier to access to good quality advice.

I am glad that quite a lot has already been done. I thank all the partners in the Slough CLS; they have begun to make it work. They have collaborated in ways that they did not at first think possible—they have met each other for a start, which in some cases is a great leap forward. They have enjoyed the experience of learning what the others do and are beginning to trust each other. We all need to find ways of reinforcing that trust because, unless it is properly developed, two-way referral will not occur and solicitors will not say to Age Concern, "This client would be better served by talking to you than by my taking up the case."

There is more work to do and there is a real challenge—the biggest challenge of all, which is to make sure that we create a legal advice service that makes it clear to people who have never had access to legal advice that they have a right to good advice; and we must deliver good advice, for until we do that, we fail those people. Focusing on how much money solicitors in private practice earn out of giving legal advice, as debates such as this always seem to do, is the wrong approach, because it implies that producers can determine the shape of the system. We need a new system in which consumers decide what kind of system we have. If we achieve that, we will truly have a national legal advice service.

Mr. Lock: I am grateful for the permission of the Chamber to speak again. I shall be brief in closing what has been an interesting but reasonably short debate.

In answer to the observations of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), I can only express great disappointment that, having sat through the debate for so long and having heard so much, he has so little understanding of what we are trying to do. That was brought home to me by the letter that I received from the chief executive to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, who said that the council was proud to fund the citizens advice bureau. He went on to say that the council did not > recognise your statement that a local authority such as Surrey Heath Borough Council is a principal funder of legal services.

That is the issue. My hon. Friends the Members for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) and for Upminster (Mr. Darvill) spoke of the superb work of CABs and a variety of other organisations in the not-for-profit sector. If those organisations are telling someone whether he is entitled to benefits, they are delivering legal services. If they are telling someone whether he has a claim for unfair dismissal in an employment case or whether that person is entitled to a jobseeker's allowance, they are delivering legal services.

We must recognise that the monopoly that lawyers thought that they had in delivering legal advice and assistance does not prevail on the ground. When local authorities fund CABs, the valuable services that they are funding are legal services and they are not any less legal because they are provided by people who do not have magic letters after their names to show that they are formally qualified lawyers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Slough illustrated in an eloquent and accurate example, lawyers are often not the best people to deliver such advice anyway, but local authorities are funders of legal services.

Mr. Hawkins: The Minister does not have to take my word for it, because I wrote down carefully what the hon. Member for Upminster said in a measured and helpful contribution to the debate, which was:

> It is unclear how local authorities will play that role.

He was referring to the funding role and pointed out that the grant from his local authority was insufficient to fund the citizens advice bureau in Havering. That is the problem. The Minister's policy is not working on the ground. Problems are arising in various areas of the country, as I have made clear.

Mr. Lock: The hon. Gentleman does not understand the system. It is discretionary for local authorities to fund CABs. It always has been. The Government have no proposals to change that. We want to ensure that when local authorities fund advice services, they do so in a way that makes sense, given the other funders in the area. I am proud that as a result of the CLS 330 not-for-profit agencies have now been awarded the quality mark.

Mr. Hawkins: Where is the money?

Mr. Lock: The funding for the not-for-profit sector, including CABs, has risen from its record level last year of £11 million from the Legal Services Commission to £29 million this year—an increase of 270 per cent. Yet the hon. Gentleman asks, "Where is the money?" An increase of 270 per cent. in funding in one year for the delivery of extra quality-marked services is a significant step in the right direction. I repeat that it is disappointing that, after having heard so much and listened so long, the honourable Gentleman has so little understanding of the way in which we will deliver important legal services to those who really need them.

Most lawyers, including those in the not-for-profit sector, working under legal aid are not fat cats, and I would not dream of suggesting that they are; nor did I. They deliver quality services for a reasonable return. However, the obligation on a Government Department is to secure value for money in the services that it purchases. Throughout the country we have a full coverage of services, with the exception of one or two problems in immigration, which we are working hard to solve. The prediction that lawyers would not sign up for contracts at the rates that we were prepared to pay has proved incorrect. For example, family services are provided in all legal aid bid zones.

Hon. Members will no doubt say that family problems tend to come in at least twos, if not threes. I am, therefore, pleased to say that 98 per cent. of bid zones have at least two firms of solicitors under contract providing quality services. However, we will not contract for the provision of services with lawyers whose only expertise is the fact that at some point in the distant past they passed a law examination and their Law Society finals. The problems involved are too complex and important to be left to the dabblers. We shall contract with firms that have a quality standard, so that we know that the services being provided are quality services, and we shall pay the amount necessary to secure those services. If we paid more, we would help fewer people.

I am grateful for the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster, whose analysis of circumstances in his area was extremely interesting. I assure him that I have taken careful note of the differences in the cost of provision of advice in Havering compared with the rest of London. It is interesting to compare the cost of provision of benefit or debt advice through the not-for-profit sector and the traditional green form scheme for lawyers, and to ask which is the best way of procuring that advice, whether we can be sure of quality standards and whether it is right to pay anything up to 10 or 15 times more merely because the advice is provided by a qualified lawyer. Although it may occasionally be right to do so, we have a general duty to secure best value.

Mr. Darvill: I am interested in the point that the Parliamentary Secretary makes. Will his Department ensure that such an analysis is made, especially in identifying good practice? If necessary, will representations be made throughout the Government to ensure that, for example, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is aware when local authorities and citizens advice bureaux are not providing that best value?

Mr. Lock: Yes, that research is being done and the results will be published. I shall ensure that my colleagues in the Government are aware of the benchmark figures that we extract from the research to show the appropriate levels of payment and the return in different areas. In both the not-for-profit and the for profit sectors, some firms and providers are much more efficient at providing quality services than others. As public money is involved, it is important that those who say that they cannot deliver the service for a particular price should look in the first instance at other providers, firms of solicitors and not-for-profit operators that can work within those budget lines and produce a quality service, and learn from best practice elsewhere.

I shall make a few observations on my hon. Friend's comments on insurance. He is right to say that both before-the-event and after-the-event insurance play a significant role. A significant problem is that, although many people have legal expenses insurance with their household insurance, when they have a problem they are not aware that the £10 or £12 a year tacked on at the end of their insurance form, which they signed a long time ago, can be the gateway to the help that they need, rather than it being provided by the public purse through a lawyer of their choice. People have that right under a European directive. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point because it is important to make people aware that they may already have insurance. Millions of people do. We must publicise that fact and ensure that lawyers ask their clients the right questions to ascertain whether those clients already have cover. Ultimately, the points made by the hon. Member for Upminster about a vibrant insurance market are right. As in other areas, the quality of service and number of restrictions in legal expenses insurance will be sorted out by the market and pressure from the Government. We should make sure that the insurance industry delivers services in a way that is suitable for the consumer.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Slough on her work in CLS partnership in her area. She has worked through the process and has understood, from long experience, why what we are delivering is so important. It focuses on unmet need—people who would never dream of consulting a firm of solicitors but are greatly in need of legal advice. She recognises the consequences of not delivering that advice, not providing such pathways out of social exclusion and not allowing people to get the most out of their lives because of what holds them back. That is key to the Government's attempt to tackle social exclusion and create opportunity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Slough referred to the importance of having only one quality standard. I entirely agree with her. The quality mark produced by the CLS should be the benchmark, whether it is a local authority seeking to satisfy itself that it is funding a citizens advice bureau under a best value regime, whether it is the National Lottery Charities Board or whether it is the CAB. Whatever organisation is seeking to deliver services through the CLS, that should be the core quality standard to which they should be required to work by any funder within the CLS. A single quality standard will ensure that one year will not end on a Monday for one funder while a second year ends on a Tuesday for a different funder. Similarly, there will not be one type of working and set of goals, objectives and key performance indicators for one funder and a totally different set for another. I hope that all funders will recognise that more of their money will go to providing services and less to carrying out administration if they are prepared to trust the quality mark as the single indicator of quality services. That will allow organisations to work in accordance with a single set of coherent policies. I assure my hon. Friend that that is beginning to happen.

My hon. Friend is right about translation services. As part of the invest-to-save budget, the CLS website "Just Ask!" is in the process of translating the CAB advice guide. Therefore, valuable practical advice on benefits, housing and employment, including detailed legal advice, will be available in the six most used United Kingdom community languages. I am sure that that will be useful in her constituency for those advisers who are able to access the net.

My hon. Friend the Member for Slough challenged me to find imaginative ways of reaching communities to identify priority areas of unmet legal need. I shall give two examples of what is happening. In Newcastle, the Legal Services Commission is funding an immigration co-ordinator to work with advice agencies to help asylum seekers to obtain the right advice from the right person, where there is capacity and firms are able to deal with cases, and to ensure that the referral system works properly. In that way, help can be co-ordinated so that asylum seekers receive the advice they need from someone who can provide them with the quality of advice which they are entitled to expect.

In Liverpool, debt advisers are working in GP surgeries through the CLS partnership. GPs identified the need for their elderly patients to maximise their income so that they can turn up the heating and have a better quality of life. Many elderly people who would not have gone to the citizens advice bureau with cap in hand to ask for benefits advice to improve their income can now obtain that advice in their GPs' surgeries which they visit anyway. That is good for GPs, the advice comes from the citizens advice bureau and is of high quality, and the service is of real benefit to Liverpool's elderly citizens who can take advantage of services in a way that they would not have done previously.

This has been a short, but an interesting debate. It has shown how the Government's policies on development of community legal services are working. Developing networks and delivering the services that are needed in each community will take a generation, not 12 months. This is a long-term process and a change of culture, but the Legal Services Commission has made an impressive start. The development of partnerships throughout the country is changing the way in which services are being commissioned and delivered. I am grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Upminster and for Slough who have given such strong support for the initiative and have brought experiences from their communities to help us in our debate this afternoon.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Land Settlement Association

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

10 am

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to open this debate on the problems of the former tenants of the Land Settlement Association. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury is aware of the long-standing taxation problems faced by those former tenants. Their circumstances are unusual and perhaps even unique in tax terms, and, unfortunately, the discussions that myself and parliamentary colleagues, several of whom are present, have had with the authorities on their behalf have run into the sand. I am, therefore, glad to have the opportunity to raise the matter in some detail in Parliament.

As a matter of background, I inform hon. Members that the land settlement schemes were originally set up in the 1930s in different parts of the country, including my constituency of North-East Bedfordshire, to provide a home and four or five acres of land on which unemployed people could earn their living. There are settlements in about 20 parliamentary constituencies throughout the country. Unfortunately, the scheme ran into serious trouble in the 1970s. It was badly managed and the tenants were obliged to buy their seeds, fertilisers and other essentials through the scheme and to sell their produce to it. The scheme was run by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Foods, and was supposed to arrange cropping and market the produce. In practice, however, it was inefficiently managed, and the tenants and their families worked long, back-breaking hours for minimal rewards. They were often heavily in debt to the scheme, which was failing them at every turn.

In 1981, the decision was taken, rightly, to close it down. However, that left many tenants without jobs and potentially without homes. Eventually, most of them banded together to sue the Ministry. The claim was made under two headings. First, they claimed the loss of the earnings or profits that they should have made but did not. Secondly, they submitted a general damages claim for distress and anxiety, to compensate them for the acute hardships that they had suffered over so many years. Fortunately, most of them were entitled to legal aid and eventually, in the early 1990s, a settlement was reached. Overall, they settled for £7 million, to be divided between some 300 to 400 families. That represented about 25 per cent. of their formal monetary claim, leaving aside their important general damages claim for distress and anxiety——I use the words in which the claim was legally drafted. The average payment received by a tenant seems to have been about £20,000 to £25,000. That is no more, and perhaps less, than they could have expected to receive on their hardship claim alone. Such general damages claims are exempt from taxation.

At the time of the settlement, the then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who hopes to join us this morning, was given to understand that the settlement would not be taxable in the tenants' hands, as he has been good enough to explain publicly. The tenants were also so advised by their Queen's counsel at the time, albeit that his particular reasons for advising them that their settlement would not be taxable were incorrect in tax law.

Nearly all the tenants used their modest damages to help purchase the homes in which they lived. Most of them are now in their 70s, with few or no assets other than those homes and little or no income other than their state retirement pensions. The problem in their lives is the spectre of a tax bill that most of them do not know how they could pay. They are tired and frightened. Some of them have already sold up and moved away, hoping to avoid being chased for tax that they could have paid only by selling their sole home or by incurring a heavy charge against its value.

The problem on which we ask Ministers to focus, in consultation with their senior officials in the Inland Revenue, is that the tax burden as administered bears unduly harshly on the tenants. The established tax rule, which was laid down in a commercial tax case a considerable time ago—40 or 50 years—says that a claim for loss of profits over many years must none the less be treated as taxable in the year in which compensation is received. That is usually fair for a normal trading corporation, which can generally mitigate the effects by writing down plant and machinery, finding other offsets to mitigate the tax charge or by spreading the cost over future years. However, most of the tenants had no business to continue and, if they did, it was so poor that they were usually paying little or no tax. Many of them had had their businesses closed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the scheme came to an end. Whereas in the ordinary course of events little or no tax would probably have been payable on the modest profits that they lost in each of the eight or so previous years, they now face something like a 25 per cent. tax burden on their damages.

A solution is available, if only the Inland Revenue could be persuaded to permit it, without forcing those impecunious tenants through the courts. It is well established, and common ground with the Revenue, that compensation relating to hardship claims—as theirs did—is not taxable. The Revenue has long made it clear that, provided that the tenants pay up the other half of their claim, it is prepared to treat 50 per cent. of the compensation as non-taxable. I welcome that, although I do not welcome the fact that the offer is held as a sword of Damocles over the tenants, which may be used if they seek to press their claim further. This country should not be administered in that way. I hope that the Revenue will take that point to heart.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I pay tribute to the way in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has led the campaign with great perseverance and skill. He has many hon. Members behind him. Does he agree that the fair and tax-efficient apportionment of damages is invariably agreed between parties at arm's length?

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point because, as I will seek to explain, the matter could have been organised at the outset so that we and the tenants were not troubled.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): I wonder whether my right hon. and learned Friend will take this point from me, as the Minister responsible at the time. There was no doubt in my mind or in the minds of the officials who advised me that the money was in no sense to be taxable. There was no question of that because it was seen as an ex-gratia payment, not for specific profits and the like, but because the LSA had been run appallingly and people's lives had been destroyed, simply because the Government—Governments of both parties—had failed to look after them as promised. We therefore always treated it as a non-taxable payment. This argument took place afterwards; had we known then, we would have made perfectly sure that the payment was not taxable. The Inland Revenue is reading back into circumstances matters that did not then exist. The sad thing is that successive Governments have failed to live up to their responsibility and to say that, if it is taxable—if the Inland Revenue will not listen—they should make a further payment to ensure that the tax is covered entirely.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend. He makes a crucial point, which the Revenue and Ministers ought to take into account. It was an ex-gratia settlement; to divide it artificially into taxable and non-taxable parts to the disbenefit of the former tenants is not necessary.

My right hon. Friend also makes the excellent point that it is not a party political matter. There is all-party support for the case that I make today. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) represents about 40 tenants, and I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that she will catch your eye. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. Members for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) and for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) will speak for the Liberal Democrats. My hon. Friends the Members for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal are all concerned about the matter, as is my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who has to be in Scotland on public defence business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: After that distinguished roll-call, it seems almost churlish not to have mentioned the Minister's parliamentary private secretary.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am most grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that all hon. Members will row in behind us, which is the object of the debate.

Before I was so helpfully interrupted, I was saying that a solution was available if only the Inland Revenue could be persuaded to permit it without forcing those impecunious tenants through the courts. In so far as their compensation relates to their hardship claim, it is not taxable.

My question to the authorities is why the compensation should not all be treated as a hardship claim—at least to £25,000, which would cover the position of most tenants. I feel confident in saying that the general damages that a court might award for the sort of hardship suffered by those people for so many years would be at least £25,000; it might be substantially more. If this matter had been thought about correctly in the early 1990s when the settlement was reached, it could easily have been structured to do that.

Furthermore, there is no law to say that the Revenue cannot so treat it now; previous cases put no impediment in its way. No case that raises that precise issue has come before the courts. Case law is simply that such decisions must not be a sham. Payments cannot be treated as non-taxable if, in reality, they are made only as compensation for loss of profit. However, those payments were clearly claimed on the twin bases of general damages, which are untaxable, and damages for loss of profit, which are potentially taxable. As the total amount paid out would not exceed what could reasonably be attributed to the non-taxable proportion, I submit that that would be the fair way to do it.

To be fair to the Inland Revenue, this is, to some extent, a grey area. I have had a number of detailed conversations with its officials over the years and we reached the point at which they argued not that it could not be done but that it had never been done by the Revenue in such a way. The officials and I agreed that the matter should be taken to Ministers who, unfortunately, have persistently ducked, or been persuaded to duck, the issue. First, they have said that they are not allowed to get involved in individual cases because that is for the Revenue alone. Secondly, they have said that if the tenants wish to press their case, they must take it to the special Commissioners of the Inland Revenue.

I ask Ministers and their senior officials to think again. They know perfectly well that the tenants have no money to bring court cases and that legal aid is not available for cases that go before the special commissioners. There is no great issue of precedent because the situation of the LSA tenants must be virtually unique. The amount of tax involved in public terms is not large. The total, apart from interest, is probably no more than £1.5 million divided between the few hundred tenants. The problem is, however, that that represents many thousands of pounds for each tenant, which they have not got. There is also the difficulty of interest. That, too, is artificial. The former tenants have sunk their compensation into their homes and have no pot of money that is earning interest. Indeed, had they not invested in their homes, they would almost certainly have been drawing housing benefit for many years.

There is a way ahead. It is said that when the long-running litigation with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was drawn to Mrs. Thatcher's attention, she simply ordered it to be sorted out and at least a settlement was reached. However, it is a pity that the settlement did not wrap up the overall tax position as it so easily could have done. The Revenue has argued that all the points must be > fair to the general body of taxpayers.

That is not really so. If the question of tax had been properly considered at the time of the settlement, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food could have agreed to attribute most, if not all, the settlement to the distress and anxiety factors.

Let me put in a word for the Revenue. It has tried to help with the debts forgone aspect, which affects a few of the tenants. We are grateful for that, but there is no rule to say that the two portions of the claim—the distress and anxiety factors and the loss of property factors—have to be split 50:50. The Revenue always has a wide discretion over interest.

In summary, this is a long and unhappy saga in which 300 to 400 families of modest means have been badly treated by Governments over the years. They are continuing to suffer great anxieties eight years after they reached what they thought was a final settlement. Ministers and the Inland Revenue have ample discretion to treat them fairly. Their tax burden should be kept to a minimum and they should be allowed to live out their lives in their own homes free from anxiety. I very much hope that the Minister will be able to say enough to show that there is a will to achieve this and that a way will be found to bring it about.

10.18 am

Mrs. Diana Organ (Forest of Dean): I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) for securing the debate on the Land Settlement Association. I pay tribute to his tireless campaign on behalf of ex-LSA tenants. It is interesting that I am probably the only Labour Member who intends to contribute to the debate. This is not a party political issue. We are all concerned about the history of the case and the way in which the ex-tenants have been treated by various Governments over many years.

The issues raised this morning are a source of considerable anxiety, hardship and distress to several of my constituents and their families in the Forest of Dean—hard-working growers who pay their taxes appropriately, but find the pressure from the Inland Revenue very disturbing. In the Scarr area of Newent, there were 40 ex-Land Settlement Association tenants. Unfortunately, since the compensation was agreed and the dispute began in 1991, five of those tenants have died. The Inland Revenue has agreed to put a temporary hold on collecting the tax as a result of the dispute about tax liability on the compensation. That has real implications for the widows and next of kin of the growers, because they cannot fully wind up the estates of those ex-tenants.

Now is the time for the question to be fairly settled. In my constituency, the case for the ex-tenants has been staunchly put by Mr. Duncan Reed of Newent on behalf of the other growers. I was first made aware of the problem within three weeks of my election in May 1997. Following correspondence and meetings with Mr. Reed and other ex-tenants, Treasury Ministers suggested in correspondence that the group should present individual cases to the Newent division of the General Commissioner of the Inland Revenue, an independent tribunal. That option was offered to the Newent growers five years ago, but was rejected.

Mr. Gummer: I wonder whether the hon. Lady would accept that it was not intended that those circumstances should arise. By saying that those people should go to the independent commissioner, the Government are avoiding their responsibility, because, in terms of the tax advice that they gave, the Government got it wrong in the first place. Therefore, they should not ask people to appeal; they should put it right. Would not the newspapers be appalled if a private company or organisation had got it wrong, but refused to do the decent thing by way of compensation?

Mrs. Organ: The right hon. Gentleman is right. The episode was bungled by politicians and must be put right by politicians, not by the General Commissioners. I have sympathy with the Newent group's decision to reject that option because, as we all agree, the episode was bungled through the incompetence of previous Governments. It should be put right by politicians.

According to my constituents in Newent, the scheme was poorly run, poorly managed, inefficiently marketed and wasteful. Growers worked for long hours with very little return. The closure came in the early 1980s. Again, questions were asked about the management and legality of the procedures taken with regard to closure. Closure meant that the growers had to band together with very few resources and sue the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. No consideration was given to the legal consequences or the suffering of tenants that would flow from the decision. The ex-tenants and I feel that, as the previous Government caused that unfortunate situation through their incompetence, the issue should be resolved by politicians, rather than by the Inland Revenue and the independent appeals commissioner, who adjudicates in normal tax disputes. This is not a normal tax dispute; it is a unique situation.

The argument of the Newent ex-tenants is clear and, I believe, wholly justified. When the scheme was wound up, they were given compensation of about £20,000 to £25,000 on average. That hardly covered their general damages claim, which was non-taxable. It is absolutely clear that the then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), intended and believed that the settlement would not be taxable. He has made that quite clear publicly, especially in his letter of 25 January 1997 to Sir Anthony Battishill, chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, in which he said:

> it was quite clearly Ministers' intention at the time of the settlement that the out-of-court payments were intended to compensate the ex-tenants of the LSA for personal hardship caused by their association with the LSA. It was not, therefore, intended as taxable compensation for loss of earnings.

The letter also states that > it was Ministers' intention that the overall settlement was intended to compensate the ex-tenants for personal hardship and not for pecuniary loss.

It seems that the whole scheme—including the running of it, the closure of it, the settlement of it and the tax liability dispute—has been a fiasco. The Tory Administration from 1979 to 1997 never properly managed it or sorted out its problems, and they managed the whole affair incompetently. MAFF and the Treasury never sorted the matter out between them. Ministers did not make their intentions clear and give direction.

I realise that the intentions of MAFF Ministers do not normally count in determining tax treatment for out-of-court settlements, but the matter should have been sorted out by the Department and the then Government. However, the growers believed that it had been sorted out. They believed that the intention expressed to them by the then Minister meant that they were entitled to non-taxable compensation. Meanwhile, the growers of Newent, represented, as I said, by Mr. Duncan Reed, suffered hardship and anxiety. They struggled with the poor and inefficient running of the scheme and had to fight their case over the inept closure with poor resources. They are not young, and suffered terrible anxiety and personal hardship. That has been an extra burden. Many of those people are now in their 60s and 70s. They have had to use their modest damages to help purchase their homes—otherwise they would have been virtually homeless—and they have been frightened by the pressure on them from the Inland Revenue. That is no way to treat the ex-growers. They have little else by way of assets or income with which to fight the case and the whole bungled affair is a recurring nightmare for them. We must put an end to the nightmare for my constituents.

The previous Government created the mess and the present Government need to sort it out fairly, justly, humanely and sympathetically. I ask the Minister not to suggest that taking the case to the General Commissioners of the independent tribunal would be the best way forward. We went round that loop five years ago and it did not resolve the issue for the people concerned. We should be giving them what is rightfully theirs. The compensation for hardship should be tax-free. The spirit, intention, understanding and reality in which the compensation was given was that it was not for the restriction of trading opportunities but for the personal hardship that they suffered and for the capital lo[illegible]n that case the ex-tenants of the LSA in the Scarr area of Newent are not liable to tax on their compensation. We need to resolve the issue for them now.

10.27 am

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): This issue has been on my desk, Mr. Deputy Speaker, ever since I have represented my constituency.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I am not the Deputy Speaker, and I should be addressed by name.

Mr. Paice: I apologise, Mr. O'Hara.

I have been aware of this issue since becoming the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire in 1987. I then had two of the former LSA estates in my constituency—Great Abington and Fen Drayton, which, since the boundary changes at the last election has become the responsibility of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) will recall that I was his parliamentary private secretary when the case was settled. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs Organ) waxed lyrical about how the previous Government messed everything up. It is worth pointing out, if we are going to make partisan points, that it was the Labour Government in the 1970s who caused the problem by messing up the way the whole thing was run. However, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) said, the issue is not really partisan. It is a matter that goes across all parties.

Mr. Gummer: Before my hon. Friend moves on, will he dwell on that point? The LSA was appallingly run and the fault of that lies with all parties. The Labour party did not even bother to put it right. It was badly run and the way in which people were treated was almost slavery because they were tied in. They owed so much money that they could not get out. We understood that, which was why we tried to put matters right by winding up the scheme and paying compensation, not for loss of earnings or anything else, but for the way in which our fellow citizens had been treated.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. The right hon. Gentleman's intervention is becoming a speech.

Mr. Gummer: May I just ask whether my hon. Friend accepts that, at all points, we believed that the money would be without tax. If we had not believed that, we would have operated matters differently. Such people should not suffer.

Mr. Paice: My right hon. Friend is right. That is my recollection of the discussions at which he allowed me to be present. He was also right to refer to the shambolic way in which the LSA was run prior to the decision by Lord Walker of Worcester to abolish it soon after the Conservatives took office in 1979 because of the condition of the estate. It is worth emphasising that the tenants had no say in how the estate was run. I checked that fact this morning with the leader of the group of tenants on Abington estate in my constituency. The entire scheme was operated by Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food employees. I shall not get into the usual arguments about civil servants running businesses, but that was what was supposed to be happening. The tenants had no input. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire and my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal said, the tenants were completely tied into the system, but it was one over which they had no operational influence or control.

I join all the tributes paid to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire for his leadership of the group. As he said, the original claim was for about four times the final settlement. It was for £23.5 million and the tenants settled for about £7 million. I am the first to accept that individuals must decide whether to take advice from tax advisers and that the Revenue cannot be held responsible for that tax advice, but the tax advice given to the tenants was that the sum would not be taxable.

I want to refer now to the papers given to the tenants that set out the agenda for a meeting at Sandy in Bedfordshire in what was then in my right hon. and learned Friend's constituency.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: It still is.

Mr. Paice: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for confirming that. The meeting was to take place on 29 June 1991, when Simon Goldblatt QC and others were to consult the tenants about the offer that my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal had put to them when he was the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The document contained sections entitled, "What is the offer?" and "Has the method of distribution been decided?" It stated that the fund would be divided into a > first slice from which a flat-rate payment will be made to each Plaintiff in the sum of £5,000, but the main pool for distribution was on a time-related basis whereby points were allocated up to the previous six years. Incidentally, there was nothing to be gained for tenants who may have been in the scheme for 20 years or more.

The key point is that it had nothing to do with compensation for loss of profits because the settlement bore no relevance to the type of business, the level of trading, or the costs, efficiency or profitability of the businesses. In other words, no attempt was made to assess what profits may have been forgone. The fund was distributed purely on a time-serving basis without direct relevance to the businesses that were being undertaken. That is an important point and emphasises the fact that the compensation was not distributed in accordance with the loss of profit.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire and the hon. Member for Forest of Dean all referred to the fact that the people were tenants and were, in effect, facing homelessness once the estate was abolished, as a result of which many of them borrowed significant sums to buy their homes. They would otherwise probably have been on housing benefit and in local authority housing. They used the money that they received, albeit a relatively small sum, to pay off some of their debts. Most of them were in their 70s and are now living on a state pension. As the hon. Member for Forest of Dean said, some of the tenants are deceased, including some of my former constituents, yet their widows still carry the heavy burden of concern, which we know is doubly worse for old people than others.

The 50 per cent. limit set by the Inland Revenue for distress and anxiety is arbitrary. It is therefore clearly open to dispute, and the Revenue can increase it if it feels so inclined. I should have said that by law the tenants would have had a right to local authority housing. It is not that they might have done; they would have had a right to it on the abandonment of the scheme.

The businesses were small. Most of them were one-man bands, or perhaps had a husband and wife working together. They operated on a low-profit basis, partly because of the shambolic way in which matters were organised. In an ordinary year, they would not have paid much tax, if any. To tax the debts forgone or the loss of earnings so that that will create a significant tax burden is far more onerous than if it is trickled out in the normal course of events. More important, many of the businesses ceased trading when Lord Walker of Worcester abolished the scheme in the early 1980s. The settlement was 10 years later. They had no method to generate the tax and mitigate the effects, because many of their businesses had ceased.

None of the former tenants has the resources to take the matter to the commissioners, which the Minister should take into account. The Revenue has helped at meetings; I have attended at least one meeting at which its officials were present. It has been intransigent in its actions, insisting on the arbitrary 50 per cent. rule. As I understand it—I am subject to correction—it is rolling up interest on the tax debts as it has assessed them. Although it gave the period of grace to which the hon. Member for Forest of Dean referred, that ended nearly a year ago, so interest is now rolling on those tax assessments.

Not all tenants were in the same position, as only some had debts. Therefore, only some had debts forgone. In the House of Lords, the tenants won a case for breach of contract. I am advised that some of the money that they received resulted from that case, so that should not be taxable either. The Minister's predecessors in this Government and, I am afraid, the previous one have consistently said that the matter is one for the Revenue to resolve and in which Ministers cannot interfere. I do not believe that that is the case.

By way of example, I shall make an analogy with another issue. A few years ago, a large charity for the homeless in my constituency was faced with a wholly unexpected and large VAT bill. I know that that concerns Customs and Excise, not the Revenue, but there was local outcry and Customs was adamant that it had to interpret the law that way and charge the VAT. Some people and I took a delegation to see the Conservative Minister responsible, who, needless to say, gave us the line that it was not for Ministers to intervene. Lo and behold, in a matter of days, Customs and Excise turned round and decided that there might be a way forward, and we were all able to emerge from the matter with some credit. Frankly, I do not accept that there is no way in which Ministers can influence such matters.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): Like the hon. Gentleman, I have puzzled over the intransigence of the Revenue. I suppose that it is based on the floodgates argument—namely, if a concession is made, it will somehow be relied on in future. However, the hon. Gentleman's remarks and those of the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal and the hon. Member for Forest of Dean have made it clear that the circumstances are unique. Although precedent will never be eliminated in all circumstances, the notion that a favourable decision in this case will be relied on in future is so remote as to be discounted.

Mr. Paice: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is right. As Governments have generally ceased their involvement in running businesses during the past couple of decades, one cannot even imagine a similar case arising in future. Therefore, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman says, the precedent argument is an excuse rather than a realistic concern about the future.

[Mr. Paice]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal referred to a suggestion that I was going to make. Those of us in this Chamber who have been in government are conscious that Ministers always want a way out. Would not some kind of ex-gratia payment be possible? If the Revenue insists on tax assessments for various reasons—with which we do not agree—cannot the issue be reopened and an ex-gratia payment made that would nullify the tax burden? The income is peanuts in terms of public expenditure. It is of no consequence to the nation but of huge consequence to former tenants up and down the country, most of whom are elderly, have no businesses and are eking out their later years. Those people are very worried.

I have regular meetings with former tenants of the Abington estate, some of whom are still there, some of whom have moved away. Every time I have those meetings, their concern and anguish is clear. The matter must be settled. It is of no comfort to me that it has taken such a long time. It is now 18 years since the estate was abolished, and eight years since the settlement was agreed with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

I hope that the Minister will recognise that there is a wide body of concern in the House about the way in which this matter has been handled. We do not want to apportion blame or responsibility, but we want the threat that has hung over the heads of hundreds of people during the past eight years to be removed, so that they can look forward to a slightly more comfortable life in their later years. I hope that the Minister will understand the intensity of concern among tenants and those of us who represent them.

10.42 am

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I pay tribute to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) not only for running a long-standing campaign on this issue but for keeping other hon. Members informed. That has been extremely helpful.

I speak on behalf of a constituent who is affected. First, in the light of the comments this morning, there is a great deal of unity across parties. We are considering not a party political issue but an issue of justice that unites Members from all parties. The apportionment of blame is not the way forward. Secondly, we are united in believing that tenants have been consistently let down, under the LSA and since its winding-up. Thirdly, an urgent resolution to the problem is needed, given the age of the people affected.

Two solutions are available. One is for the Inland Revenue to write off the debt and not pursue the tenants for the tax and the other is an ex-gratia payment to enable tenants to meet the tax liability. Justice will therefore have been seen to be done. I apologise to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire that I cannot be here after 11 am because I have another engagement. I would have liked to hear the Minister's response. I hope that he will take on board the views expressed across the party divide, and that he will be able to give some hope to those tenants who have waited all too long for justice to be done.

10.45 am

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) on running the campaign for a small group in society who have had a particularly hard lot for a long time. I hope and believe that the Minister is a fair and decent person and that this debate will help towards a solution to the problem. It is a disgrace that the matter has dragged on for nine years, and that the tax situation has not been resolved, although the original intention seems to have been clear.

It is difficult to add to the excellent contributions made by my right hon. and learned Friend, the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) and others. There is no legal requirement for the Revenue to treat the payments in the way that it is; it is not a matter of law from which it has no escape. The Revenue might take the view, within the narrow confines of its perspective, that payments of up to £25,000, for example, were made for general suffering and did not relate to loss of profit. The Revenue itself chose to use a commercial case as a case study, from which it took its 50:50 offer. As other hon. Members have said, the cases are not analogous, nor has there been any case before the courts that is precisely analogous. That is a good reason for the Revenue not to take the view that a common-sense approach to the matter would create a dangerous precedent.

It is unreasonable, and a sign of weak government, for Governments of both parties to have ducked the issue. The matter is a practical one: the individuals concerned are elderly and had to put up with virtual serfdom when they were members of that badly administered, crackpot land settlement scheme. By saying that the Revenue has to act in such a way because it is legally required to do so, Governments are passing the buck in the worst traditions of this country. Governments can advise and tell the Revenue what to do, as there is nothing in law to stop them, and the Revenue is free to take a sensible and enlightened view.

If the Revenue persists with the position that it has taken, the Treasury is likely to incur just as much expense as if it surrendered the tax. The cost of fighting the cases through the commissioners who made the unwise recommendations and of making housing benefit and other social security payments is likely to be just as great. The tax involved is only £1.5 million, which might be quickly consumed in such expenses.

It was fortunate that my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) could attend and put on record the Government's position at the time of the settlement. He made it absolutely clear that the settlement was intended as an ex-gratia payment for the various nasties that the Government had inflicted on the people involved, in particular the suffering resulting from poor administration and the unwise method by which the MAFF scheme was managed. In all practical senses, he committed the Government at the time. For the Inland Revenue to turn around afterwards in contradiction of the position expounded by the Minister responsible at the time is a form of retrospective taxation, which I trust the Government continue to set their face against as a matter of principle.

The position of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal and the Government was made clear publicly at the time. The matter was not handled behind closed doors. The 400 families involved were clearly led to believe that the payments would not be subject to tax. For the Government collectively to go back on that is morally improper, and to find clever legal ways of proposing to do it is unnecessary.

As others said, two perfectly easy solutions are available.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I should like the hon. Gentleman to clarify his comments, as he may have inadvertently misled the House. I am not aware that the Government ever said that the payments were not liable to tax, but the hon. Gentleman implies that they did. Will he correct that point?

Mr. Flight: I believe that that is so. The contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal this morning made it clear that, when he was the Minister responsible he made it clear publicly that the Government intended the payments to be ex-gratia, and not subject to tax.

Mr. Timms: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman is right or that a statement on record makes that point. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal made clear this morning his recollection of his understanding at the time, but I do not believe that the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) can point to a statement to that effect.

Mr. Flight: I thank the Financial Secretary for raising the issue. It might be appropriate for him to interview my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal and put on record what my right hon. Friend believed that he said publicly. However, the Financial Secretary will find that the record shows that the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal publicly communicated his understanding of the position.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: After the event, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal wrote a letter that clearly sets out the advice that he received from his civil servants and his clear understanding at the time, which, rightly, permeated MAFF. The tenants were advised from another angle, and they had a similar point of view. Of course there was some to-ing and fro-ing, and there has been some discussion about that. However, the general understanding in MAFF was perfectly clear.

Mr. Flight: I do not know the precise time involved, but I also have proper reason to believe that the view of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal, the Minister at the time, was not confidential but available and was therefore known, as I said earlier, by the 400 families involved.

Mrs. Organ: That is the crux of the issue. That may have been in the mind of the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal, and the intention throughout MAFF, and the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal may have subsequently written to the chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, made a public statement or written a public letter. However, the problem is that when the settlement was made he did not give clear directions or lay down absolutely clearly that he intended it to be non-taxable. The problem is that no communication took place between the two Departments. That may have been the intention, but does the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs agree that it was not clear?

Mr. Flight: Like me, the hon. Lady listened to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal said this morning. In my view, he made it clear that there was no question at the time that the settlement would be taxable—on the advice of his civil servants and lawyers. It would therefore have been inappropriate to have even raised the issue of tax.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: If the hon. Gentleman can, will he put himself back into the minds of those to whom the settlement was offered? Does he think that they would have accepted it if they had been told that it was liable to tax?

Mr. Flight: The right hon. and learned Gentleman makes an excellent point. My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal also said that if there had been any question of the settlement not being an ex-gratia payment, as his officials advised him, the Government would not have viewed it as an appropriate settlement.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I support my hon. Friend's stance. Constituents who have come to see me said that they were clearly told that no tax would be payable on the settlement. It was clear in their minds.

Mr. Flight: As my hon. Friend says, that was the legal advice given to the 400 families at the time. My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal has put clearly on the record his position both in regard to the intent of the Government at the time and the advice received by officials. With great respect to the hon. Member for Forest of Dean, the issue was not unclear. What happened was that subsequently, when everyone believed that the settlement was an ex-gratia payment that would not be taxable, some bright individual in the Revenue looked up that old commercial case and thought, "Ah, hah! We'd better levy some tax here." The thing has been sitting around disgracefully for eight years since then, because no Government can morally justify taxing the sum, thereby delaying, until a year ago, the date until which interest would run. For some extraordinary reason, no Government have chosen to grasp the nettle and resolve the matter.

Mr. Paice: Before my hon. Friend leaves the issue of what Governments said, it is important to realise that the statement by my right hon. Friend that no tax would be involved was not made only this morning. It was made five years ago when, although he was no longer the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, he was still a senior member of the Government. The Minister is chasing for a Government statement; a senior Minister clearly said in 1995 that the events leading up to the settlement in 1992 were made on the basis that no tax was payable.

Mr. Flight: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful addition. I cannot help but comment that it was therefore a great pity that the Government in 1995 did not follow what the then Minister had said. I am sure that the present Financial Secretary will wish to rectify that.

Mr. Timms: I want to put one further point to the hon. Gentleman. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean that at no time during the process did MAFF ask the Inland Revenue what the tax position would be. At the heart of the matter is the fact that the position was never resolved, which is why the Inland Revenue has subsequently had to take the decision that it has.

Mr. Flight: I thank the Minister for that comment, but I do not believe that that is a fair stance. There are all manner of situations whereby tax may or may not arise. If organisations go to the Inland Revenue for clarification, it frequently will not give a view. Clear advice was given in the Ministry on behalf of Government and much learned legal advice was given to the 400 families at the time. Although I am not questioning the good faith of the Revenue in subsequently erasing the tax claim that it raised, to suggest in retrospect that the Revenue should have been approached to give a ruling at the time of the settlement would be to put matters the wrong way round. The belief of all involved was that the payment was ex gratia and non-taxable. As I and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire noted earlier, it was not legally necessary for the Revenue to apply that particular commercial case to the situation, which is different.

It is ridiculous for a Government—whether this Government or the previous one—to take such a Scrooge-like attitude to some of the most downtrodden members of our society. The matter is easily resolved, either by the Government persuading the Inland Revenue to take the approach that my right hon. and learned Friend has suggested or by their squaring the circle by making an exgratia payment of about £1.5 million to cover the burden if they feel—incorrectly—that there is an important point of tax law. They would probably save money by taking that approach as an alternative to allowing the matter to proceed, thereby incurring the various legal, social security and other expenditure involved.

The Minister knows that telling the people to go to the commissioners is no answer—they cannot afford the legal costs involved and they would not be entitled to legal aid. That five-year-old ducking tactic does not wash now. I hope that the Minister will justify his reputation and our proceedings by getting the silly issue resolved, as the Government have the power to do.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I pay tribute to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) for his vigour in pursuing the matter and to all those who have so eloquently presented their constituents' cases in the debate. What we have heard has left me in no doubt about the anxiety experienced by constituents of several hon. Members.

As we have heard, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food wound up the Land Settlement Association in 1983. There were 500 tenants at the time, 293 of whom joined in an action against the Ministry, which was on two counts—first, mismanagement and, secondly, distress and anxiety. The mismanagement issue regarded loss of profit and that is taxable. The distress and anxiety count concerns personal injury and so is not taxable. I make that important point because those two issues of profit and personal injury have been of concern from the beginning of the discussion of the case. The action led to out-of-court compensation from MAFF in 1991.

The nature of a compensation payment in an out-of-court settlement depends on the terms of the settlement read in the light of the pleadings. Establishing the precise details of the claims proved difficult in this case. The grounds for the 293 individual claims boiled down to just two grounds. The nature of the claims is now common ground. The loss of profits was quantified at £28.8 million. The personal injury claim was not quantified, but £6.5 million was offered and accepted in full settlement of all claims. In addition, debts of £677,000 owed to MAFF were forgiven.

To avoid for all parties the difficult task of analysing each of the 293 claims and apportioning the award for each individual between the taxable quantified elements and non-taxable unquantified elements, the Revenue offered a general compromise. In broad terms, it sought to tax 50 per cent. of the cash award and 40 per cent. of the debt forgone. It was for each individual to decide whether to accept that offer or pursue their claim in the normal way. About half the cases were settled on that basis. Negotiations continue on the remaining cases, principally because of a reluctance on the part of many individuals to accept that any tax is payable. When information was most recently collated a couple of years ago, 141 tenants had open appeals.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: The Minister is stating the Revenue's position that the apportionment depends on the settlement in light of the pleadings. Will he think carefully about the two cases of Wiseburgh v. Domville and Roberts v. W. S. Electronics, which I have mentioned repeatedly in correspondence? Both cases show that what is agreed must not be a sham but a genuine representation of what has happened. The cases do not mean that if someone makes an apportionment, it must be an arbitrary 50:50, and they certainly do not mean that we cannot take the general damages aspect first up to, say, £25,000.

Mr. Timms: It is true that the relevant tax case does not specify a 50:50 split of the cash award. The Revenue's offer was an attempt to produce a fair figure in the absence of specific information. Given that only limited information is available, the Revenue's general compromise to tax only half in recognition of distress in each case does not seem to be unreasonable. However, I understand the anxiety about that aspect of the offer.

The tax charge has been the subject of representations by taxpayers and several hon. Members over a number of years to the Revenue and Treasury Ministers to the effect that the situation of the Land Settlement Association is unique. The most recent approach to Ministers was an oral question last December in response to which my hon. Friend the Paymaster General explained that no change was made to tax legislation when the compensation was paid and that, therefore, the current tax law applied. My hon. Friend also pointed out that Ministers do not intervene in individual cases. If agreement cannot be reached between the Revenue and taxpayers about the meaning of tax law, the matter can be resolved by the appeal commissioners and the courts.

The most recent approach to the Revenue resulted in a meeting between the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire, the chairman of the Inland Revenue and officials on 4 April. It covered the Revenue's view of the relevant law. As well as the tax charge, the matter of interest chargeable on the unpaid tax was raised. The Revenue agreed to discuss that with the tenants to see whether a compromise on interest could be reached as part of a settlement of the open cases. It suggested that settlement of the open cases, including interest on unpaid tax, should be considered by the inspector who was dealing with them. The inspector wrote to the right hon. and learned Gentleman with an offer for the tenants to settle the outstanding appeals. It included charging interest only up to 5 April this year.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: The Minister is correct. The Revenue wanted to charge interest up to 5 April this year, notwithstanding the understanding that interest would be suspended while the difficult matters were discussed. I was shocked that it asked for interest to be paid up to 5 April when we had been going to and fro over such a grey area. Will the Minister reconsider that decision?

Mr. Timms: The point that I want to emphasise is that those are not matters for Ministers. I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman finds that unhelpful, but that is the position. The chairman of the Inland Revenue wrote to him and said that the Revenue would see whether some compromise on interest could form part of the settlement of the open cases. He also suggested that the issue of the interest charged could be explored at a meeting between the inspector and the tenants to discuss the settlement of those cases.

The offer to explore all those issues with the inspectorate of taxes has not so far been taken up, although my advice would be that it certainly should be. Mr. Richard King is the inspector who is co-ordinating all the open cases, and he should be the next port of call for those who are dealing with the issue.

Mr. Flight: The Minister and the Government might choose to take the constitutional stance that he has described, but having heard what was the Government's intention at the time, is it not in the Minister's power to solve the problem by making an ex-gratia payment to cover the tax that must be paid?

Mr. Timms: I simply make the point that that is a matter of law. The responsibility of the Revenue is to interpret the law, and the law in that area is clear.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: The Minister says that the law is clear, but he knows that he cannot put his finger on any case that says that there must be a 50:50 split. What is more, the Minister has mentioned officials by name, which I have been extremely careful not to do. To push the tenants back to Mr. Richard King, who has been handling the matter for years, is simply to push them back to square one.

Mr. Timms: No, I suggest that that is the right place to take the discussion forward. A range of issues could be discussed with the inspector.

Mr. Paice: I am concerned about the proposition that we should go back to Mr. Richard King. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire and I were present at a meeting with Mr. Richard King in one of the rooms off Westminster Hall three or four years ago, so we have been down that road. As a result of that, my right hon. and learned Friend had meetings with more senior Revenue officials, who suggested that the matter should be taken up with Ministers. Therefore, it is unreasonable for Ministers to say that we should now go back to square one and talk to Mr. Richard King.

Mr. Timms: It really is not for Ministers to take views on the tax arrangements of individual taxpayers. The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) raised the same issue. If it were for Ministers to do that, we would spend all our time in Westminster Hall debating the tax affairs of individuals. There is a procedure for pursuing such matters, which should be used to resolve this matter. The Inland Revenue must apply its interpretation of the law to the tenants of the Land Settlement Association, as it has been applied to other taxpayers who have received compensation for loss of profit. Indeed, many of the Land Settlement Association tenants have already settled their tax liability on the compensation received on that basis. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) made it clear that, when the payments were made in 1991, it was the intention of Ministers at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that the payments should not be taxable. As my hon. Friend the Paymaster General made clear in a debate last December, no change was made to the law, so the current law must apply to this case.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I had a succession of meetings with Mr. King and a very intelligent young lawyer called Mr. Deeps Jaggi, with whom I worked when I was a Minister. We agreed that, because the Revenue had never had to face such circumstances before, it would have to go to Ministers. The point was subsequently taken, however, that it should not go to Ministers, which is why I went to see the head of the Inland Revenue personally. These matters are not covered by settled tax law and I have received many letters suggesting that the issue should be pushed away to the special commissioners. The Revenue can clearly exercise discretion, rather than transfer the issue to the special commissioners and perhaps to the Court of Appeal, with which the tenants have no money to deal. None of that process is settled law, so does it not require proper intellectual consideration by Ministers with senior tax officials and the head of the Inland Revenue?

Mr. Timms: The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that this was a matter that needed to be settled by the Revenue and not by Ministers. I agree with that view. It is well established that compensation that is received for personal hardship is not liable to income tax, but that compensation for the loss of trading profit is taxable as trading income. The nature of compensation payments in out-of-court settlements depends on the terms of the settlement and on the pleadings.

I understand that the tenants received conflicting advice from professional advisers. Their counsel advised that no tax would be payable, but I understand that their accountants advised them correctly and said that tax would be payable—a point that has not so far been made. It was unfortunate that that mistaken advice was given, but that does not mean that the tax charge should be waived. Equally, problems with payment are not grounds for waiving a tax charge, as other taxpayers face difficulties in paying tax. As there are difficulties in analysing each of the many claims for compensation and apportioning the award for each individual between taxable and non-taxable elements, the Revenue has offered a general compromise to settling the tax charge. Some tenants have settled on that basis, but others have not done so.

Tenants and their Members of Parliament have made representations saying that the circumstances of the Land Settlement Association compensation are unique and that no tax should be payable. There has been disagreement about the Revenue's view that a relevant tax case means that all the elements of the claim—loss of profit and distress—must be taken into account when deciding on the nature of the out-court-settlement. It has also been suggested that the tenants should be able to choose the approach that is most advantageous to them. In this instance, that approach would be to claim that the payment was wholly for distress. I understand that the Revenue's view is that the judge in the tax case accepted that a head of claim could be dropped before settlement but not afterwards. That means that both heads of charge must be taken into account in the LSA case. Of course, tenants who want to pursue their argument through the appeal process are entitled to do so.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To what case is the Minister referring? I have not been told that a case has established that one part of the claim has to be dropped. Surely he is speaking merely about the Revenue's interpretation.

Mr. Timms: I do not have the details of the case with me, but I can ensure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman receives them. I must emphasise that Treasury Ministers do not intervene personally in the Inland Revenue's application of tax law or in its handling of particular cases, although it has been suggested that we should do so. If hon. Members reflect on what such intervention would mean, they will be much less enthusiastic. Ministers do not influence the way in which local inspectors settle specific cases. The Inland Revenue is independent from Treasury Ministers in applying tax law. That independence in administering the tax system must be scrupulously observed.

Mr. Paice rose—

Mr. Flight rose—

Mr. Timms: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice).

Mr. Paice: This is a fairly crucial point. I speak for myself, but I suspect also for others. I understand that Ministers should not interfere in the tax affairs of individual constituents, but we are not talking about individual cases. To describe these cases as individual is to pick on a weak point—almost, it seems, in order to divide and conquer.

I am not a lawyer, but I believe that it could be called a class judgment. The court has to look not at Mr. Smith's and Mr. Brown's tax affairs, but at the entirety of cases, especially as they arose as the result of government action. It should not be a matter of individual inspectors dealing with individual taxpayers, but of an overall ruling to resolve the affair for that class of former tenant.

Mr. Timms: It is a matter for the Revenue to resolve on the basis of the law as it stands. It is for the Revenue to decide how the matter should be concluded.

Mr. Flight: Is it not the case that if there is some doubt about the law—my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire has made it clear that that is the case in this instance—the Inland Revenue will often concur with the Government on the interpretation to be followed? Indeed, my right hon. and learned Friend said that when he spoke to the head of the Inland Revenue, he was advised that it was for the Government to make a decision.

Mr. Timms: No, the hon. Gentleman is not right. Such matters are determined by the Revenue on the basis of its understanding of the law. The Revenue does not ask Ministers for their views.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary; he has been generous in giving way. When are Members of the House of Commons entitled to seek redress on behalf of their constituents if not on occasions such as this? The hon. Gentleman should have no difficulty in persuading us that Ministers should not crawl over the tax affairs of individuals, but an issue of principle that goes beyond the affairs of individuals is surely the sort of issue upon which Ministers should take a view.

Mr. Timms: The Revenue has to work in line with established law and case law, as set out in statute or as determined by the courts. It is not for Ministers to seek to push the Inland Revenue in a particular direction. Individuals who have a problem with the tax system have recourse to the commissioners and the appeal system. That has always been the arrangement. That is how such matters should be resolved.

The rules that the Revenue seeks to apply to the compensation received by the Land Settlement Association tenants are those that apply to other taxpayers who receive compensation. The tax system should be neutral. It should apply equally to all taxpayers. Disagreement about the meaning of tax law and its application to individual cases is a matter for the Revenue, not Ministers. The Revenue does not have policy discretion to ignore the application of tax law in certain circumstances.

As for concerns about the difficulties of paying a tax bill, tax collectors have some leeway to allow payment over a period if a taxpayer's personal circumstances justify it. I also understand the concerns about interest accruing on unpaid tax. As I said, the Revenue has agreed to consider that with the tenants to see whether some compromise can be reached as part of a settlement for the open cases. Again, I suggest that the tenants explore that with the Revenue.

I hope that agreement can be reached. I accept the strength of feeling expressed this morning, and I know that that reflects the concerns of the constituents of right hon. and hon. Members. However, if the Revenue's compromise offer or its view of the law continues to be disputed, the matter should go to the independent appeal commissioners and to the courts, to determine how the law should be applied.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): The internet has given millions of people worldwide access to medical information and products in unprecedented volumes. It is becoming increasingly evident that many internet sites do not conform to United Kingdom standards. There are more than 20,000 health-related websites, with an increasing number selling powerful drugs that would normally be available only on prescription in the United Kingdom. Other products on offer include over-the-counter medicines, and vitamins, minerals, functional foods and herbal remedies, for which medicinal claims are made. New developments based on genome research will not only increase the number of medicines available. In the future, techniques such as gene testing and genome sequencing will be offered directly to the public via the internet and the situation could thus become increasingly complex.

At present, 7 million or so people in this country have home internet access and 45 per cent. of the United Kingdom population has used the internet at least once. Those figures will almost definitely increase in the near future, especially with the wider availability of new devices such as digital television, WAP phones and the later computer games consoles, all of which offer internet access. In the United States it has been predicted that the domestic market for online health services will increase from $200 million in 1999 to $10 billion in 2004—a 50-fold increase. In recent months, Pharmacy 2U, the first United Kingdom online pharmacy, has been launched. Both the British Medical Association and the National Pharmaceutical Association have expressed reservations about such developments.

The Government have taken e-commerce on board as one of the key elements for the United Kingdom's future in trading development, with a target of bringing the entire nation on line by 2005. However, specific areas of e-commerce, particularly those related to public health, will need more stringent validation processes to prevent malpractice. The number of relevant sites is likely to increase in coming years, which gives rise to several concerns. Consumers who bought prescription drugs from unregulated online websites could bypass medical advice before and after purchase and thus be at risk from the adverse affects of inappropriately prescribed medications, dangerous drug interactions or contaminated drugs, not to mention the issue of confidentiality of medical information.

Customers in the United Kingdom can purchase goods from overseas sites, some of which provide no contact details. That is a matter of concern in the light of potential negligence. Internet users should also be aware that products with the same name may contain different ingredients in different countries and that countries may apply different laws on what medical products can be sold and shipped across national borders. That means that it is possible that products that are not approved for marketing in the United Kingdom, or which have been identified as a hazard to public health, may not be allowed into the country, if they are identified at entry. That would leave the customer without the option of reimbursement.

Obtaining a prescription drug by filling out a questionnaire and without seeing a doctor poses serious health risks. A questionnaire does not provide sufficient information to enable a health care professional to determine whether a drug is suitable, or whether another treatment would be more appropriate. It might not pick up an underlying medical condition that might make a drug harmful. An associated danger is that, once the questionnaire has been provided to the supplier, the customer has no control over the confidentiality of the records. A recent study by Health Which?, a Consumers Association publication, showed that some prescription drugs—Viagra and Xenical—were sold when, for medical reasons, they should not have been. That happened despite the fact that the information supplied in the questionnaires should have been sufficient to justify refusing the drugs. The research also highlighted the fact that in some cases the consumer could not gain access to information on the professionals who were in charge of issuing the prescription. One site was simply signed off in the name of "Your family doctor". In a society in which health professionals register with official bodies and accept an ethical and moral code of practice, that behaviour is surely unacceptable. Similar results were reported in a study carried out in the United States in 1999.

What can be done? The American Medical Association has issued guidelines for the development and posting of website contents to govern the acquisition and posting of online advertising and sponsorship, which will ensure site visitors' and patients' rights to privacy and confidentiality and provide effective and secure means of e-commerce.

In March, a 52-year-old man with a history of heart disease died in the United States of America after buying Viagra online. Following that, the Clinton Administration proposed an additional $10 million investment to target and punish those who engage in illegal drug sales over the internet. That strategy will establish new federal requirements for all internet pharmacies to ensure that they comply with state and federal laws. It will create new civil penalties for the illegal sale of pharmaceuticals and give federal agencies, including the Food and Drug Administration, new authority swiftly to gather information needed to prosecute offenders. It will also expand federal enforcement efforts and launch a new public education campaign about the dangers of buying prescription drugs online. The National Association of Boards of Pharmacy has unveiled its verified internet pharmacy practice sites programme, which provides consumers with valuable information about the credentials of online pharmacies.

In the US, the FDA has issued warnings about purchasing from sites outside US jurisdiction. In the United Kingdom, the Royal Pharmaceutical Society and the Medicines Control Agency have provided assistance to community pharmacists on commonly encountered aspects of the internet and e-commerce, such as confidentiality, encrypted data transmission, provision of professional advice, comprehensive information on products and home delivery of medicines.

The intrinsic nature of the web is the provision of worldwide services, which opens up fantastic possibilities for the consumer. However, that translates into obvious difficulties in the regulation of services provided. The fact that the content of web pages cannot be regulated shows that alternative measures for quality control must be put in place. Immediate ones could be the creation of a validation scheme for online health-related purchases through kite marking, guaranteed widespread access to a listing of sites and confidentiality of data.

Internet providers of health-related services should comply to quality standards, which should be the product of discussions between all the professional bodies involved, including the Department of Health, pharmaceutical societies, on-line businesses, consumer associations and so on.

While keeping consumer choice prevalent on the agenda, we must guarantee quality. The internet could be a powerful tool for delivering health care services. However, we should keep in mind the fact that guidance from the internet should not be used as a replacement for consultation with the consumer's health care provider. Guidance has been issued not only at a national level, but as a result of international attempts to provide the possibility of an informative choice to the internet user. That is true of the guide issued by the World Health Organisation in 1999. That was developed not only for consumer information but to serve as a model for member states to adapt into locally meaningful advice for internet users, to help them to obtain reliable, independent and comparable information on medicinal products.

Do consumers have easy access to those guidelines? The provision of internet links between health information sites, such as NHS Direct, as well as institutions governing aspects related to the provision of medicines, would facilitate access to safe online traders. At present, most attempts to regulate and validate such sites are at the initiative of the industry itself. For example, in the UK the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry is considering a paper on internet trading. Some work has already been done on advertisement of medicines on internet sites. Parallel to that, the first meeting between stakeholders will take place on Monday 17 July, which is next week, in the presence of the chief pharmacist and members of the RPS, the Proprietary Association of Great Britain, the Doctor Patient Partnership, the Royal College of General Practitioners and the UK on-line pharmacy Pharmacy 2U. It will be some meeting. The British Standards Institute has facilitated the meeting. However, Departments should take a proactive approach to promoting dialogue and regulatory initiatives.

In the light of those developments, will my hon. Friend the Minister outline the steps that her Department and agencies such as the MCA are taking to tackle those problems? Do they have any plans to take an active role in co-ordinating the various schemes being considered by the ABPI and other organisations?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Gisela Stuart): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing the debate. The electronic purchase of medicines is a matter of increasing concern, and I welcome the opportunity to respond on the issue. As my hon. Friend has said, use of the internet is increasing at a pace that few would have anticipated. There are now at least 12 million internet users, and that figure is growing daily.

Electronic commerce, or e-commerce, lies at the heart of the Government's vision of a modern, knowledge-driven economy in the UK. That is why we are planning to make Britain one of the world leaders in e-commerce by 2002. E-commerce can bring major benefits to the public by providing wider choice and easier access to a vast array of products and information. However, more information does not always bring benefits; we must make sure that the information is reliable. It also sometimes takes time for the law to catch up with new developments. I remember from my days as a law undergraduate how long it took contract law to catch up with the availability of telephones and then fax machines, for example. Development of the law and of technology should happen in parallel.

The increased use of e-commerce should be balanced with the provision of essential safeguards for consumers, and that is particularly important for medicines. The availability of medicines on the internet is underpinned by controls on their advertising, promotion and sale. Before my hon. Friend entered Parliament he had a distinguished academic record and he knows only too well the importance of relying on scientific advice and ensuring that what is offered to the public for sale is safe.

In recent months, there has been a rapid development of internet sites offering medicines for sale. It is easy to see how such developments can offer advantages to people who find that shopping medium more convenient and attractive, but safeguards must be in place. We recognise that medicines are not like ordinary items that can be purchased on the net, such as clothing, electrical goods and jewellery. Everyone who buys a medicine, through whatever medium, must have medication that is appropriate to his or her condition.

A well-established framework of domestic and European law, providing safeguards to the public, is already in place. In particular, medicines are categorised on grounds of safety into those that can be used with or without medical supervision. In the case of prescription-only medicine, a doctor's or dentist's prescription is required, which provides an important safeguard. In addition, prescription-only and pharmacy medicines must be sold under the supervision of a qualified pharmacist, on premises that are registered and inspected by the Royal Pharmaceutical Society. General sale list medicines provide convenient access for some products that safely provide symptomatic relief for minor conditions and they can be sold by any general retailer if the premises are lockable and the medicine is in an unopened manufacturer's pack.

In addition to those legal controls, there are professional safeguards. In the past year, the UK's first true internet pharmacy sites have opened. The Royal Pharmaceutical Society has published interim standards specifically for internet pharmacy which make clear that pharmacists selling medicines online must exercise precisely the same care in supplying medicines as their colleagues working in other locations. It is part and parcel of a pharmacist's role, in any setting, that they have sometimes to refuse to sell people medicine if, in their professional opinion, it would not be safe or right to do so. That is an important safeguard. The safeguards already in place make it an offence to sell, rather than buy, medicines inappropriately. We put the responsibility clearly on the supplier.

There has been debate within the retail pharmacy world about the rights and wrongs—for commercial and ethical reasons—of internet-based pharmacy. What is clearly emerging from that debate is that some pharmacists believe that they can offer a fully professional service, which consumers and patients will trust and want to use, on the internet. Further safeguards are provided by the controls, through British and European Community law, on advertising. Those completely prohibit the advertising of unlicensed and prescription-only medicines to the general public. Although non-prescription medicines can be advertised, there are restrictions on the advertising of medicines for certain serious conditions. Those regulations apply as much to the internet as to any other medium.

The rapid development of e-commerce has encouraged, in parallel, an equally rapid development in electronic advertising and promotion through a variety of websites. That challenges the existing European legal framework, which was negotiated and implemented in the late 1980s when e-commerce and the use of the internet by European Union citizens was in its infancy.

The growth of e-commerce has prompted the European Commission to review the existing legislative framework. The United Kingdom is playing a leading role in the review, as a leading player in e-commerce and the internet. Our input will take account of the discussions that the MCA is having with other regulators involved in advertising control, industry and consumer groups. We will not ignore the agency's public health responsibilities while the European review of advertising and e-commerce is under way.

Our plan is not to limit the availability of useful information about medicines. We want to encourage the provision of good quality information and health care to consumers. Existing law already permits the provision of health information and the internet can play a leading role in that. For example, the right remedy campaign this winter empowered the patient by making more information available. The Government have told people clearly that there are many sources of advice, including pharmacists and NHS Direct.

As part of the Government's "Information for Health" strategy, a programme of work is in place to give public, patients, and health care professionals access to NHS accredited sources of information. That information comes not only from the NHS but from patient groups, from which people can learn about long-term conditions. However, we recognise our responsibility, and a source that has an NHS label is reliable and has been tested. Such information can make a significant contribution to ensuring that medicines are taken safely and effectively.

The hon. Gentleman must be aware of the telephone help line, NHS Direct. Last December, the Prime Minister launched NHS Direct online, which represented an important step towards making accredited information available on the internet.

[Ms Gisela Stuart]

Experience gained from the help line is transferred to the online service, which is one of the most popular and best regarded health websites in the United Kingdom and provides a gateway to accredited information on the internet. Sex, religion and health are the three most searched-for areas on the internet. There is a lot of information about health, but some of it is extremely unreliable. The online service provides links to several hundred accredited sources of information on the internet and other formats. Users can feel confident that the information that they access will be reliable and of good quality.

I come now to the question of enforcement—the criminal investigation of alleged breaches of medicine regulations that can lead to prosecutions in the criminal courts. If a defendant is found guilty, the maximum penalties are two years' imprisonment and/or an unlimited fine. Powers also exist, and are used, to confiscate assets and seize and destroy products.

That work is also carried out on behalf of Ministers by the MCA's enforcement group, which is a team of highly trained and experienced investigators. The MCA works closely with other enforcement agencies here and overseas. In particular, the MCA has close ties and workings with the Food and Drug Administration's Office of Criminal Investigation, which investigates internet crime related to pharmaceuticals. My hon. Friend referred to the Clinton Government's initiative aimed at effectively controlling and policing the internet. We were pleased that that initiative was backed up by a substantial financial commitment. That is important, as about 75 per cent. of overseas websites potentially advertising prescription-only or pharmacy medicines in the UK are based in the USA. As such a close link exists, it is important for us to work together. The MCA's enforcement arm is also accredited to the National Criminal Intelligence Service. The MCA has an impressive track record and is recognised as a world leader in the successful investigation of pharmaceutical crime.

In response to the growing significance of the internet, the MCA has set up a special unit within its enforcement group whose work is to investigate possible breaches of regulations on the internet. Officers have received special training in web search techniques and investments have also been made in search engines and other specialist equipment that may be required. As a result of their investigation, action has already been taken against a number of websites that have been in breach of the law. Those breaches have involved both licensed and unlicensed medicines. Some websites have been closed down, while others have had to amend their web pages to comply with the law.

In the case of subversive, covert or apparently deliberate criminal acts, the MCA may attempt enforcement immediately through the criminal courts.

I assure my hon. Friend that mechanisms and the legal framework already exist to ensure that the interests of public health are met.

When the business is located in the UK, direct action by the MCA is relatively easily achieved.

Dr. Gibson: Is my hon. Friend aware of how many such prosecutions there have been? Has there been one or more?

Ms Stuart: There have been a couple of prosecutions, and several are in the pipeline. I would be happy to provide my hon. Friend with precise figures. It is important to recognise that those who attempt to subvert often do so opportunistically, so the threat of action, or simply the process, often displaces them.

What happens when, as is not unlikely on the internet, the perpetrator is abroad? The market is increasingly becoming global. Although our experience is that there is often a UK base or business presence in the UK of some description, the perpetrator is more frequently an opportunist trader—a criminal seeking to make easy and quick money and evade the law.

In such situations we can and do seek the assistance of colleagues in other countries. In 1999, senior pharmaceutical law enforcement officers from 12 countries met in Ottawa and set up a permanent body known as the International Forum on Pharmaceutical Crime to foster the coming together of enforcement groups from different countries to enforce pharmaceutical law. The MCA was asked to provide support and act as a co-ordinating point for the forum's work, and was glad to do so. High on the list of the forum's policy objectives is a strategy for developing practical enforcement measures against criminal activities on the internet involving pharmaceuticals. As crime and illegal activities become increasingly international and use the most modern technology it is necessary to work in a co-ordinated fashion.

I assure my hon. Friend that we are committed to maintaining and developing existing enforcement capabilities so that, where the protection of public health requires it, the full weight of the law can be brought to bear swiftly and effectively.

What is the driving force behind e-commerce, making the internet available and providing information? We have no problem with the use of e-commerce; indeed, we encourage it. We want people to trade on the internet, and take the opportunities that it provides. However, as I said at the outset, medicines are a different matter. Consequently, we have placed specific responsibilities on suppliers. As a Government, we must ensure that the framework that we end up with is one that protects our citizens, provides them with reliable information, and, furthermore, provides them with the means to establish whether information is reliable. NHS Direct and NHS Direct online have been significant developments in that regard. In the light of rapid technological developments in the marketplace, the legislative framework must be examined to ensure that it meets the needs of the public and, in particular, strikes the correct balance between patient empowerment, ease of availability of medicines and adequate protection of public health. However, as I explained earlier using the analogy of contract law, it can take a long time before the legal framework is right.

It is also important to recognise that the process is evolutionary, in which, especially in light of the international dimension, we work with the other agencies involved to create a system that will not allow evasion or create loopholes or conflict and will co-ordinate action. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured that we are including in the strategy not only stakeholders and the pharmaceutical industry but, more important, patient groups, because ultimately the failure or success of the strategy will be judged by whether patients have been adequately protected. It is on that basis that negotiations proceed.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North that we are committed to striking the right balance. Effective regulation, enforcement and the provision of good-quality information are crucial to realising that aim. I am deeply grateful to him for having raised the issue. Something makes me feel that this may not be the last time that we discuss the issue in the House.

Fire Services (Shropshire)

11.50 am

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): There is great unhappiness and no little dissatisfaction in Shropshire following the decision to replace two appliances with a single appliance at five retained fire stations. The dissatisfaction in my county springs from the fact that the nature of the decision is not readily accepted. People are dissatisfied about the unsatisfactory way in which the consultation was carried out and about the underlying reason for the decision, which is the inadequate funding in our county. I shall deal with each of those points in turn.

The decision is almost universally opposed by Shropshire residents living in parts of the county that rely on retained fire service men. Six of the largest parish councils in the eastern part of my constituency—Alveley, Claverley, Chelmarsh, Cleobury Mortimer, Highley and Stottesdon—not to mention Bridgnorth town and district councils, have all voiced their strong objections, for sound and practical reasons.

The area covered by Bridgnorth district council is divided by the River Severn—which I am sure that the Minister will recognise as one of Britain's largest and most important rivers—with crossing points only at Bridgnorth itself or downstream at Bewdley in the adjoining county of Worcestershire. It follows, therefore, that simultaneous fires in Alveley, on one side of the river, and Highley, on the other, would, although those places are fewer than 2 miles apart as the crow flies, necessitate a road journey of about 15 miles by the northern route, or 19 miles by the southern route. In neither case would the bypasses at either Bridgnorth or Bewdley be accessed, because the road to and from Highley does not connect with the bypasses, but runs directly into each of the town centres.

As a result of reducing the number of fire appliances at Bridgnorth from two to one, calls on the single engine at Cleobury Mortimer are almost bound to increase. However, difficulties in recruiting suitable fire fighters in that town are already causing major headaches. A further practical anxiety is that, in the event of an incident in the area that requires the attendance of two appliances, one of the adjacent areas will inevitably be left without cover for the duration.

My constituents have many other, equally valid, practical objections to the proposals. For example, the eastern part of my constituency faces the additional hazard of fires started in dry weather spells by the steam engines that power the Severn Valley railway, which is an important tourist attraction in my constituency. Time prevents me from detailing all their other practical objections.

I come now to the vexed problem of the consultation process. Four consultation meetings have been held, the last one being in Bridgnorth on 8 June. However, on 24 March the chairman of Shropshire and Wrekin fire authority wrote to me and said:

> Thank you for your letter...regarding the Fire Authority's proposal to replace two appliances with one at a number of retained stations...The new appliances were ordered some considerable time ago, and are scheduled for completion in April/May this year.

Not only are my constituents angry that the consultation meeting was held after the decision had already been made, but they are incensed that the only people admitted to the meetings were the so-called stakeholders. The general public were specifically excluded from them.

The nub of the matter is the inadequacy of the standard spending assessment. My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) put it in a nutshell when he wrote to the Minister. He said that the Shropshire budget for fire services was £12.5 million, but that the SSA for this year was £8.5 million. He added that Shropshire was therefore underfunded by 47 per cent. and that the £4 million shortfall must be taken out of other services provided by the Shropshire county council.

To put it another way round, the standard spending assessment for fire services in Shropshire at £20.58 per head of population is the third lowest of all counties in England—a mere 63p above the lowest figure, but nearly £8 per head less than that of the highest. If Shropshire had achieved even the average of all English fire authorities at £28.17 per head, the SSA would almost exactly match the actual budget. We are asking for the same average deal as everyone else, as a result of which there would be sufficient funds for us to provide an adequate service throughout the county.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Is my hon. Friend aware of the real anger that the funding problem is causing in Whitchurch and Market Drayton, which will also be cut back to one pump? People contrast the £22.2 million that Cheshire receives and the £21.9 received by Staffordshire with the £8.1 million received by Shropshire. The formula is wrong.

Mr. Gill: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The formula is wrong and it has been for a long time. What depresses me and my constituents, however, is that the Government have recently made it known that there is unlikely to be any change to the formula for determining such matters for at least another three years. That, taken together with the fact that, for the past three years we have been at a standstill in terms of any alteration to the formula, means that, in effect, something that was wrong six years ago—sorry, three years ago—will still be wrong in three years' time.

The Government are fond of blaming the previous Administration on such occasions.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gill: Before I give way to the Minister, I want to say that the Government's excuse is wearing thin. The Labour Administration have been in power for three years and it is no use their looking backwards. The electorate in Shropshire want the Minister to look forward and to give us some hope for the future.

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman referred to six years; he then paused and referred to three years, which is the time that the Government have been in office. But he supported a Government who, according to his argument, caused Shropshire to be severely underfunded. How did he justify that, and why, now that we have a different Government, does he want to change the standard spending formula that he previously supported?

Mr. Gill: I have never supported the formula. I am on the record in the House as having voted, together with the former Member for North Shropshire, against the revenue support grant settlement in the previous Parliament. I am a long-term opponent of the formula. My point about the three years and the three years is that the Govt have not altered the formula. They recently announced that they are unlikely to do so for the next three years. That is a period of six years during which time the residents of Shropshire will continue to be disadvantaged.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the formula is wrong. It gives Shropshire a bad deal on just about every count. Shropshire is almost bottom of the league for the funding of police, health, social services and almost everything else. It is self-evident that that is a result of the funding formula. The Minister does not have a point when he says that I have supported the formula. I am on record as being absolutely opposed to it and pleading with this and the previous Government to effect changes that would produce a more equitable solution for my constituents.

In the final analysis, what emerges is that the intention to downgrade the number of appliances at five fire stations from two to one is driven by economics. Our county's inadequate budget means that the fire authority is forced to make cuts wherever it can. Many of my constituents question the rationale of cutting back on the retained sector, which is extremely cost-effective. The current proposals will realise a saving of less than 1 per cent. of the budget, but will result in a massive 15 per cent. reduction in capacity. If we reduce the number of fire engines from 33 to 28, it follows—this is fact not opinion—that the availability of fire engines to fight fires in emergencies in Shropshire will be reduced by 15 per cent.

Furthermore, the fire authority was obliged by law to stage a consultation exercise which, in the circumstances, was nothing more than a charade. The general public are fed up and disillusioned with being invited to participate in a plethora of consultation exercises when it is increasingly plain that the decisions have often been made. Either the outcome of public consultations should be respected or Ministers should have the courage to do what they have to do and take the electoral consequences. It is not satisfactory to govern on the basis that the Government consult on an idea that they have already formed knowing full well that, come hell or high water, they will not be distracted from their original intention. The public have to spend a lot of time and, in the case of local authorities, a lot of money responding to such consultations, when the answer is invariably a lemon.

No change in fire cover in any county can occur without the Home Secretary's formal approval. What will the Minister do? Will he take a chance with people's lives and property by endorsing the fire authority's proposals, or will he demand a re-examination of the funding formula so that fire service standards, set by his Department, can be adhered to? Before the Minister responds to the debate, I respectfully remind him that the buck stops with him. Rural Shropshire will not be fobbed off with lame excuses or any attempt to shuffle off ultimate responsibility on to others.

I remind the Minister—not as an afterthought because this is central to our consideration—of the importance of firefighters and the damaging effect that failure to come up with satisfactory responses will have on morale. There is a fear among retained firefighters in my constituency that, if the two fire appliances in Bridgnorth are replaced with one, there will be a lesser requirement for retained firemen, which will affect recruitment and morale in the fire service generally. Retained firefighters are an essential and highly valued part of our rural community. Without them, the Government would be faced with massively increased expenditure, not to mention recruitment problems.

I trust that, in his reply, the Minister will acknowledge the importance of the human dimension, but, as things stand, the proposals are opposed by the tax-paying public, the county, district, town and parish councils, the trade unions and, not least, the firefighters themselves. All that comes on top of a catalogue of complaints from the countryside, which were succinctly summarised by Mrs. Morris, the clerk to the Stottesdon and Sidbury parish council, who lists them as follows:

Reduction in policing
Removal of Accident and Emergency to greater distances
Downgrading of Kidderminster Hospital
Loss of village shops and post offices
Local pubs closing
Lack of rural transport
Fuel/taxation/vehicle running costs are rising
Schools struggling due to budgets
Roads deteriorating very badly
Unreliable SHROPDOC service
Planned reduction in fire service.

I hope that when the Minister responds to the debate he will give people in the countryside some hope that the one service for which he is responsible will not follow those other services in being run down to an unacceptable level.

12.7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): As someone who also represents a rural area, and who is concerned about rural issues, I am pleased to note that, despite the many difficulties to which the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) referred, employment is increasing in rural areas. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has had the opportunity to raise his concerns about fire services in Shropshire.

Before I proceed, I am sure that hon. Members will want to join me in expressing our shock and sadness at the news of the very serious fire at Southgate near Telford on Sunday, when a mother and two young children died in a house fire. That was a serious incident, and I am sure that all hon. Members would want us to express our condolences to the surviving members of the family, their relatives and friends.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (Telford): I thank the Minister for that expression of regret and concern. As he rightly says, all hon. Members would wish to be associated with those remarks. That is an appalling tragedy and our hearts go out to the family.

Mr. O'Brien: That tragic incident reinforces the need for those of us in Government, Members of Parliament, the fire service and individuals to redouble our efforts to reduce fires and casualties in the home, and to treat that matter seriously, rather than as a political football. That is why, with the support of fire service interests, the Government are seeking to make a commitment to prevention as the first line of defence against fire, to develop a clearer vision for the fire service and to set out a clear strategy for the next 10 years with clear targets for improvements. We want to make progress in a way that can be measured against that commitment. To that end, we have publicly set a target of reducing the average number of accidental house fire deaths by 20 per cent. in the next five years.

I fully understand the importance that the hon. Member for Ludlow and his constituents attach to the quality of the fire service provided by the Shropshire and Wrekin fire authority. We have good reason to be proud of our fire service. In many ways, we have the best fire service in the world. It puts out fires. We can be grateful because, in some countries, there are substantial delays and other problems in fire services doing that job.

The fire service achieved consistently high standards of performance, often in difficult and hazardous circumstances. The high performance in responding to fire calls has been confirmed year after year by the Audit Commission. That body's latest figures show that, in 1998-99, the fire service nationally met attendance standards in responding to fire calls in 96 per cent. of occasions. In the Shropshire and Wrekin area, even that excellent performance was bettered—attendance standards were met in 97.6 per cent. of occasions. The fire service in that area has an extremely high standard and I am sure that it will do all that it can to retain it.

The ability to attend fires is influenced, among other factors, by the proximity of fire stations. A proposal from Shropshire and Wrekin fire authority is worrying the hon. Gentleman. The authority seeks to replace two pumping appliances at Ludlow fire station, which is in his constituency, and at Newport, Whitchurch, Bridgnorth and Market Drayton, with an extra large appliance that can carry nine staff. As the hon. Gentleman noted, the authority is consulting on the proposal, but has not yet made an application under section 19 of the Fire Services Act 1947. That application will not doubt be made to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in due course. It would be appropriate for Ministers to express a view at that point. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that it is inappropriate and wrong for Ministers to express views on matters on which they will have to exercise a semi-judicial role before they are submitted to them.

I will be clear on the matter. The statutory responsibility for the provision of an efficient fire services rests with a fire authority. That is all about local democracy and local control of fire services. It is for Shropshire and Wrekin fire authority to keep its fire cover provision under review and to set a budget that allows it to meet its statutory and other obligations and, in particular, to provide a service that meets the national standards for fire cover.

[Mr. O'Brien]

I will come to finances, but I want to say more about the section 19 procedure. Under section 19(4) of the 1947 Act, a fire authority cannot reduce the number of fire stations, fire appliances or fire fighting posts without the express consent of the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary is given a specific statutory role, which he does not exercise until an application is made to him. Any wish that we express a view on the matter now would be inappropriate for that reason. The Home Secretary will grant an application only if satisfied that the proposals have been publicised sufficiently widely, in sufficient detail and with adequate time to enable an interested party to make representations. Recently, I referred back an application under section 19 because I was not satisfied about the extent of the consultation period.

I listened with great care to what the hon. Member for Ludlow said about the way in which consultation was conducted in this case. In considering such matters, I must also advise the Home Secretary on whether the fire authority has properly considered representations. That does not mean that the authority must do what the representations suggest: fire authorities are there to exercise judgment about the way in which they can best manage their budgets and provide effective fire cover standards. Her Majesty's fire services inspectorate will also advise on whether the national standards of fire cover are being maintained. In listening to the representations made by the fire authority, we will also consider the opinions of Her Majesty's fire services inspectorate, to ensure that we have a view on whether there is a risk.

Whenever change in the fire service is proposed, someone shouts "Danger to lives." However, past changes have not caused perceptible danger to lives. The debate appears to revolve around every single section 19 application. That is why the Home Secretary always relies heavily on the advice given by Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services, which has great experience in assessing whether national fire standards are being maintained and protected.

Mr. Gill: I have been paying attention to the Minister's remarks, but does he accept that what the fire authority wants to do in Shropshire is driven principally by economics? We cannot consider the matter in isolation and say what we would like or what we need accordingly. Instead, the fire authority has to cut its cloth according to its pocket, and it will probably have to cut a lot of corners on public safety to do so. Ultimately, the buck stops with the Minister.

Mr. O'Brien: There is no question but that the Home Secretary will have to make a decision—I will consider the papers and advise him on it—on whether to grant the fire authority's application. However, it is for the authority and not for the Minister to make the initial application, set out the procedures and comply with the requirements for appropriate consultation. This country has a tradition of local control of fire services.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned funding. Every single public service that I know of requests greater funding, and taxpayers often balk at the idea that they will have to pay more tax in order to provide it. There is always a balance to be struck. The hon. Gentleman's constituents will want to know that the fire authority is spending their hard-earned money in order to deliver value for money in fire cover. It is right and proper for taxpayers to want to know that the fire authority is exercising care in deciding how to spend its budget. It is spending taxpayers' money—funds that are provided by those who work in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in the surrounding area. They want value for money and it is right that the fire authority should consider that in taking any decisions. It is also right for those constituents to want to ensure that their homes are safe and that proper and effective cover is in place. That is why the Government take great heed of the experienced voice of Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services.

Mr. Gill: Does the Minister recognise that every taxpayer in Shropshire is obliged by law to pay the same rate of taxes as people in other parts of the country? Our complaint is that, out of every pound that we pay to the Treasury, we are getting back less pro rata than many other counties, including that of the Minister. In his own county of Warwickshire, for example, the SSA per head for fire services is nearly £3 more than in Shropshire. Surely, in equity, the figures should be balanced up and poor old Shropshire should not be bottom of the pile on every heading.

Mr. O'Brien: Warwickshire had serious problems in fire service funding under the previous Government. At one stage, the inspectorate was about to declare it unable to continue to operate. It is now in much better financial shape and we are providing a better settlement for the fire service than has ever before been achieved. The distribution of funding is based on the standard spending assessment formula that we inherited from the previous Administration. We consulted on that after we came to office in 1997. When a funding formula is changed, there are winners and losers; the hon. Gentleman obviously hopes that Shropshire will be a winner.

Mr. Gill: For a change.

Mr. O'Brien: I would hope that my constituency of Warwickshire, too, might benefit from such a change, but other hon. Members will be worried that their constituencies might lose.

We consulted on changes to the local government SSA formula, but we found that some local authorities did not want change. Later this summer, we shall publish a Green Paper to try to obtain local authority agreement on how to proceed. It is not simply a matter of the Government's issuing an edict. We need to discuss our proposals properly and democratically with those who represent local people. The Green Paper will set out proposals and options for change in the SSA.

We are prepared to tackle that issue in a way that the previous Government were not, but it requires some sort of consensus among local authorities. For entirely proper and legitimate reasons, the hon. Gentleman wants Shropshire to benefit, but other hon. Members will want to represent their constituents.

Mr. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): I can think of at least one way in which Shropshire and Warwickshire could benefit from a reform of the SSA system. The Home Office recently announced a £15 million increase in police funding in recognition of the sparsity factor in rural areas. Can the Minister say how seriously he and his colleagues are reviewing the inclusion of an enhanced sparsity factor in the funding of fire services?

Mr. O'Brien: Yes, I can. I have met people from Shropshire and Wrekin fire authority who suggest that the fire service SSA formula should include a sparsity indicator. If, in the light of consultation on the Green Paper, we decide to continue with a formulaic method of distributing grants rather than a system that gives greater recognition to the individual council tax payer, we shall have to consider the priorities further with the Local Government Association.

One of the problems will be how to gauge a sparsity indicator. Earlier work suggests that taking such an approach for the fire service could cause technical difficulties that do not apply to the police. It might produce perverse results. We already have enough problems with SSAs producing perverse results by giving more to those fire services with a higher number of call-outs. That is almost an incentive for more call-outs to be received.

We shall need to consider that proposal in the Green Paper. We want to take perversity out of the system. We do not want to put perversity back in by including a sparsity formula in the SSA that does not work. It is a technical and complex issue. None the less, sparsity raises proper and legitimate questions. There is no simple solution. We need to reconsider the means by which we distribute grants. I hope that we shall be able to do that during the wider consultation that we hope to undertake later this year.

I am aware of the financial pressures faced by the Shropshire and Wrekin fire authority, and other authorities. Indeed, in May I met a delegation from the authority, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden), to discuss its concerns about funding. More generally, we listened carefully to fire authorities' concerns during the comprehensive spending review. That provided that fire authorities in England would receive, overall, an increase in the fire service element of total standard spending of £143.6 million over three years, including £47.4 million, 3.5 per cent., for 2000-01. That is well above the settlements that were given under the previous Government. We are listening carefully to the representations of the fire service. It will take time for us to undo some of the problems that we have inherited, but we are determined to try to deal with them.

Mr. Paterson: The Minister kindly wrote to me on 14 June suggesting that my proposed delegation of all Shropshire's MPs to visit him should be postponed until after publication of the Green Paper. I want to stress the intense hostility, in Whitchurch and Market Drayton, to the proposed changes, which are forced on the fire authority, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow has said, by the failures of the spending formula. Will the Minister commit himself to accepting a delegation before a final decision is made?

Mr. O'Brien: I shall certainly see a group of MPs—it might be appropriate to see the chief fire officer and chairman of the fire authority as well—before a final decision is made. I have no problem in giving that undertaking.

I have mentioned already that the increase in funding for 2000-01 was 3.5 per cent. as a national average. Shropshire and Wrekin's share of total standard spending for the fire service for 2000-01 has increased by the above average 4.4 per cent. That increase should be seen in the context of the firefighters' pay award of 2 November, but the Government have recognised the problems of Shropshire. We have acknowledged them in the funding for Shropshire, and provided extra help. I do not deny that there are inherited problems, which remain serious. I hope that we can tackle those in the long term, by considering the standard spending assessment overall so that we can deal with the wider problems of counties such as Shropshire, and in the shorter term, in dealing with the section 19 application when it is made. We should look at the question in the round.

I assure the hon. Member for Ludlow that no decision will be made that will put at risk the lives of people in Shropshire. Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services will advise the Home Office on whether there is a risk to lives. Our clear position is that we do not put lives at risk. Sometimes difficult judgments must be made, but if Her Majesty's inspectorate advises us of a serious risk to lives, the relevant application will not be approved. However, if the advice is that the matter concerns redistribution and doing things differently, we shall, while others may take a different view, weigh heavily the views of those who have great experience and knowledge about the risks of fire.

I hope that I have provided some reassurance. I thank the hon. Member for Ludlow for initiating the debate, which concerns matters of great importance. I shall consider them very carefully when the section 19 application and the future funding of the fire service in Shropshire are considered.

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): I declare an interest. I chaired the Low Pay Unit from 1988 to 1998, I am trustee of the Daycare Trust, and I am parliamentary representative on the executive committee of UNED-UK, for which I was nominated by Globe UK, of which I am the vice-chair.

I thank Madam Speaker for allowing this Adjournment debate on the conclusions of the UN social summit, the 24th special session of the General Assembly, entitled "World Summit for Social Development and Beyond: achieving social development for all in a globalising world", which was held in Geneva in June. It is a plus five UN conference, following the pattern of the UN subject-specific conferences that followed the Rio conference of 1992 on development and the environment.

The first social summit was held in Copenhagen in 1995 and I was present as a delegate representing local government. In 2000, I was a non-governmental organisation delegate on the UNED-UK delegation. I was pleased to discover that the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities, the right hon. Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Ms Jowell), was leading the Government delegation. The summit looked back on what had been achieved in social development over the past five years, as well as looking forward to the UN development targets for 2015. The Minister laid a well-received emphasis on UK domestic policies in her address to the plenary session. It was an example of a developed country reporting on what it had done to deal with poverty rather than lecturing developing countries on what they must do. I am proud of our policies on the new deal, child care, the working families tax credit, the minimum wage, and so on. In contrast, Baroness Chalker, the leader of the delegation in 1995, completely ignored the subject of poverty in the UK.

The UK national report, dated December 1999 and presented to a UNED-UK conference in March 2000, has been widely welcomed, especially as a statement of intent. I particularly commend to hon. Members the social indicators in annexe 1. Will the Minister tell me when the first statistical series will be published to measure progress and the House given a chance to debate them? The only criticism of the report is that civil society in the UK was not involved in the analysis or conclusions before its publication. If the Government are almost to prescribe that civil society be involved in developing countries' Governments' reports on progress on social development, it is important that the Government should operate in the same way in the UK. I am always told that third-party endorsement is much the best.

The conference was attended by more than 7,000 people and some 160 Governments were represented. The UK report stood up well in comparison with progress elsewhere. The summit called for, among other things, the number of persons living in extreme poverty to be halved by 2015; the achievement of free, universal primary education by 2015; the avoidance of unilateral measures affecting the health and well-being of women and children, and greater steps to ease the debt burdens of developing countries. In opening the special session, Secretary-General Kofi Annan called for an end to extreme squalor, which he said was > an affront to common humanity.

He also said that no country could be called truly prosperous so long as many of its citizens were left to fend for themselves in the face of ignorance, hardship and disease.

Plainly, improvement since 1995 has been slight. The Oxfam report "Missing the target: the price of empty promises", available on its website, clearly sets out the failure of the international community. Controversially, at the beginning of the conference, a review document, "2000: A Better World for All", was jointly published by the UN, the World Bank, the IMF and the OECD. It was controversial because many non-governmental organisations felt that the UN should not be so directly associated with the other institutions. I disagree; the UN needs to ensure that those institutions works with it and are tied into the UN agenda. Furthermore, the factual analysis, which was not challenged by the NGOs, showed that while significant improvements are taking place elsewhere, many countries in Africa need special help—a message that was reiterated in the conference outcomes.

The document, "Voices of the Poor: Crying Out for Change", which was launched at the conference, was badged as being by the World Bank, but is in fact a co-production with the Department for International Development. It is a part of a series that started with "Can Anyone Hear Us?", published at the beginning of the year, and will end with "From Many Lands", which will be published at the end of the year. In the series, a poor man from Adaboya in Ghana is quoted as saying > Poverty is like heat; you cannot see it; you can only feel it; so to know poverty you have to go through it.

We all need to be reminded that sustainable social development can be achieved only by building from the bottom up, not the top down.

In a lengthy final document, the summit reflected concerns that had come to light or assumed greater prominence since the 1995 social summit in Copenhagen. In reaction to the Asian financial crisis, measures were recommended to assist in warning about, preventing and mitigating the effects of sudden international financial flows. Steps were called for to help countries in transition to market economies preserve and enhance basic social services and link up with global markets.

The final document, completed after the session was prolonged into a Saturday meeting, urged the reallocation of resources from excessive military expenditures to social programmes in response to the debt problems of middle-income developing countries. It also urged efforts to refrain from using food and medicine as tools for political pressure.

The conclusions in the outcomes document run to nearly 100 pages. I cannot discuss all the points, but they are on the website, which is www.un.org/socialsummit. The document consists of three parts. Part one contains a ringing political declaration on the centrality of more equitable, socially just and people-centred societies. Part two is an update on the five years since Copenhagen, and part three contains 160 paragraphs on new initiatives in the 10 Copenhagen commitments.

The 10 commitments were to create an enabling environment for social development; to eradicate poverty; to promote full employment; to promote social integration; to promote full respect for human dignity and ensure that equity and equality are fulfilled; to provide education and access to primary health care for all; to accelerate development within Africa and the least developed countries; to ensure structural adjustment programmes to include social development goals; to increase resources; and to promote co-operation to deliver social development. I have paraphrased what is said more eloquently in the outcomes document.

What does the Minister think about the new initiatives? Commitment one is to enhance partnerships with business, trade unions and civil society at a national level in support of the goals of the summit. How do the Government plan to enhance such partnerships? Commitment three is to promote the goal of full employment. I am pleased that the Minister, who was present at the conference, announced that the Government will support the convening of a world employment forum by the International Labour Organisation in 2001, and that they have now ratified all the core ILO conventions, including ILO convention 182 on banning the worst forms of child labour. Well done. Can that be publicised, especially in terms of the ethical trading initiative? I have read nothing of it in the press. While I deplore overspinning, the matter has been underspun.

Commitment four is to promote social integration. Will the Government > facilitate the contribution of civil society organisations to relevant international forums?

That is a quotation from the document. It was disappointing that the United Kingdom delegation did not include civil society. The Trades Union Congress and NGOs asked to participate in the delegation, but apparently were too late.

Can it be a basic rule for all United Nations conferences that standard invitations go to business, trade unions and non-governmental organisations, which then nominate at least one representative to the delegation? This time, the UK delegation had none. Having said that, I thank the officials and the Minister for the courtesy that they extended to the representatives of NGOs who separately attended the conference.

Commitment five concerns equality and equity between women and men, and it reiterates a call for the gender mainstreaming of all social development policies. That has recently been dealt with in detail at the five-year review of the World Conference on Women, Beijing plus five, which was held in June. The document also calls on Governments to > consider signing and ratifying the optional protocol to the convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

The UK Government have fought hard for the optional protocol at international level, so when will Ministers sign and ratify it? In promoting social integration, will the Government support the Second World Assembly on Ageing, which will be held in Spain in 2002?

Commitment six concerns education for all. Following the World Education Forum in Dakar, do the Government commit to their part in the $8 billion additional support for increased development assistance and debt relief for education and health care for all? A successful side meeting of the World Trade Organisation on intellectual property rights took place at the same time as the social summit. What actions do the Government intend on public-private partnerships to invest in research aimed at finding affordable remedies for diseases that especially afflict people in developing countries? That is a new commitment over and above that relating to HIV/AIDS.

In relation to commitment seven to accelerate development in Africa and the least developed countries, will the Government comment on the commitment to raise Overseas Development Administration funding from 0.15 per cent. to 0.2 per cent. of GNP for those countries? It was good that Ireland promised to be the sixth country to reach the overall UN aid target of 0.7 per cent. of GNP, and announced an immediate increase in order to reach that goal. I hope that the Government's comprehensive spending review will show similar commitment. It is equally important to ensure that ODA funding goes to the least developed countries. How are we measuring up to the 0.2 per cent. target for least developed countries? Are the Government working on the 20:20 initiative, in co-operation with civil society, to ensure access to basic social services for all in the countries of the world? I do not expect the Minister to have answers to all of those questions available now, but I look forward to his written replies.

Commitment nine would significantly increase the resources allocated to social development. I would like the Minister to respond in relation to that today. He may have a copy of my letter to the Financial Times of 6 July and my early-day motion 920 on 3 July, in which I celebrated moves at the summit to investigate the Tobin tax. The alternative social summit, which was held by NGOs the week before, concentrated on debt relief and the Tobin tax. Adjournment debates on the matter have been held in this Chamber this year, and parliamentarians all over the world are supporting the investigation of a Tobin tax.

The Canadian delegation took the lead at the summit by tabling a call for such an investigation, while the EU delegation, including the UK, supported it. Paragraph 111 emerged at the end of the negotiations. It states that the Governments agree to conduct > a rigorous analysis of advantages, disadvantages and other implications of proposals for developing new and imaginative sources of funding, both public and private, for dedication to social development and poverty eradication programmes.

Therefore, a study will be authorised, without dissent by the member countries of the UN, into a currency transfer tax—the Tobin tax—and other potential sources of revenue for social development. The form of words in paragraph 111 was agreed as a compromise that will enable a broader study. The Canadian delegate spoke at the final plenary, partly to say explicitly that the intention behind the paragraph is that a study of the currency transfer tax should be made.

Clearly, that could be the start of more effective global public management of the international financial system. Given that the UK, through the EU, supported an investigation of the currency transfer tax, what does the Minister believe is the first step in such an investigation? What do the Government intend to do?

[Mr. Tony Colman]

Will they work with the EU on proposals for the high-level intergovernmental event on financing for development, which will be held in 2001? Could a paper be tabled before Parliament before that event to enable a full parliamentary debate to take place? Do the Government intend to consult with financial institutions and academics—and NGOs, especially the Association pour la Taxation des Transactions Financières pour l'Aide aux Citoyens and War on Want—on the advantages, disadvantages and other implications of a Tobin tax?

The Government may want to comment on other proposals under commitment nine—international co-operation in tax matters; methods for dividing the liability of multinational corporations to pay taxes on profits among the various jurisdictions in which they operate; ways to combat the use of tax shelters and tax havens; mechanisms to stabilise commodity export earnings; ways to prevent tax avoidance and promoting treaties for avoiding double taxation; exploring ways and means to increase and widen flows of public and private financial resources to developing countries; and, promoting the micro and small enterprise sector. Another crucial mechanism is, of course, the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, as well as achieving the important goal of allocating 0.7 per cent. of GDP to the ODA.

I have dealt with new sources of finance at length because developing countries feel betrayed in that regard. Few countries have equalled the UK Government's real terms increase of 29 per cent. in ODA funding since 1997. Neither debt relief, aid nor trade is enough. A global taxation arrangement is necessary to provide the resources that will ensure that poverty is eradicated around the globe.

Commitment 10, which deals with promoting a partnership framework for delivering social development, lacks clarity on the way forward. Can the Minister tell us about any proposals tabled at the Economic and Social Committee of the European Union for following up this summit and the other plus five summits? The summits need to be drawn together, at least to ensure co-ordination of resources for agreed targets. The social summit covered the full range of world interests, with the exception of the environment. Does the Minister consider that there is a case ahead of Rio plus 10 and the 2002 summit for bringing together the Commissions on Social Development and Sustainable Development, so that their yearly focus is together rather than separate?

> invite parliamentarians to continue to adopt legislative measures and to expand awareness raising, necessary for implementing the commitments of the World Summit for Social Developments and the further initiatives contained in the present document, and encourage the contribution of the IPU in this effect.

At the summit, the Inter-Parliamentary Union held a well-attended event at the ILO to review social security provisions throughout the world. Parliamentarians for Global Action held a separate one-day conference at the World Economic Forum on Social Development, with the noble Lord Paul of Marylebone as a key speaker. I understand that there is an intention to hold a joint World Trade Organisation and Inter-Parliamentary Union conference in February 2001 to examine the basis of a new development round. Clearly, parliamentarians throughout the world wish to support Governments who want to ensure that social development succeeds for all the people. We are the full representatives of civil society through the ballot box and we know that our voters want action. What action do the Government intend to take in response to the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development?

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Peter Hain): My hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) is an excellent parliamentarian. I know that, because he is my Member of Parliament. I thank him for providing me with the opportunity to discuss the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development. I welcome the special expertise that he has brought to the debate and the energetic way in which he is following matters through, which is extremely helpful to both the House and the Government. He has identified the importance of such issues.

As the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is the lead Department in the process, I have pleasure in replying to the debate. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities addressed last month's special session of the UN General Assembly entitled "The World Summit for Social Development and Beyond: achieving social development for all in a globalising world". She emphasised the Government's determination to ensure that the wealth and opportunities created by globalisation are used to reduce global poverty.

Before turning to some of my hon. Friend's specific informed questions, I shall comment on the Copenhagen process more generally. The declaration and programme of action agreed at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in 1995 provided a clear framework for all countries to develop policies to promote social justice and to combat poverty. For the first time, agreement was reached on the importance of economic and social policies being mutually reinforcing. Economic growth, opportunity and fairness go hand in hand. An economy in which a significant proportion of the population is unable to fulfil its potential will be poorer and less productive. Stable and sustainable pro-poor economic growth and sound social policy are crucial in combating poverty.

We have worked hard to promote economic growth and social justice, both at home and overseas, in line with the commitments made in Copenhagen. Our ambition is for everyone in all countries to have the opportunity to make a contribution, to work, to learn, to enjoy the benefits of economic prosperity and to participate in community life. Although British society is rich in its diversity, not all of our citizens have always had the opportunity to maximise their potential and contribute to society. Economic growth, together with effective policies to help people into work, make work pay and raise skills through lifelong learning, have formed the basis of the Government's strategy to further social development at home.

Last September, in a document "Opportunity for All", we committed ourselves to increasing opportunity, tackling the root causes of poverty and investing in individuals and communities. We also identified a range of indicators against which progress could be monitored on income, employment, education, health, housing, pension provision and fear of crime. Our strategy is producing encouraging results. The number of those in employment has increased by more than 900,000 since the general election and long-term unemployment has been cut by half since May 1997. The proportion of children in workless households has fallen from 20 per cent. in spring 1994 to 17.6 per cent. in spring 1999. Furthermore, budget measures will lift 1.2 million children out of poverty by next year.

The Government have also demonstrated their commitment to promoting the goal of full employment agreed in Copenhagen five years ago. Our approach can be summarised as, "Work for those who can, security for those who cannot." Our policies and initiatives were designed to move people from dependence to independence. The new deal programme is the United Kingdom's largest ever investment in work. At its heart lies the simple proposition that the vast majority of workless people have the potential to earn their own living but, in the early days of going back to work or becoming self-employed, both employee and employer need positive help. The acquisition of new skills is essential for preventing poverty and social exclusion. For those out of work, the new deal provides access to a wider range of job opportunities and a route back to employment; for those in work, it provides a way of meeting changing job demands, finding greater job security and improving incomes.

The achievements of the new deal have been impressive. It provides intensive and substantial support for young people, the long-term unemployed, lone parents, people with disabilities, older workers and partners of unemployed people. Unemployment is much lower as a result of the new deal and employment is at record levels, with 27.78 million people now in work in the United Kingdom. That figure represents 74.3 per cent. of the working age population.

The Government have a legislative framework to promote social inclusion and increased opportunity for all. The Human Rights Act 1998 incorporates fundamental rights and freedoms in the European convention on human rights into United Kingdom law. That safeguards our basic liberties in law as enforceable rights and will help build a culture of respect for rights and responsibilities throughout the country. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 introduced new statutory offences for racist crime and placed a new statutory responsibility on local authorities and the police to reduce crime and disorder. Those Acts, and part IV of the Family Law Act 1996, are also important in strengthening measures to prevent violence against women.

In our international development work, to which my hon. Friend referred, the eradication of poverty forms our central goal. There is no doubt that enormous advances in poverty reduction are possible over the next few decades. There are still massive obstacles to overcome but, with increased political will across Governments and civil society worldwide, the target of reducing by half the number of people living in extreme poverty by 2015 can be met.

The Government recognise that progress depends, first and foremost, on the efforts of developing countries themselves, but they can only succeed if the international community provides effective support. We have worked hard to mobilise the international community into purposeful, meaningful action, not least by continuing to push for debt relief focused on poverty reduction in heavily indebted poor countries. We are also working for a more collaborative and harmonised approach among donors, coupled with genuine ownership of the process by recipient countries.

Britain is committed to working for the worldwide observance of labour standards to uplift the poorest members of society. In June 1998, member states of the ILO unanimously adopted a declaration on fundamental principles and rights at work, which covers freedom of association, collective bargaining, the elimination of discrimination and the abolition of forced and child labour. By adopting the ILO declaration, countries reaffirm their obligations to respect, promote and realise those principles.

As I have outlined, Britain has made substantial progress in furthering social development at national and international level since the world summit five years ago. The aim of those gathered in Geneva last month was not merely to assess the progress made in meeting the Copenhagen commitments; Governments agreed that it was important to identify new initiatives that take account of developments over the past five years and enable a more effective implementation of the Copenhagen declaration and programme of action, as my hon. Friend has called for.

In her statement to the UN General Assembly, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities emphasised that a key objective for Britain at the special session was the need to define principles to underpin social policy. National ownership is crucial for the development of any effective social policy, and it is imperative to take full account of regional and national differences. For that reason, the United Nations is uniquely placed to lead an exploration of the key aspects of social policy that are essential for economic development.

I am pleased to inform the House that agreement was reached in Geneva that the UN's commission for social development should set in hand an exchange of experience and best practices involving the UN itself, its specialised agencies and the international financial institutions. We look forward to seeing the results of that exercise, initiated by the United Kingdom, in the months to come. The special session to follow up the world summit for social development also reached consensus on several other new initiatives to enhance implementation of the Copenhagen commitment. UN member states reiterated their commitment to the target of reducing by half the proportion of people living in extreme poverty, and committed themselves to a target date of 2015.

In Geneva last month, UN member states also reached agreement on a strong reference to ratification of the core ILO conventions, which are essential instruments for protecting workers' rights, increasing social dialogue and ensuring respect for individuals. The General Assembly recognised the important part that businesses play in social development, and the need to encourage the private sector, as well as the public sector, to exercise its social responsibilities.

My hon. Friend asked several interesting questions, to which the Government will provide written responses in due course, and I shall arrange for those responses to be placed in the Library of the House of Commons. However, I shall deal with four of his points now. He mentioned a currency transaction, or Tobin, tax. I have seen his early-day motion, 920, and his letter to the Financial Times. The special session agreed to analyse proposals for developing new and innovative sources of funding for social development, and one of those proposals is likely to be a tax on international currency transactions.

The Government believe that a so-called Tobin tax could have several serious drawbacks. In particular, it might introduce economic distortions into the international financial system, and it is unlikely to be effective in a crisis. It would also be practically impossible to achieve global coverage, and there would be huge scope for avoidance. Unless those drawbacks can be overcome, a tax on currency transactions will not be a viable source of funds for social development. Nevertheless, it is an important proposal, and the Government will be interested to see the results of an analysis of such proposals in the months ahead.

Mr. Colman: As London is the world financial centre, rather than waiting for conclusions, might the Government be willing to take the initiative for such an investigation, examining both disadvantages and advantages, much as we have led on the HIPC initiative?

Mr. Hain: I shall obviously consult ministerial colleagues who have direct responsibility for the matter, and I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's request is brought to their attention. We recognise that the issue must be examined carefully to ascertain the progress that can be made. I welcome the energy that he has contributed to the debate.

I agree with my hon. Friend about the crucial importance of international action on HIV/AIDS. The special session defined more clearly the contribution of health to social development, and identified the fight against HIV/AIDS and other major pandemics as central priorities for action in Africa and the least developed world. An appeal has been made to the private sector to develop medicines at affordable prices for the worst affected developing countries. A notable advance in that respect is the special session's recognition of the importance of supporting exemptions to intellectual property rights, giving due regard to international laws and agreements, in order to promote access to essential medicines that can save lives.

I strongly agree with my hon. Friend about the need to ensure better co-ordination of follow-up processes to global conferences in the 1990s. The UK, with our EU partners, is working towards that end during the current session of the UN's Economic and Social Council.

I acknowledge the valuable role played by my hon. Friend and members of the private sector and civil society in Britain through participation in the international symposium organised by the Swiss Government and exchanges with the British delegation before and during the Geneva meeting. We were offered valuable support, direction and encouragement in the negotiating process. We must now continue to work together to ensure that the commitments made in Copenhagen and renewed and developed in Geneva are pursued with vigour in the years ahead. Only then can we genuinely claim to have achieved the goal of social development for all in a globalising world.

I note the points that my hon. Friend firmly and legitimately made about participation of NGOs in Government delegations. We shall examine carefully the composition of future delegations, because we as a Government are more open to NGOs and civil society in general than any of our predecessors. We have, for example, NGO secondees working in the Foreign Office, and our own staff have been seconded to work in several NGOs that have Foreign Office interests. We want an open-door policy towards NGOs, and we shall consult on exactly how that can be accommodated in the context of international conferences and the composition of delegations. Regardless of the final outcome, I give a commitment to consultation with NGOs.

It being One o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 12 July 2000

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Health Action Zones

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. McNulty.]

9.30 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is nice to start the day in the knowledge that we are adjourning. That always strikes me as odd.

I want to raise the subject of the funding of health action zones and I hope that the Minister will have comfort, if not good news, for them when he replies. I welcome the principle behind health action zones. The Labour Government of 1974 to 1979 recognised that there were serious problems of inequality relating to health and that, in some areas of the country, people lived longer. Similar variations included infant mortality, notifiable diseases and accident rates. The discovery was not new. The relevant work had been going on for a long time. I was fascinated at school by the works of Dudley Stamp on the geography of life and death, in which he demonstrated that people living near steelworks lived for a shorter time than others and that poor housing led to low life expectancy.

The 1974-79 Government saw from the record of the national health service since 1947 that there were serious inequalities in health provision between different parts of the country and commissioned Sir Douglas Black to produce his excellent report on inequalities in health care and the resulting problems affecting life expectancy. The incoming Conservative Government in 1979 promptly banned the publication of the report, because of its implication that much redirection of resources was needed.

I was pleased when the previous Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), not only recognised many of those issues but also agreed, through the publication of the Green Paper, "Our Healthier Nation", and the establishment of health action zones, to examine health inequality in particular areas. That was very welcome. At the heart of what has been said on public policy direction and reducing health inequalities is that > all policies likely to have a direct or indirect effect on health should be evaluated in terms of their impact on health inequalities...all those policies should be formulated to favour the less well-off and so, wherever possible, will reduce health inequalities...priority should be given to the health of women of child-bearing age, expectant mothers and young children...further steps should be taken to reduce income inequalities and improve the living standards of poor households.

I welcome that approach.

Today is a good time for this debate, because the Government are announcing the reintroduction, after the tragedy of their 20-year lapse, of nutritional standards for school meals. Simple things like the food that is provided for young people in the morning and reasonable school lunches have an enormous impact not just on health, but on the ability to study. The Government's strategy of promoting greater health expenditure to deal with health inequalities is important. There are terrifying differences in the levels of serious illness, life expectancy and infant mortality in different parts of the country—for example, in the inner-London ring, by which I mean Lambeth, Lewisham, Tower Hamlets, Newham, Islington, Hackney, Camden, Hammersmith and Southwark. One sees huge inequalities in health in the inner-London ring between those areas and wealthy areas of central London, such as Kensington and Westminster. If one makes a comparison with suburbs further out, such as Golders Green or, even further out, Merton and Kingston, one sees massive inequality. A journey down the Old Kent road from central London to the Surrey suburbs would lead from a place of considerable wealth and high life expectancy through some of the worst cases of public health in Europe. The position changes quickly when one gets a bit further out.

There are many complex reasons why life expectancy is so different, one of which is the conditions under which people work. Building workers, miners, street cleaners, refuse collectors and others in dirty and dangerous occupations are more likely to end up with bronchial-related conditions and more likely to die in accidents at work than people in higher-paid, office-based employment. The Government cannot necessarily solve that problem, but matters can be much improved through rigorous enforcement of health and safety at work legislation.

Inequality in child health often leads to inequality in later life. Children growing up in overcrowded, small flats, where illness is transmitted easily from one child to another, might be unable to do homework properly because there is nowhere quiet to do it. With parents on a low income, they are less likely to eat good-quality, healthy food. They might end up being off school more because they are ill and they might under-achieve at school because they are off so much. They are unlikely to go to college or university or to get jobs for which they might be perfectly capable but for which they could not become qualified.

Those problems cannot all be solved by the Department of Health, but it is important to recognise that much inequality arises from such issues. We must study carefully how the problem is tackled. Merely throwing money at problems does not necessarily solve them. It is a question of approach and how money is spent. I strongly welcome the thrust of what the Government are doing in recognising the causes of health inequalities and in putting together a series of programmes that improve education, access to health care and basic living standards through a minimum wage, although I wish that the wage were much higher.

It is also a question of linking local initiatives, which is where the health action zones come in. Unfortunately, the then Secretary of State did not include the boroughs that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) represent—Camden and Islington—in the initial wave of health action zones, although they were included in the second phase. I can understand the reasons for that—the choices before the Minister were unenviable. He had inherited a terrible situation in the former coalfield communities, where life expectancy was low and where there was a high level of industrial illnesses and serious depression because of the loss of the coal industry and the community spirit that went with it. Coalfield communities were rightly in the first round, as was most of the east end of London.

I was pleased when my borough and Camden were included in the second phase of the health action zones because I still find the annual report from the medical officer for the health authority that I represent to be fascinating reading. When reading through it, one sees a pattern of inequality, illness and depression, which is linked to the problems of living in an urban area, of a migrant community and of public services that often fail to meet people's needs, expectations or aspirations. The declaration of a health action zone was an important recognition of the multiplicity of problems.

Our community has, unfortunately, among the highest infant mortality rates in the United Kingdom, one of the highest levels of AIDS, some of the worst housing in the country and a hugely migratory population. In some wards, population turnover approaches 20 per cent. a year, which makes it difficult to build communities or a community spirit. There is a large transient population and the number of homeless people and rough sleepers is high. Public services struggle to make ends meet, to provide services and to survive. Whitehall has to assess the needs of health care services and of local authorities. Although we welcome any support that is given to our public services, it is difficult for Whitehall accurately to calculate the number of people who are sleeping rough or the number of asylum seekers who are passing through, especially if they are in bed-and-breakfast hotels or hostels. Such people, for perfectly understandable reasons, place an enormous demand on local health facilities and services.

The Government did us a service by establishing a health action zone for the area. The broad themes of the health action zone are, first,

> Tackling social, economic and environmental factors that are the root of ill health. This will prioritise areas that have particular relevance to children and young adults, such as early lives, social inclusion and addiction; secondly,

> Improving and integrating services, to increase their effectiveness, efficiency and responsiveness; and, thirdly,

> Developing the infrastructure to underpin the HAZ: for example the capacity for community involvement; better information management and technology; staff education and training; improvements to hospital and primary care premises.

Those are welcome aims. In addition, the implementation of the mental health strategy is an important priority for our own health action zone. In that context, a document on the achievements of the health action zone states:

> The added value that the HAZ brings to the work is providing the joint architecture which enables partnerships to flourish.

The mental health services of inner London are under enormous strain. Although we must deal with people who suffer mental illness in the best way possible, long-stay institutions are not necessarily the right approach. Community care is, in general, a much better option, provided there is sufficient funding, support and monitoring. Sadly, some patients were taken out of long-stay institutions and moved into community care institutions where the level of support and back-up became negligible. Many deeply disturbed people who needed significant help ended up wandering around the community and becoming social pariahs in their districts. Although I strongly support the principles of community care, I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say about monitoring it.

On overall funding of our health authority, the Government inherited a situation in which Camden and Islington health authority was in the unenviable position of being the only health authority to receive no increase in the last two years of the previous Government's life. The recent per capita cash increase of nearly £60 a head—a 6.79 per cent. increase—is extremely welcome and recognises the situation that we inherited. However, when the Government announced the creation of health action zones, there was substantial press coverage of associated funding. I am not criticising health action zones, but I hope that my hon. Friend will bear in mind a number of factors. How will the staff and facilities of health action zones integrate with community health authorities and hospital trusts and the health authority as a whole in the long term? Although I welcome specialist initiatives to deal with the particular problem, there is a danger that we will end up with a plethora of experienced, well-paid and well-meaning professionals who spend so much time meeting one another that they have no chance to do anything for the public that they are meant to support.

I am not looking through rose-tinted spectacles at the halcyon days of the late 1970s, but I remind hon. Members that a system in which one health authority had overall responsibility at least ensured clarity, as one knew whom one was meeting and at whom responsibility had to be directed.

When I consider similar issues now, I find myself in conversations with the health authority, the hospital trust, the community health trust, the health action zone and the primary care group—and so it goes on. They tell me that they are all working well together. Indeed, I am sure that they are doing so and that they get on extremely well, but I must say that they spend an awful lot of time getting on well and meeting one another. I hope that the Minister will use his examination of the role of health action zones as a spur to improve co-operation and integration—a suggestion that is made in a constructive, rather than a negative, spirit.

I am always depressed when I hear about the time that hospitals spend in trying to persuade elderly and often psycho-geriatric patients to leave hospital care and to go back into their homes, the community, social services care or wherever else. When co-operation works well, it is fine and there is a seamless transfer, but the result is different when it does not. That can happen when everybody is up against budgetary constraints, when the hospital is desperate to get rid of patients because they are blocking beds and it is expensive to keep them, and when social services can afford no more agency staff and can find nowhere to put people, and are therefore understandably reluctant to take on new patients. As a result, people who should no longer be in hospital are often bored out of their brains for weeks on end, blocking a bed that somebody else could use, whereas they should be in a cheaper facility elsewhere. Such issues must be resolved. I know that the Minister is aware of them, but will he reflect on them and suggest ways of dealing with the problems?

I turn now to funding the health and social services needs of a community. The Government have at their disposal a vast array of statistics on issues of poverty, inequality and ill health. Figures on free school meal take-up in primary schools can be used as a broad parameter of poverty. One finds enormous inequalities even within individual areas. My constituency is next to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate. In our area, one can go from schools in which 80 or 90 per cent. of pupils have free school meals to schools with a take-up of 25 or 30 per cent. Such schools are situated within a couple of miles of one another, which is, I suppose, a feature of London life. When the Minister reflects on such statistics and evaluates how circumstances change and improve, will he also consider the efficiency with which the various agencies co-operate?

The Camden and Islington health action zone was expecting an income of £4,075,000. It planned developments accordingly for years two and three. This year, however, the amount was reduced to £3,734,000, which meant that some of the schemes that it proposed could not go ahead. Consequently, it has had to reconfigure its plans. The Government made the cut because they were concerned about underspending. I understand their concern, as it is rightly expected that public money that has been made available for a project should be spent. As I understand it, however, the reason for the underspend was that the health action zone was anxious to ensure that its projects were efficient, well funded and well planned. It was felt that throwing money at its goals in the first year would not necessarily be the best way of achieving them. The zone has shown a degree of caution in its plans, but has been penalised for doing so, which seems slightly unfair. There is concern that the message sent by the Government's attitude to funding is that they no longer give the same priority to health action zones as they gave when the first phase was signalled a couple of years ago—or, in the case of the zone to which I am referring, a year ago—in a welcome announcement.

The health action zone is addressing issues of local health inequality and seeking to integrate with other groups. The improvements in relation to mental health are very important, as are those in relation to coronary heart disease, cancer, accident prevention among older people and drugs action team structures. In the case of the latter, it is easy for us to throw money at drugs action zones or groups and tell them to go away and deal with the problems because we are horrified to find that young people are taking hard drugs and becoming involved in drug dealing. However, it is important for any drugs team to be credible within the local community and to be seen to be effective, but that can take a long time to achieve.

The overall aims of the health action zone are to speed up improvements and integration of local services, tackling the underlying causes of ill health and building local capacity to sustain and improve health; aims that I am sure will be welcomed. I want to give some examples of the "early wins" that have already been delivered by local partnerships:

> Jointly managed and fully integrated Mental Health teams covering all localities—

we have had enormous problems with mental health, as I said earlier—

> Assertive Outreach and 24 hour access to Crisis Response and Resolution; this has led to a significant reduction in hospital admissions.
> Changes in service policy at the Whittington Hospital Trust as a result of the HAZ-sponsored Female Genital Mutilation (FGM) awareness programme;
> The introduction of welfare benefits advice in local GP practices;

That is extremely welcome, because cuts in advice services have resulted in many people not gaining access to the benefits to which they are entitled. At least if some advice is available from GP practices, that will be of assistance. The "early wins" also include:

> Multi-disciplinary sex education teams; 25 health professionals have been trained and their joint protocol ensures young people are linked into local services.

Various figures are quoted for the number of people who have given up smoking: 160 people in four weeks, although I have no idea how many of those took up smoking again. I get the feeling that some people are eternal quitters; they receive some sort of prize for quitting and then start smoking again, so that they can quit again, so one must be sceptical about figures for a reduction in smoking. However, health education to prevent young people from taking up smoking is very important.

The "early wins" also include:

> Increased levels of participation in physical activity particularly among older people.

That is achieved through health fitness and training in day centres, which is very welcome. Indeed, on Sunday, I was involved in the opening of a day's health fair organised by Arachne, a Cypriot women's organisation. The day included a discussion about health and fitness, and various exercises and complementary therapies were featured by a project known as Healthy Islington 2000, which works closely with the health action zone and others.

More "early wins" are:

> A number of deprived communities are already more engaged in health promoting activities.
> Health Promoting School Scheme in place in nine pilot schools.
> Sure Start Initiatives in deprived areas outwith the nationally designated pilot areas.
> A training programme for refugee doctors and nurses with qualifications from overseas has been established.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) would strongly endorse that. Many asylum-seeking nurses and doctors are extremely well qualified in their own countries, but because of the delays, difficulties and, dare I say, obstructions caused by professional organisations, we are losing the skills of people who want to contribute to our society and who do not want to spend time waiting for their cases to be resolved, as I am sure the Minister appreciates. If we can speed up that process and help with language training, where necessary, those highly skilled people will be able to help the community. Anyone who has seen the effective work of health advocates, who are able to offer translation facilities, will know that they have an enormous impact on the health of individuals and improve the self-esteem of their families.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

I welcome the establishment of health action zones and the recognition of the link between inequality and ill health. However, I am disappointed that, within a year of our health action zone starting, the planned expenditure had to be reduced by such a considerable sum. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister recognises that the underspending was the result of caution; people want to be responsible with public money and not throw it at projects in order to gain more money in future years.

The question is how public expenditure should be planned. I look forward to my hon. Friend's response. If he would like to visit our health action zone again, those groups would be pleased to meet him and discuss with him the positive work that has been done to try to give everyone a reasonable chance in life and, as far as possible, equality of access to health care. We must overcome inequalities between the suburbs and inner cities if we are to achieve any sort of harmony within our society.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): First, Mr. Lord, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) not only on obtaining this debate but on choosing to speak on a subject of such importance. As he said, Mr. Lord—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I remind the hon. Lady that, in this Chamber, the occupant of the Chair is referred to as the Deputy Speaker.

Ms Jackson: Please accept my most humble apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and thank you for enlarging my information pool.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North was at pains to point out, the Camden and Islington health trust covers several constituencies and boroughs. My constituency of Hampstead and Highgate, which is invariably misrepresented by the popular press as being inhabited exclusively by millionaires who do nothing but sip champagne and chatter, contains areas of grave deprivation. My hon. Friend welcomed the Government's move to create health action zones to try to tackle inequalities in the delivery of health care. Although we were disappointed that we did not achieve a health action zone in the first tranche, we were delighted to be part of the second wave. As my hon. Friend said, the complexities inherent in attempting to tackle inequalities of health provision are themselves a major burden; it takes time, effort and partnership to tackle them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North mentioned the disappointment felt by the chairman of the Camden and Islington health trust and the director of the health action zone on hearing of the reduction in funding to the HAZ. Richard Sumray, chairman of the Camden and Islington health authority, said that the HAZ leaders conference on 6-7 October 1999 was told that it could assume for planning purposes that it would receive £1,874,000 for the year 2000-01. As we know, that amount has now been reduced. Richard Sumray told me in a fax that the allocation for HAZ includes variable funds that are ring-fenced. He went on to say:

> Had all of the funds been allocated at the same time, there would not be a problem but it is the timing of such an announcement and consequently the effect of it on our partner organisations which will be extremely deleterious.

I want to speak about the impact of the Government's most recent announcement on those partners that are essential in enabling the HAZ board to achieve genuine equality of health provision in our area. As I said, we were elated by the announcement that Camden and Islington would have a health action zone as part of the second tranche. I believe that that sense of elation was felt by everyone in the boroughs who was involved in delivering health care across a wide range of areas, by the recipients of health care and by those who believed that much better and more integrated work could be done across the boroughs in delivering, improving and targeting health care.

No one was under any illusion that a single agency or organisation could deliver and improve on equality in health care provision. Everyone involved accepted from the very beginning that success would depend on genuine partnerships being put in place. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North talked of meetings for meetings' sake. I do not believe that such meetings deliver anything other than, perhaps, the enjoyment of participants of such meetings at seeing each other. Undoubtedly, a great deal of detailed work must be done before partnerships for delivering can be in place. Everyone must be clear about what they are trying to achieve and how to achieve it, and must actively monitor whether they are delivering.

In a fax to me, Gail Findlay, the director of HAZ in Camden and Islington, expressed anxiety that what seems to be a reduction in funding for HAZ programmes might send the wrong message to the partners involved, who are, as I said, central and essential to delivering the desired outcomes. It might be perceived as the Government losing confidence in health action zones, which I and deliverers of health provision in my constituency believe to be innovative and to incorporate in exactly the right way the experience of health professionals, of people who receive the services of health professionals and of people who are active in campaigning organisations. One of those organisations, Age Concern, is holding discussions with a health action zone on a programme to build on the accessibility of exercise for elderly people, to ensure that their health improves.

The partners may regard the development as a lack of conviction on the part of the Government that health action zones will deliver what we all believe that they can. There may be a perceived lack of confidence in the Government in this innovative and exciting venture and a lack of commitment on their part to see the programme through the full seven-year period.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to restore confidence, especially in those in my constituency who are most actively engaged in delivering in the health action zone. Quite apart from tackling, rightly, the scandal of inequality in health provision, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said, it is not the Government's fault that such inequalities exist. It is a question of time. The root causes are many and varied, and there may be a tradition of expectation and aspiration not being encouraged by individuals, families or communities about the level and quality of the health provision that they receive.

We are beginning to tackle those central and essential issues via health action zones and many other innovative programmes that the Government are introducing in health care. On one level, in dealing with health action zones, prevention is better than cure. I have already mentioned encouraging elderly people and making it easier for them to exercise to ensure that they maintain mobility and that their health improves.

At the other end of the age scale, we have the Sure Start initiative's marvellously imaginative approach to children, which will make an amazing difference for far too many children who have been allowed to live in poverty for far too long. That programme will give them a start in life to enable them to discover what is best in them and what can be developed. None of that is possible without constant monitoring to ensure that health provision is in place.

More than 30 schools are taking part in Camden and Islington's programme to tackle health in schools. One of those schools, Beckford school, is operating a befriending scheme whereby 25 nine and 10-year-olds are helping to look after the emotional health of younger pupils by becoming "playground buddies". Although I do not necessarily like the Americanisation—the name "buddies"—the scheme has immense value, not only for the young children who will be assisted to find their feet in the wider environment of a secondary school, but for those who participate because they wish to help younger children. That is not only part and parcel of delivering on a health requirement and outcome, but intrinsic to ensuring that we have healthy communities. It encourages a sense of community in young people from the earliest possible age.

My hon. Friend touched on the issue of targeting by the health action zone in Camden and Islington to encourage smokers to quit. As a smoker who has never had the desire to quit, I should not linger too long on this incentive. Although I would not go so far as to use the phrase "professional quitters", I agree with my hon. Friend that some people seem to quit as part-time entertainment—

Mr. Corbyn: Serial quitters.

Ms Jackson: That is precisely the phrase that I was stumbling to find. Those of us who are still trapped by nicotine know who those people are. They invariably say that they have quit, but then say that they are having difficulties, and ask, "Could I bum a cigarette off you?" I am making light of a serious issue, especially as far as young people are concerned. It is one of the areas in which health action zones can make an enormous difference.

My hon. Friend touched on the special difficulties in our part of inner London. Those difficulties are not exclusive to Camden and Islington, but are shared by all inner London boroughs. They are related to the peripatetic life style of people suffering mental health problems, and perhaps drug and alcohol-related problems. In relation to homelessness and rough sleeping, our constituencies include large refugee populations, who have difficulties because English is their second language. That is exacerbated, in many instances, by cultural and traditional approaches not only to the treatment of illness but to access to health professionals. Health action zones can make a major difference because they involve a wider range of partnership in which health delivery professionals had not previously engaged. A wealth of expertise exists, on which health action zones, by virtue of their partnership basis, can deliver. That would be extremely difficult to define on a simple accountancy cost-benefit basis. None the less, the benefits can be enormous and incalculable.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to calm the fears of those who are enthusiastic and committed to the idea of health action zones, and that the work will continue, involving not only the health trust but all those partners who are actively engaged in tackling the kind of issues that we have touched on. I hope that he will give an assurance that the Government are as confident of supporting the schemes for the first seven years as they were when they were introduced. I regret the reduction in funding, for the reasons that I have given, and the timing of the announcement. My hon. Friend the Minister apologised for the delay in his letter to the chairs of the health action zones, which was courteously copied for the relevant Members of Parliament. He said that he was concerned about what he perceived as an underspend in the first year of funding for the zones.

It is time consuming and difficult to set up the partnerships in the first instance. The zone director in my area was adamant that no purpose would have been served by throwing money at the problem and regarded it as a grievous waste of public money to do so. Structures are now set up within their partnership structure that can successfully deliver. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) will make the point to our hon. Friend the Minister that the underspend in the first year was not due to a lack of willingness on the part of the HAZ directors or partners, or a dearth of problems on which to spend the money. The underspend came out of a desire to ensure that public money was well spent and delivered services in not only the short but the long term.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) for securing the debate.

I commend the Government for focusing on, and rooting out, health inequalities. An impediment to equality has been a compartmental approach to health problems; one of the key aims of the health action zones is to break down that type of compartmentalisation. The best thing about the zones is that, for the first time, British Government thinking embraces a wider definition of ill health and its causes, such as poverty. That can only be a good thing for hon. Members such as myself who represent deprived inner-city areas that are stricken by poverty and inequality of opportunity, manifested perniciously in life-long health inequalities.

The Government's Sure Start programme is another example of that cross-departmental approach. On the Ocean estate in my constituency, 480 children under the age of four have been identified as needing help. Throughout Tower Hamlets, £1 million will be spent on trying to improve the early years of some of our most vulnerable children.

That brings me on to one of the main problems with the HAZ programme. The Sure Start programme, which I welcome, exposes the many cracks that HAZ attempts to paper over. One local general practitioner asked me whether I thought it made sense for money to be spent on Sure Start when, in Tower Hamlets, the most basic health services—the ability to get an appointment with one's doctor, or even to be on a doctor's register or to have health visitors—cannot be consistently delivered. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) said that prevention was better than cure, and one of the fundamental elements of health action zones is that they encapsulate that approach. However, the same GP—the situation is replicated in surgeries around Tower Hamlets—has one health visitor, who is supposed to cover 250 under-fives, but covers 570 young children because resources are so stretched. A young child in Tower Hamlets has half the attention from a health visitor that he or she would receive if registered in a more affluent area, yet has two, three or four times the need.

Another example of a basic service that Tower Hamlets cannot adequately provide is midwifery. In the Evening Standard last week, a distressed pregnant woman in east London wrote:

> we are told that east London is a Health Action Zone with millions of pounds in extra funding. But the health authority is clearly on its knees. Its staff are obviously overworked, you can't get an appointment for weeks, the opening hours are few and far between, there's never a light or toilet paper in the loos and the system is bursting at the seams with frustrated patients.

The article appeared under the headline, "Pregnant? Well you can't see your doctor this year". She tried to get an appointment with a doctor in November and was told to come back in January.

Most people not living in deprived areas do not have such experiences, and I recognise that the Government set up the health action zones to deal with such problems. However, we need to be careful about mainstream funding, which HAZs are not intended to replicate or substitute for. The methodology behind the HAZ in Tower Hamlets is such that it will focus on young people. It will also target heart disease and mental illness, which are the biggest causes of early death.

I welcome the notification of funding for health programmes from April 2000 to March 2001. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate said, we recognise that my hon. Friend the Minister explained some of the delay in a letter, which was courteously copied to relevant Members of Parliament. None the less, there has been great uncertainty among HAZ services. I sincerely regret the reduction in funding that has befallen the East London and City HAZ programme. We have taken into account the allocations made to it, and although we are thrilled to have received an increase of—depending on how it is calculated, and there are many ways to skin a cat—14 per cent., we note that the overall increase for HAZ budgets has been around 36 per cent.

We are shocked to have received not even half of that in Tower Hamlets, given that we have the highest concentration of poverty in the country. No other area in Britain has more poor people. Health problems are manifest, and I cannot help but be distressed every time I visit my constituents, go round the estates and find families of 12 living in two bedrooms with water dripping from the walls, condensation, all the kids having asthma and none having places to study. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North explained, that inevitably cripples those children's chances for life.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate made the point, but I shall make it again. I appreciate that in my hon. Friend the Minister's letter, he said that he was surprised and disappointed at the size of many of the 1999-2000 HAZ underspends. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate explained some of the reasons for that, but it might be because Tower Hamlets is so full of amazing ready-to-go ideas and has the most incredible need that it has an underspend of 2.04 per cent.—the smallest in the country, I am proud to say. Although many other health action zones may face reduced funding, they will be able to cushion themselves with large carry-forwards. Tower Hamlets is looking at a cut compared with 1999-2000 and will receive £2.37 million as opposed to the previous funding of £3.139 million. That is a great disappointment, especially given the serious health problems in the area. Substantial savings will need to be made in the HAZ budget, leaving a significant shortfall to make up.

East London HAZ is committed to delivering on the Government's national health service priorities, but feels that it is being punished for its success. Will the Minister consider that and the more significant point that, without adequate funding in the NHS, the lessons learnt from HAZ cannot be heeded or acted on? The central fact is that, despite increased resources, the demand for health care in east London outstrips supply. The HAZ cannot bridge that gap, nor should it be responsible for doing so because, although the programme is for seven years, that is a relatively short time.

We are grateful to have been included in the HAZ programme because it has resulted in many initiatives. The emphasis on partnership and the recognition that the local health economy comprises more than the NHS are critical in Tower Hamlets. The multi-agency work to identify and carry through health improvement programmes is also important. GP surgeries have benefited from the funding streams in IT equipment and training. The link between the programme and schools is an important step in the right direction. Nine projects based on the work with the communities fund are up and running, including a Bengali and Somali men's health scheme with 90 participants. All those initiatives contribute to the community. The best HAZ initiatives should be incorporated into mainstream practice and should not just be a bolt-on.

Better communication is needed between the Department of Health and regional health action zones. I hope that HAZs will address people's experiences of the health service and begin to tackle its inequalities. They have expanded provision in health services, but the deprivation uplift of £1.6 million has already been committed for service developments in cancer, coronary heart disease and mental health. Tower Hamlets merited the average increase in HAZ funding, as opposed to the 14 per cent. that we received.

We are anxious that expanded provision, which was overseen by the health action zone, will have to be cut back and taken out of mainstream budgets. The best way to prevent that from happening would be to improve the central funding allocation and ensure that the overall formula is fairer. Thus, the work expected of health care professionals in Tower Hamlets, based on the number of people served by Tower Hamlets and the East London and The City health authority, would be founded on fact, not fiction.

I welcome the Government's historical initiative, which, for the first time, recognises that poor health is linked with poverty and enables the more effective delivery of health care services to young children and adults, some of whom have the worst health in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on securing this interesting debate. He justified health action zones most convincingly and rightly spoke about the problems that they try to solve.

I represent a rural constituency and I am familiar with pockets of deprivation; rural areas have many problems, such as the cost of running basic services, which are not properly recognised in formulae, but that is a discussion for another day.

Areas such as north Devon do not have to struggle with the extraordinary deprivation that many inner cities have faced for decades. There are no overnight solutions to their problems, but switching additional resources to those areas is justified. The health action zones, which I welcome, will have fewer resources at their disposal in the coming year than they expected. Overall funding to the health action zones, and the total funding at the disposal of individual HAZs has increased. However, not for nothing did the draft letter from the Minister to the health action zones state:

> I appreciate that programme funding is less than we had previously indicated.

Only by taking the special earmarked deprivation allocations into account can it be said that, in some cases, HAZs will have more resources at their disposal. It is not surprising that civil servants warned:

> We can anticipate that, following receipt of a notification which will, in effect be announcing cuts to anticipated HAZ budgets this year, there is likely to be some negative financial, management and political feedback from HAZ partners.

They stated:

> This will not be received as good news and we would not recommend a press notice.

That is prudent advice, but unfortunately it got out anyway, despite the advice of another civil servant that the health action zones > should not be made aware or played into these discussions.

The Department recognised that there was bad news. Even if the health action zones have more cash, they have not received what they had anticipated. They made plans on the basis of what they anticipated would be at their disposal.

The hon. Member for Islington, North made a good point about the number of bodies that need to be involved to make HAZs work—it is dangerous to have too many bodies with too many budgets and too many programmes. I enjoyed his point about the need to ensure that everyone gets on, because they must spend an awful lot of their time working together. I am not sure whether I recognise his description of the halcyon days of the late 1970s, but we shall pass over that for the moment.

Mr. Corbyn: I was being perverse.

Mr. Harvey: Yes, I thought so.

The hon. Gentleman made some good points about the dangers inherent in stopping and starting—or boom and bust, as the Prime Minister likes to say—in such services. It was right that HAZs were set up for seven years and told at the outset that they had the right to carry over funds. That encourages sensible phasing and sensible planning.

It should surprise no one that HAZs did not necessarily spend all their funds in the first year of getting up and running from a cold start and that they had reckoned on the basis of being able to carry over those funds. I wish that they could have done so, because they were probably just being responsible and prudent. The Government have changed their view and said that that is not allowed, which is a mistake. If HAZs are no longer allowed to carry forward funds, I hope that the Minister will reassure us that mechanisms will be put in place to spot early the HAZs that will not use all their funds for the year and to redistribute those funds to any other HAZs that could use the funds for programmes on their books during that year.

Many hon. Members will be aware, from experience of the public sector or involvement in it, that problems arise when a budget must be spent in one year. I have sat on the governing bodies of higher education institutions, and the director appears in mid-February and says, "Does anyone have any good ideas how we can blow a couple of million pounds by the end of March? If we don't, the money won't be there next year." It would be regrettable if HAZs were driven in a direction where that perverse logic applied. I urge the Minister seriously to reconsider the matter and recognise that it is not surprising that HAZs have not used up in the first year all the moneys allocated.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) said that local HAZ leaders were disappointed that they would not receive the funds that they had anticipated. I am not surprised about that. Other organisations were encouraged by the formation of HAZs. The hon. Lady mentioned Age Concern, which was impressed and signed up to the programme, anticipating making a seven-year commitment with the Government. Those organisations believed that the Government were right behind HAZs, but their faith will have been somewhat shaken and they will be wondering how things will work out in the time left for the programme.

I was also struck by the remarks of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King). She is absolutely right to say that programmes such as Sure Start expose in her constituency the problems that HAZs might have conspired to paper over. There are real problems on the ground in Tower Hamlets and many other areas. I welcome the new money coming onstream. However, it would be a pity if it were handed down with too many strings attached. When a Government Department makes new funding available it understandably does not want that money to be swallowed up in bureaucracy or used to cover historic debt. Nevertheless, we need to have faith in local people, who understand the priorities for their areas and can therefore sensibly judge how the sums should be used. Too much diktat about how funds should be used is not welcome.

Despite the injection of the funds, serious problems remain to be solved. As the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow said, demand for health services far outstrips supply, and is likely to continue to do so for a long time. It would be a pity if some of the extra funds earmarked for deprivation allocations had to be used quietly to cover up shortcomings.

We must be honest and say that the resources anticipated by health action zones have been reduced. That is regrettable. The programme is a good idea, but the Minister needs to make a fresh commitment to pursuing it fully. He needs to answer some of the questions about the ability of those responsible for implementing the programme to plan ahead and make sensible commitments over seven years. He also needs to set out the future arrangements for carrying over resources. As I said, people should not have to rush around in the last few weeks of the year finding ways to spend money to ensure that they do not lose it in the future.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): I shall endeavour to be brief, because we are running out of time. I should like to hear a full response from the Minister, and there is no need to repeat some points that have already been made well. I congratulate the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on securing the debate. I understand why the three Government Back-Bench Members who spoke have a particular interest in commending the restoration of funding to their areas, which have high levels of deprivation. Those hon. Members made their cases well. I am surprised not to see some other Members of Parliament, whose health action zones are even more adversely affected. The subject is particularly suitable for an Adjournment debate, because it concerns a large number of people.

My constituency contains many contrasts. There is a seven-year difference in life expectancy between people on one large council estate, which has its origins in the Birmingham slum clearance, and people in a more affluent area. Although my constituency does not qualify for health action zone money, I am well aware of the pockets of deprivation that exist in several other constituencies.

The programme budgets of 11 health action zones have been reduced dramatically with effect from this month. My research shows that the biggest casualties are the South Yorkshire coalfields health action zone in Barnsley, whose budget has been slashed by £789,000; Tyne and Wear HAZ, whose budget has been cut by £1.2 million to £3.5 million; Manchester, Salford and Trafford HAZ, whose budget has been cut by £1 million; and Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham HAZ—the "inner-London ring" constituencies to which the hon. Member for Islington, North referred—whose budget has been cut from £3.65 million to £2.713 million. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) described well the position of the east London health action zone.

Before I came here, I spoke to my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) and the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed). They told me that the Plymouth health action zone's budget will be cut from £1.037 million to £771,000. I know that the budgets of many health action zones have been cut by less than that, but Luton, Sandwell, Bradford, Northumbria and North Cumbria HAZs are nevertheless affected. It is important to mention all the affected areas, because one of the purposes of Adjournment debates is to raise wide-ranging issues.

The nub of the debate is whether the money to those areas, which we all agree need additional support, is being cut. The argument has run along the lines—I expect that the Minister will make this point—that the money is not really being cut because the health authorities in those areas will receive other moneys. That does not persuade the local Member of Parliament or those running health action zone projects. We know exactly how public money works. It is parcelled up for particular projects and it is difficult for a project to recover its position if its core funding is cut.

The Liberal Democrat leader made that point rather well at Prime Minister's Question Time. He showed the sequence of internal documentation, which the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) has read out. The Prime Minister replied:

> I think that he will find that, when taken with the money given to health authorities in those areas, the funding has gone up, not down.—[Official Report, 28 June 2000; Vol. 352, c. 901.]

We all know that it does not work like that in practice. Handing out extra money for anti-smoking campaigns, for example, does not mean that core funding for the health action zone project is restored. Other initiatives will go to the wall because it is not easy to cross-subsidise from another pocket of funding to the project that has lost its core funding.

That is the nub of today's debate. We agree that health actions zones are a good idea. They are needed in the areas where, for many complex and diverse reasons, as the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) fairly pointed out, there are life expectancy and health inequalities. Those inequalities are complex to tackle and, regrettably, are getting larger. There is hence an understandable political need to target money into the areas concerned. When a seven-year programme has been agreed, it is most disheartening for those who have to deliver the project to have their core funding cut at such an early stage. It sends all the wrong signals to the people on the ground.

I have some straightforward questions for the Minister. Will there be further cuts next year, or will the core funding be restored? I am not persuaded that providing parcels of money to fund other health-related projects in those areas, which is a loose way of describing where the money is going, will restore confidence in the health action zones project. Can the Minister assure us that the capacity to carry over from year to year will be restored? A number of hon. Members said that the underspend by their health action zones had resulted in some of that money being taken away. In modern government we are trying to move away from the idea that, unless money is spent on something at the end of the year, it will be taken away or, in this case, cut back. At the outset of the project, there was a commitment to allow health action zones to carry forward their underspend, but it appears to have gone. Can the Minister reassure us that the capacity to carry over from year to year will be restored?

The integrity in the core funding must be maintained if the health action zones are to work and if their seven-year programme is to be completed. I look to the Minister for a clear assurance on that point. It is essential for the confidence of all of those who work in difficult situations. For them, the money never seems enough because the degree of inequality is so large and, regrettably, getting larger.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): This has been a useful debate and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on securing it. I welcome the contributions made by my hon. Friends and others. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North has a keen interest in health action zones. He has raised a number of points today and he spoke about them recently in an Opposition day debate in the House. This timely debate sets out the position.

In his opening remarks, my hon. Friend welcomed the priority that the Government attach to areas of highest deprivation and to the need to tackle health inequalities and rebuild and modernise the national health service. He also welcomed our practice of launching health action zones. I wish to reassure hon. Members of our continuing support for this programme. I noted what the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) said. I have to say in passing that there was no such programme during 18 years of Conservative Governments. In the light of the shadow Chancellor's announcement that he is abandoning commitment to any of the spending programmes, I shall probably write to the hon. Lady asking her whether what we heard from her was a spending commitment to the future of health action zones. However, I doubt whether she will be able to reply as I shall reply today. We are committed to health action zones.

Many of the issues raised by my hon. Friends reflected those that Ministers must consider when deciding on the overall allocation of funding for areas covered by HAZ programmes. There is common ground on the importance of areas where some 13 million people suffer particularly harsh deprivation receiving extra money, over and above what they would have received through the usual allocation formula for such areas.

A persistent theme of the debate was that we should ensure that we strike the right balance between the innovative and ground-breaking work of new partnerships that are formed by HAZs and the allocation of mainstream resources for those areas. We have sought to achieve that balance in a series of decisions that the Government have taken on funding HAZ programmes and allocating resources. When the total figures are seen, it will be clear that they represent a substantial and increasing commitment to tackling the poverty, inequality and health deprivation that have been described.

We are strongly committed to improving the health of the most deprived communities. The work of HAZs is key, in that much is being done to reduce health inequalities, to modernise services and to tackle social exclusion. The partnerships that have been formed—they have been well described today—between local authorities, local health services and other agencies, including the voluntary sector and local community organisations, play an important part in driving through those changes. That is very different from the fragmentation and lack of partnership in the internal market in the health service under the previous Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North essentially asked how we should act to make the co-operation achieved through HAZs a more mainstream feature of operating what I shall call the local health economy. In the past two years, we have instituted health improvement programmes that bring together health authorities, with their strategic leadership role, trusts, primary care groups and trusts and local authorities. We have consulted widely with the voluntary sector and have set out areas' health priorities. As well as the range of services provided by the national health service, those priorities include many of the issues that have been raised this morning. The funding that we give to local health authorities and primary care organisations is intended for locally agreed priorities in the health improvement programme, which of course also reflects national priorities set by Government, such as work on coronary heart disease, mental health and so on.

HAZs can be seen as giving a kick-start to the health improvement programme process, which works across all local health authority resources rather than as a separate, detached element. HIPs have been part of the local planning system for only two years. Hon. Members will have received from their local health authorities copies of the HIP, which is only the second version of the document. The process will evolve over time as the HIP becomes the focus for the sort of co-operation that has been spoken about today. I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North that we have a clear strategy to develop coherence in health planning and the promotion of good health across the local health economy that goes beyond the partnerships formed through health action zones.

Mr. Corbyn: The Minister will have heard what I said earlier. Can he offer us any comfort with regard to the perverse effects of budget planning in the health service and the local health economy, whereby it becomes a positive incentive not to take patients from a hospital into community care or vice versa because whoever takes them must pay for them and whoever has them is already stuck with the bill? I know that the problem sounds minor, but squabbling about who should and who should not have a patient causes an enormous waste of time, energy and resources.

Mr. Denham: That problem is partly addressed through, for example, the local winter planning groups, which were established for the first time last year. They led to much more integrated planning between social services and health services locally and were able to pinpoint places in the system where bed blocking and delayed discharge could occur. We shall build on the experience of last winter for the coming winter. I think that that will become a permanent feature of the system. In many areas, the co-operation has been so productive that the planning process has been extended year round, rather than focusing only on the key winter months for which it was originally developed.

In addition, the Health Act 1999 introduced new legal flexibilities to enable local authorities and health services to pool budgets, to have an integrated provider of health and social care and to have a variety of other means for overcoming problems in developing partnerships locally. Those powers became available only towards the back end of last year, but there is considerable local interest in developing them. We have pointed to the potential role of primary care trusts working with social services departments to use the new powers to avoid individual patients falling down the gaps between the health and social care systems, as we all recognise has happened too often in the past. Although I would not pretend for one moment that all those measures are in place on the ground, the planning mechanisms and the organisational powers are now in the system to enable such problems to be tackled more effectively.

In view of the lack of time, I want to ensure that I deal with the key funding issues that have been raised, although I should like to say more about health action zones. First, however, I will respond to the several hon. Members who asked for signs of our commitment to health action zones.

I have already said that we regard the zones as a key tool in tackling health inequalities locally. We have worked with health action zones in two areas. First, we have rightly impressed on the zones the need, when spending public money, to develop programmes that not only address individual problems but that have clear targets and outcome measures, so that we can evaluate their effectiveness and be sure that the investment is achieving the desired impact. In the first year, we worked closely with health action zones to help them to do that and to encourage them to take the process further.

Secondly, we have worked with health action zones on the mainstreaming of programmes to ensure that their activities, for example, work on coronary heart disease, do not become detached from the mainstream work and the developments of the national service framework on that disease. Real progress is being made on those issues locally, but we shall continue to work with health action zones.

It is important to recognise that the extra funding going into the areas covered by the health action zones this year represents an overall increase of 37 per cent. compared with last year. It is true that there have been changes in the balance of streams through which that money goes into the zones, but, by any measure, the resources have substantially increased.

When we launched the health action zone programme, we gave the zones a general indication of the funding that they might expect to receive over the comprehensive spending review period. Everybody recognised that that budget, like any indicative budget, could change in the light of experience and developments. Two significant developments occurred. First, last December we decided to provide through the deprivation allocation an extra £30 million to the health authorities covered by health action zones. That expenditure was not envisaged or predicted this time last year. We had built an initial £30 million of extra funding into the health action zone areas in the previous year, but the new expenditure raised that total to £60 million.

Secondly, it became apparent that there was a substantial underspend of health action zone funding. We had agreed to give some flexibility to allow for slippage and for the development of local partnerships. However, out of the £88 million that was available to health action zones in 1999-2000, about £23 million was unspent and carried forward into this year. Although every zone will give reasons for that slippage, it was much higher than we had anticipated or thought to be justifiable when we agreed to the year-end flexibilities. That is why we have decided not to allow slippage at the end of this year, although we will conduct precisely the sort of exercise that I think was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) and by the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey). We will review progress in about October to ensure that we can take action on any apparent problems. It is clearly important for public money that has been allocated for tackling health inequalities and deprivation to be spent on delivering the services that people want.

Ms Glenda Jackson: As far as my local HAZ is concerned, the Government's attitude is an indication of their desire to push HAZs into the mainstream delivery of NHS services—an approach that ignores local realities on the ground and sends markedly the wrong message to the partners. Early wins can be achieved, but they do not deliver in the long term, which is what most HAZs want to do.

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. We must engage the health service more effectively in the wider agenda of tackling health inequalities and ensure that the zones are properly engaged in shaping the mainstream delivery of national health services. I do not see the two matters as juxtaposed. What is important is an effective partnership to tackle the broader issues that are being tackled by the zones and by the national health service.

For this year, health action zone areas will receive a £60 million allocation on top of what would usually have gone to the relevant health authorities. Other resources include £40.5 million in programme funding for joint projects with other agencies; £10 million for smoking cessation, which had already been allocated; £7 million in innovations funding; and £2 million for drugs funding. That makes a total of £120 million. It compares with last year's total of £87 million and represents an increase of 37 per cent.

In the Budget, an additional £660 million was allocated to health authorities throughout England. I do not pretend that that point is central to the debate, but it is worth making it clear, especially as health authorities in the health action zones received an additional £215 million of that money. The funds were allocated according to the formula, but there was arguably an increase on last year's investment of more than £200 million in those areas. Although the balance of funding has varied, health action zones received substantially more from both the health action zone project and the wider increase in resources than they would have expected this time last year. They are an important Government initiative and will continue to receive our backing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. The next debate is on the report of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

11 am

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the important matter concerning the report of the Commissioner for Public Appointments, but I preface my remarks with a note of regret: that we are having this debate in Westminster Hall when the House of Commons Chamber is not in use. That is indicative of the way in which the Government treat the matter. It is also regrettable that it is necessary for an Opposition Member of Parliament to raise this subject for debate. The issue is of great importance. It has arisen from a report presented to the Government by an independent public body. The Government should have responded quickly in the House and, ideally, allowed an opportunity for debate.

It is almost four months since the report was published. It is unacceptable that the Government have taken that long to make a serious response to the commissioner's findings. It is typical of the Government's arrogance and their contempt of parliamentary scrutiny. It is also typical of their contempt for the public, who deserve an open exposition and discussion in Parliament of the findings of Dame Rennie Fritchie's report as part of our country's proper democratic process. The fact that the Government have sought to avoid that process and scrutiny is unfortunate.

However, as I say, I am pleased to secure the debate. I am fortunate that the balloting process has allowed me to bring the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), to this Chamber to comment on the matter, but had the Government been prepared to make a statement or to allow debate in Government time, hon. Members of all parties would have found it easier to take seriously the Government's commitment to improve the process of public appointments in the national health service. It would also have been easier to accept that they were taking seriously such a careful and rigorous piece of work.

The Government's failure for so long to respond to the report reveals an unfortunate attitude towards the Nolan process and the drive to improve standards in public life. The Nolan rules were not intended to be a party political tool for the use of the Labour party when in opposition. They were a serious attempt to raise standards in public life and, in this context, to raise standards in the public appointments process. The Government's treatment of the report shows that they want to take Nolan à la carte. They want to decide when it suits them and when it is politically expedient to listen to the Committee on Standards in Public Life, without understanding the important principle that the public have a right to fairness and higher standards in public life and in the Government's conduct with respect to public appointments.

The Government have abjectly failed to take seriously a matter which is vital, not just because of the need for political balance in appointments—although of course that is important, as a matter of natural justice and because the general public do not like the smell of an appointments process that is patently politically biased. The most important aspect of the question is that relevant appointments are being made to the boards of health authorities, NHS trusts and, now, primary care trusts. The people concerned are entrusted with the responsibility of providing, through the national health service, health care of the standard that the public have a right to expect. It is a matter of serious concern if appointments to those senior national health service positions are not based on ability or merit, because the public are being short-changed by the appointment of people who are not up to the job.

I have said that the Government have not taken the matter seriously. The report from the Commissioner for Public Appointments was published on 22 March. Ironically, in an example of what has perhaps become a new hallmark of the Government—the failure of their attempts at spin and news management—the report happened to be published on the day when the Prime Minister presented a rather empty statement in the House on NHS modernisation. Hon. Members may recall that he offered little besides platitudes. However, one significant matter was on the agenda: the report on the Government's actions with respect to public appointments in the national health service.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition raised the matter, telling the Prime Minister that he had > produced a system of appointments debased, corrupted and contorted by the crony culture that he has built all around him.

The Prime Minister did not even respond to that point. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) may be pleased to hear that his party leader, the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), to his credit managed to wring a little more from the Prime Minister. After he had raised his concerns following the publication of the report, the Prime Minister began his response with the comment:

> On that last point, the Secretary of State is announcing our proposals in response to what Dame Rennie Fritchie said.

That is all well and good, but the Prime Minister gave no details of his views on the matter or of the importance that should be attached to it.

When I was fortunate enough during the same exchanges to be called to put a question to the Prime Minister, I asked what action he would take to root out those who had been appointed other than on merit, and to appoint to NHS boards the best people for the job to ensure an adequate and appropriate standard of management. Frankly, the reply that I received was insulting. The Prime Minister said:

> I shall simply refer to the following sentence of the Fritchie report.

He quoted not a sentence, but part of a sentence—a tactic that we have seen more often than we would like from the right hon. Gentleman. He quoted:

> "The issue of...politicisation...is not new. The practice of inviting MPs to comment on the shortlists of candidates was first introduced by the Conservative Government..."—[Official Report, 22 March 2000; Vol. 346, c. 986-94.]

Had the Prime Minister completed the sentence, he would have added the words:

> but has gained a new momentum since the last general election.

At the very least, the Prime Minister's response was evasive, and it set the tone for the Government's reaction to an important public document that raised a matter of public concern. The Prime Minister told us that the Secretary of State for Health would set out the Government's response to the report—but when? It was not later that day, when the Secretary of State for Health had the first opportunity to do so during debate on the Budget resolutions. The Government were hardly short of opportunities to put the matter before the House and stress the seriousness with which they regarded the commissioner's report. They were hardly short of opportunities to demonstrate their commitment to improving the process. Nevertheless, the Secretary of State did not set out the Government's response during the following month of April—nor in May, nor in June. I cannot help but think that he would not have done so in July had it not been for my good fortune in securing this debate.

We have already seen increasing press interest and speculation in the matter. A report in The Times suggested that the Commissioner for Public Appointments was "irritated" that the Government had not replied to her report, and reported that she had suggested that politicisation was still occurring in appointments to the new primary care trusts that oversee general practitioner services. Again, the Government do not appear to be taking those matters sufficiently seriously.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): I suppose one of the reasons why the Secretary of State for Health would not have been keen to reply in May was that the Labour candidate in the Romsey by-election was Andrew Howard, who was my opponent at the general election. Following the general election, he was appointed as chairman of the Croydon and North Downs Community Health NHS trust, but he resigned after 18 months to fight the Romsey by-election for the Labour party, leaving behind a bad taste among the people at the health trust whom he had abandoned. I am not alleging that Andrew Howard would not have been up to the job, but the fact that he has been popping in and out of a political career has not done the service of that health trust any good. I hope that my hon. Friend, and perhaps the Minister, will comment on that.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who makes an interesting and valid point. Perhaps, in the best tradition of political expediency, there has been a similar reason in each month since the report was published why the Prime Minister or Secretary of State for Health has found it inconvenient to respond to a report that has called into question the whole process of appointments in the NHS during this Government's term of office.

We saw little activity until Wednesday 5 July, when I heard that I had been successful in the ballot for a debate in this Chamber. Miraculously, two days later, on 7 July, the Minister sent a letter to the Commissioner for Public Appointments, partially responding to the report. The letter was placed in the public domain only yesterday by means of a written answer in the House of Lords, and the text of the reply was available only in the Library.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Gisela Stuart): Will the hon. Gentleman remind me in reply to whom that answer was given? Is he suggesting that there was collusion between a member of another party over that question in the House of Lords?

Mr. Brady: I am sorry; I did not hear the Minister.

Ms Stuart: Does the hon. Gentleman know who asked the question in the House of Lords and to which party that Member belongs?

Mr. Brady: Yes, I do know, but I fail to see its significance.

Ms Stuart: Would the hon. Gentleman mind telling the Chamber to which party the Member who asked that question belongs?

Mr. Brady: I understand that it was Lord Clement-Jones, the Liberal Democrat Whip. I still fail to see the significance of the momentous point that the Minister is drawing to our attention.

Ms Stuart: It has been suggested that there was a connection between the timing of that question and our response. I have failed to establish a connection.

Mr. Brady: I now see what the Minister is driving at. Even if one leaves aside the obvious, well known and public connections that exist from time to time between the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties—I shall leave it aside, Mr. Deputy Speaker—the Minister will be aware that the Department of Health had another opportunity during the previous week, when I asked in a written question when a reply would be given to the Commissioner for Public Appointments. The response, which I received on 4 July, the day before the ballot for Adjournment debates in Westminster Hall, was that a reply would be given shortly.

Perhaps I am being uncharitable, but if Ministers had it in mind to sign a letter that was to be sent on 7 July, just three days later—they are not always punctilious about the timing of their written answers—would they not have either delayed the written answer so that they could give a substantive reply or said when a response would be given?

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Will my hon. Friend remind me when the ballot took place that selected this subject for today's debate? Could that have influenced the timing of the Minister's letter?

Mr. Brady: Indeed; I draw what I think is the inescapable conclusion that it did influence the timing of the Minister's letter. The ballot took place on Wednesday 5 July. I say this in a charitable sense, because the Minister is an honourable lady and she used to live in Altrincham—I have a great affection for people who used to live there—but the reply was rather bland and anodyne. It did not add much to the sum of public knowledge, and it left Ministers with the flexibility to reply to the Commissioner for Public Appointments during July, or even during the summer recess, when they might have thought that they could sneak something out without scrutiny.

Ministers might have found further reasons why it was not yet possible to reply—perhaps because another great review, this Government's favourite tactic, was being undertaken—and might not have replied before the autumn. We would then have had the wonderful prospect of returning in the autumn and once again trying to encourage Ministers to reply. If they had the best interests of the national health service at heart, and if they took seriously the importance of rigorous and proper scrutiny, fair conduct and the proper application of the Nolan rules in the appointments process, they would have chosen to reply much sooner than yesterday.

Instead, however, a report in The Times—not a theological text, but generally reliable—suggested last week that the Commissioner for Public Appointments had not been invited by Ministers to discuss the contents of her report, which was published nearly four months ago on 22 March. Ministers have now given a partial reply, but it is somewhat disturbing that that reply should be sent before they had taken the trouble to speak to the commissioner and to discuss her findings in detail. What kind of a reply can that be?

I started taking an interest in the matter owing to my experiences locally. It was impossible to avoid noticing the way in which the Government operated a process of political appointment in my area. It was so obvious, determined and regular that it was plain to everyone, whether greatly interested in politics or not, that a deliberate politicisation of national health service management was taking place. The term of the chairman of the Salford and Trafford health authority was not renewed—she was effectively removed—and a Labour councillor from Salford replaced her. A Labour councillor from the borough of Trafford joined as a non-executive director, which meant that a third of the non-executive directors on the health authority not only supported the Labour party, but were active Labour party politicians. That was compounded by the situation in my local health care trust, the chairman of which was replaced by a Trafford Labour councillor. The Government were not content merely to give him a single companion; instead, they added two further Trafford Labour councillors as non-executive directors.

The borough of Trafford has always been an interesting political microcosm. It is a mixed borough, and there are sharp divisions between different parts of it, not least in politics. The political make-up of the borough is now broadly even. The Labour party has a narrow majority on the council, but in each of the past three years—the whole electoral cycle—more people in the borough have voted for the Conservative party than the Labour party. In the local elections this year, that was an absolute majority.

I shall not argue for proportional representation—immediately the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight perks up to contribute—on NHS boards. It would not be viable for the Government to argue that it was necessary to appoint three Labour councillors to the board of the Trafford Healthcare NHS trust to reflect the views of the local community. Doing so emphatically and demonstrably did and does not reflect those views.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am following the good case that my hon. Friend makes, and he is clearly as concerned as I am that there should not be flagrant politicisation of appointments to the national health service. In his view, were the people who were not reappointed as chairmen and non-executive members of the health authorities in his area competent? In my area, we currently have an outstanding chairman, who is well respected across the political spectrum. He has done a wonderful job and has increased the morale of health service staff, but is threatened with non-reappointment, on grounds about which I have no idea. It would be a disaster for the continuing success of my trust if he were not reappointed later this year.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is right to raise that important matter. In the local instances to which I referred, able people were not reappointed. I shall not comment generally on those who replaced them, as I should make it clear, from a sense of even-handedness, that I am not saying that all political appointees are not up to the job.

Ms Stuart: I ask the hon. Gentleman to comment on the letter sent to him by the chairman of the north-west branch of the NHS executive, Professor Joan Higgins, who wrote:

> We looked for the relevant experience, appropriate skills and the potential to make a success of this challenging new post. The two candidates whose names have been submitted both scored very highly on these criteria. There was certainly no intention to promote individuals with a particular political affiliation at the expense of better qualified candidates.

Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there were better qualified candidates who were not promoted because they were not affiliated to the Labour party?

Mr. Brady: That is possibly so. I know of candidates of other political persuasions who, strangely, find that they are never called for interview or are called once and never again. That picture is reflected throughout the country. The Minister waves the letter in front of her but, in the case in question, I believe that there might have been people at least as well qualified, but with different political views, who were not offered the job.

The Minister raises an interesting case. An initial letter was sent to me on 11 April, in which my comments were sought on the shortlist for the appointment of chairman of the Trafford South primary care trust. I gave limited comments on the candidates because I know only one of them a little, but I commented on the process. I did not criticise the regional chairman, who was left to implement the rules given to her by Ministers and the Department of Health. I will not be diverted into a discussion of the political affiliations of the people involved in the process, because I do not know those of the regional chairman.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister is seeking to cite a particular case and has asked my hon. Friend to comment on it. Does he think that the Minister is in any way disputing Dame Rennie Fritchie's conclusion that less successful candidates have been brought forward to replace those already identified on merit? Dame Rennie's report was categoric about that, and the Minister's citing of an individual case will not alter those conclusions.

Mr. Brady: My hon. Friend makes an important point and is right to underline the significance that the commissioner's report attaches to the matter. The Minister has been bold enough to quote an example of an appointment, in relation to which an interesting situation has developed. I raised the issue of that appointment with the Commissioner for Public Appointments because I was concerned that it was evidence that the Department of Health had taken no action following her report of 22 March. I mentioned the fact that Members of Parliament were still routinely consulted on shortlists. One of those two candidates was a local Labour councillor who had already been appointed as a non-executive director of a health authority. We are getting into a compound situation in which such appointments are flowing thick and fast.

I was told by the regional chairman that the Labour councillor was the preferred candidate and that the process had been properly observed. I was left to conclude that that was the end of the matter and that the appointment would go ahead. I received no further communication until I received a newsletter from the health action zone, the front page of which told me that Professor Norma Raynes, a dynamic new chairman, had been appointed to the primary care trust. It is hard to understand what happened behind the scenes of that appointment. It was certainly a closed and odd process, in which the preferred candidate was not appointed. Perhaps the Minister can enlighten me further when she replies, or write to me on the matter.

I am conscious of time and of the fact that several hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. However, I want to raise some specific examples. I want to return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) about the competence or conduct of those in office. Last year, I was greatly concerned about the conduct of the Labour councillor who was appointed to chair the Trafford Healthcare NHS trust. That concern was shared by the medical advisory committee of the trust, which, as the Minister will know, complained that the Labour councillor had made a decision on party political grounds.

The decision in question related to the closure of wards, which was announced just one working day after the local elections. Statutory consultation would have been necessary prior to the decision, and it was explicitly stated that the decision should be kept quiet until after the local elections. I raised concerns about the matter, as did clinicians in the trust. In response to their complaint, an internal investigation was held. That investigation may have been thorough, but, ultimately, it sat on the fence a little. However, some of its comments were interesting. It stated:

> a very real suspicion has been created in the minds of the senior doctors (who are actually very reasonable and feel they have a genuine grievance), and with some other senior staff who are not prepared to articulate this.

One can only speculate on why they are not prepared to articulate. None the less, when the decision on the chairman's term of office came up, she was duly reappointed.

I mentioned that story in an Adjournment debate last year on ward closures. I am pleased to say that, because due statutory process had not been followed, we managed to reverse the ward closures. I am therefore delighted that the three wards at Altrincham general hospital are now open.

I raise that issue because it relates to the important point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield. It shows the contrast between the reappointment of a Labour councillor whose conduct, at least in one instance, has been open to serious question, and the failure to reappoint other people who have done outstanding work for the national health service. I will give another example to show the contrast. It concerns a gentleman by the name of John Dutton, who has never been interested in politics or been a member of a political party, but is an active servant of the local community. He is a magistrate in Trafford, and I met him in that connection. His story gives rise to considerable concern.

Having been made a non-executive director of the Salford Royal Hospitals NHS trust in—I think—1996, John Dutton's appointment was terminated at the end of October 1999, despite outstanding service. Notably, he led a disabled access and disability discrimination programme, which became accepted as a leader in its field and was taken as model of best practice for many other hospitals. He was the chairman of the audit committee for three years, and the district auditor said that he had moved the hospital trust into the top three of his regional portfolio. His ability, commitment to the national health service and record of success in post could not be open to doubt. His only sins were that he was not politically affiliated, not a woman, and not a member of an ethnic minority.

In responding to concerns about the removal of capable members of trusts and health authorities, the Government claim that it has been necessary to increase the representation of women and ethnic minorities. I have no objection to that. Indeed, I support the increased representation of women and members of ethnic minorities in national health service management positions—but not under any circumstances, if those people are less able than those whom they replace.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend has been extremely courteous in responding to my earlier intervention, so perhaps he would further say whether he is as concerned as I am that people who have given devoted service and outstanding commitment to the health service, and who are wedded to it, are being removed. He talked earlier about the process of appointment or reappointment. Is he not worried that the individual who has a major say in the north-west—the chairman of the north-west branch of the NHS executive—could be a member or strong supporter of the Labour party, as is my personal belief? She was appointed by the Government. I work closely with her; she is an able person, but might she not be prejudiced against people who do not meet what she perceives to be the Government's requirement in respect of appointments to such important positions? I am committed to my East Cheshire NHS trust and the work of its chairman, who is highly respected throughout the medical profession and political parties.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful again to my hon. Friend. The Minister challenged me on the political affiliations of Lord Clement-Jones. I do not know the political affiliations of the regional chairman, but perhaps the Minister does. Can she enlighten me?

My local experience led me to table some written questions, which yielded some important statistics. Between 1 May 1997 and 11 November 1999, a large number of councillors were appointed to trusts and health authorities. It amounted to one in seven of all appointments—that was noted in the Fritchie report—and meant that there was at least one councillor on most NHS boards. There was always someone with a political allegiance to communicate with others with the same political view.

Of those councillors, 284 were Labour councillors—83 per cent. of the total—36 were Liberal Democrats and 23 were Conservatives. In 1997-98, 27.8 per cent. of all appointments were politically active. In the following year, 22.8 per cent. of all appointees were politically active and in 1999-2000, the figure was again 27.8 per cent. Of appointees who had a political affiliation but were not local councillors, Labour party supporters comprised 77.7 per cent. in 1997-98, 77 per cent. in 1998-99 and 62.3 per cent. in 1999-2000.

Contrary to the views of the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), we are all grown up. I fully accept, as did the commissioner, that there may be political appointments. That is not a new worry, but after exhaustive scrutiny of what has been happening, she found that the process had gained new momentum and that the NHS had become subject to systematic politicisation.

The only other evidence that was available on previous political activity came from a survey conducted in late 1995 and early 1996. It stated that 8.5 per cent. of appointees declared no political activity, while 8.9 per cent. were Conservative and 7.6 per cent. were Labour. Quite rightly, the commissioner notes that it is not possible to say whether that was representative of the preceding years.

Ms Stuart: As we are all being grown up, I point out that, judging from the success rate according to political activity of those shortlisted in the hon. Gentleman's region of the north-west for NHS appointments since 1 January 1999, someone who declares a Labour activity has a 39 per cent. chance of being appointed, whereas a Conservative has a 56.3 per cent. chance. Will he comment on that?

Mr. Brady: I am tempted to take that as a compliment from the Minister. Perhaps I am making some headway on the matter. I suspect that it would be more relevant to consider the large number of appointments of Labour party members and councillors in my region. If the Minister looks at the numbers involved, a rather different picture may emerge. The commissioner stated in her report that > Certainly the figures since the General Election reveal a large influx of appointees who were and are politically active, particularly on behalf of the Labour party.

That is not new, but it has gained momentum since the election.

Dame Rennie Fritchie uncovered in her report an appallingly corrupt political culture, which is prepared to appoint people to public office entirely on the basis of their political outlook, without reference to their ability—a clear breach of the code of practice that the commissioner was appointed to uphold. Political affiliation dictates appointment and the best people for the job may not be appointed. The commissioner noted that > many of the principles in my Code of Practice have either been, or risk being, breached in both their letter and spirit.

On political bias, the report states:

> It is clear from the evidence presented to the Group that there have been examples of this, and that appointments have not always been made on merit... I would go further and conclude that the process has become politicised in a systematic way.

There are clear doubts about whether appointments have been made on merit. The commissioner was moved to comment:

> Appointees are not honorary or "grace and favour", but full working members of the board.

If members appointed to NHS boards take the view that their appointment is a sinecure to reward them for other service, for loyalty or for keeping quiet, that is of particular concern.

I established from written answers that in March 1999 around £1.4 million was paid annually in fees via NHS boards to Labour councillors. Again, I do not claim that they were in all instances doing a bad job or were not fit for purpose, but as the commissioner pointed out in her report, in some instances they were—and that is wrong. The report states:

> on occasion, the Government's goals for the representation of women and ethnic minorities have taken precedence in the process over the needs of a board.

I say in the strongest terms that, although increased representation by women and people from ethnic minorities is welcome, if those objectives take precedence over the needs of a board, the quality of NHS health provision will suffer for women, ethnic minorities, and the whole population. It is bad practice, which must be stopped.

It is disturbing that a recent written answer, which I received on 4 July, said that the process for appointments to primary care trusts is continuing in much the same tone. Not so many councillors are being appointed—I do not know whether that is because Labour is running out of councillors or because it is worried about the publicity that the process is attracting. Of those declaring political activity who were shortlisted for appointment to primary care trust non-executive director positions, 28.9 per cent. declared Labour party activity; of those appointed, 17.3 per cent. declared Labour party activity. Of the primary care trust chairmen, 30.6 per cent. of those shortlisted were affiliated to the Labour party and 23.5 per cent. of those appointed are Labour party supporters.

A week ago, a headline in The Times stated: "Milburn chided over NHS trusts". The article noted that there had been no response to the commissioner's report. Yesterday, however, there was a response from the Under-Secretary, which was sent to the Commissioner for Public Appointments. It was, at best, half-hearted. It is obvious that it was rushed out because the political imperatives were starting to catch up with Ministers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): Does my hon. Friend think that it is disgraceful that the reply came from the Under-Secretary, not the Secretary of State? Is not that an indication of how insignificantly the Government regard the matter? Does my hon. Friend share the worry of those who believe that combining the role of chief executive in the NHS with that of Permanent Secretary means that integrity and propriety in public life will not be so carefully safeguarded?

Mr. Brady: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend, who makes an important point about the proper management of the national health service. As the debate is being held in this odd hemicycle, I had not noticed that my right hon. Friend was here; her very presence shows the importance that some former Secretaries of State attach to these matters. They are still prepared to devote their time and energy to proper management and structures in the national health service and Ministers could learn a great deal from their example.

I have annotated the Minister's letter; I do quite a lot on education policy and I have been accused of behaving like a school teacher. I have marked the hon. Lady's response because it is at best half-hearted and inadequate. It does not say what it means, which is typical of Ministers in this Administration.

The Government say that they will "implement immediately" several recommendations of the Fritchie report. On recommendation 4, their response is half-hearted. They say:

> We already make it clear that nominees are treated in exactly the same way as candidates from other sources.

That suggests that what is recommended has already been done, but although it is in the rules, it is not being enforced or implemented. The response continues:

> The Government accept that Members of Parliament should not routinely be consulted on short lists for appointment, which is welcome. It goes on:

> We agree that secondary appointments should be exceptional and subject to open competition.

They have agreed to publish the full guidance about NHS appointments on the internet, which is also welcome.

Under the heading

> Recommendations on which action has already been taken

are recommendations followed by the action that the Government claim to have taken:

> Recommendation 1. Ministers should commission a fundamental look at the role and purpose of NHS boards.

That is what they say is being done.

> Recommendation 2. In the light of that review, Ministers should draw up fresh job descriptions.

The Government reject that recommendation completely; they state:

> The job description and person specifications have been satisfactory in recruiting people currently on NHS boards.

That is not what the Commissioner for Public Appointments stated in her report; she found that the specifications were inadequate and resulted in people being appointed who were not fit for the purpose.

Recommendation 3 is that there should be a review of the appointments process. The Government responded as follows:

> We have introduced a system of regular appraisal to assess the performance of those who have been appointed.

That does not answer the point. Recommendation 8 was not accepted, and nor was recommendation 12, although recommendation 13 was agreed to.

Recommendations 16, 22 and 26 were not accepted. They are listed under

> Recommendations on Which Action Has Already Been Taken

but many of them are flatly rejected by Ministers who say one thing and do another. Those recommendations are followed by a list of > Recommendations Which We Do Not Intend To Implement.

With unusual candour, the Government say that they do not agree that local authorities should not be permitted to nominate people for such purposes. In response to recommendation 9, which questions whether having so many councillors on NHS boards is a good thing, they say:

> Councillors constitute only 10.6 per cent. of non-executives on NHS boards.

That seems quite a lot.

I am conscious of the time. I wish that I had time to go through all of the requests, platitudes and drivel in the rather rushed reply from the Minister to an important, serious, thorough and rigorous report. It is sad that the Government have not taken the commissioner's report seriously. It is even sadder that they do not take the fundamental issue seriously and are not concerned about whether the right people are being appointed to do the best possible job in NHS trusts and health authorities.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. I have reserved the comments that I am about to make until this point because I wanted to make certain that I did not engage in the argument of the day. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) gave the impression in his opening remarks that this Chamber is somehow subordinate to other parts of the House. I must correct that for the benefit of all hon. Members present. This is as much part of the House as any other Chamber. Any right hon. or hon. Member seeking a 90-minute Adjournment debate, which this debate is, used to be free to apply for a 90-minute slot in debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill. It is not possible at the moment to get a 90-minute slot any other way than in this Chamber under the system that the House has decided to operate.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): I shall be very brief. My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) has said a great deal, very effectively, about an issue that has become of increasing concern to many of us over the past three years. Perhaps I should make things even briefer by asking three questions. Where has the problem come from? How bad is it? What should we do about it?

On the origins of the problem, it is clear that the Government decided early on to put large numbers of councillors on NHS trust boards. At first, it seemed like a reasonable attempt to increase local representation, but soon people became concerned that it was a ruse to put a higher proportion of Labour and Labour-inclined people on trust boards. At the time, the Conservatives had been in power for so long that Labour was disproportionately represented in local government. We heard that concern in our constituencies as early as late 1997.

Independently, Sir Len Peach, Dame Rennie Fritchie's predecessor, also became concerned. In particular, he noted that the consultation process for getting nominations from councillors to the boards had been sent to council leaders and not to chief executives. As a result, many Conservative councillors never got to hear about it and could not apply. As the ultimate in bias, they were not even given the opportunity to put their names forward.

I raised the matter with the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), the then Secretary of State for Health, when he came before the Select Committee on Health in February 1998. He denied that a slapdash approach had been taken to soliciting nominations impartially. I did not accuse him of political bias. I did not know whether political bias had been involved, but I was aware of widespread anxiety about at least the impression of political bias.

The then Secretary of State's response was that the issue > has only generated an impression of political bias with the Conservative Party and that the suggestion had been generated > by the Conservative Party and most of the things that they have drawn attention to have been factually incorrect.

He dismissed my anxieties by repeating those words over and over again.

We now have some evidence, in the report. I shall not go through all the evidence, because I do not have time, but it is overwhelming. I draw the Minister's attention to page 15, which shows that, of local councillor appointments made between 1 May 1997 and 11 November 1999, the number of Labour appointments was 284 and the number of Conservative appointments was 23.

Is that a fair reflection? I am not suggesting that the figures should constitute an exact proportional representation of the current disposition of political forces in this country, but what possible justification can there be for 284 against 23? Might it be that Conservative councillors were of such poor quality that they could not be appointed on merit grounds, whereas Labour councillors were of such outstanding quality that they were all swept into appointments? It is absurd and disgraceful that such an appointment rate should have been allowed to persist.

The first of Dame Rennie Fritchie's conclusions has already been clearly set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West. She says clearly and unequivocally that > the process has become politicised in a systematic way.

The Government have a great deal of explaining to do if, in light of those numbers, we shall not have to conclude that she is right.

Dame Rennie Fritchie's second major conclusion is that her code of practice for appointments has been completely ignored. The conclusion of the section on the code of practice, on page 33 of the report, states:

> This assessment reveals that many of the principles in my Code of Practice have either been, or risk being, breached in both their letter and spirit.

[Mr. Andrew Tyrie]

That is strong stuff from the public appointments commissioner, and I am deeply worried that the Government have been rather cavalier in their response.

It is true that anxiety has been expressed about public appointments for many years and that many accusations have been made by Labour Members about Conservative appointments to trust boards and other quangos. In the past, the Conservatives appointed a disproportionate number of business men to such posts, and in particular to NHS trust boards. They did so with the worthy intention of trying to bring more business practice and understanding into the NHS, which was a valuable step forward. As Conservatives may be more plentiful in the business community than in other parts of the community, that may have resulted in some bias, but nothing could possibly compare with the figures—284 to 23—that I cited.

We desperately need, as a response from the Government, a clear statement that they will do what is required to restore public confidence on the issue. Public confidence has been badly compromised as a result of the findings in Dame Rennie Fritchie's report. In particular, it is essential that the Government get out of their state of denial on the issue—their conviction that nothing has gone wrong. We need to hear the Minister admit today that mistakes have been made in the appointments system–that there has been some political bias, and appointing on grounds other than merit–and that the Government will do something about it. The best thing that they can do is endorse the recommendations in Dame Rennie Fritchie's report. I hope that the Minister will feel able to do that, because it is the only way in which we can restore public confidence on this crucial issue.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I congratulate the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on securing the debate. However, I am not too sure whether his concern is about the national health service or the scoring of party political points, which he did at tremendous length.

A long time ago, I served as a member of a health authority for some 10 years. I was nominated by our local medical committee, the British Medical Association and my royal college, as was my consultant colleague. We had nominations from the voluntary sector and from local authorities. That made for a broadly based health authority, which, although not very efficient, was certainly effective in meeting the criteria of involving the community that the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen, (Mr. Denham), the Minister of State at the Department of Health, mentioned.

The first warning signs went up under a previous Government when nominating bodies were told that they had to nominate more people to fill a post than the number of vacancies in it, to ensure an opportunity for central direction by the Secretary of State. I am pleased to say that the bodies that nominated me failed to heed that instruction because it was thought to override local interest. We then had one of the organisations that we in the NHS suffered as time went on. The nature of health authority members changed dramatically and they became more akin to the non-executive members of public quoted companies. It was clear that the Secretary of State was seeking a different type of being to serve on that board. There was no longer a requirement to live in the area that one was serving, and all the concentration was on getting people with business and financial experience.

It is in the nature of such people that they do not have time to enter public life through the political process. Therefore, it may be true that no overt political activities were involved with those appointees. From my experience, however, it was also clear where their political allegiances lay. Today's debate is something of a sterile exercise. I am not surprised that the Government made changes after the last general election. They did so most inelegantly, somewhat brutally and at times stupidly. They overdid it, and I believe that they have recognised that things did not go well.

I am amazed at the tone of this morning's debate. It has been suggested that there is something disreputable about being politically active, that the political process should not be a route to making a contribution within the NHS. That is wrong. I welcome people of all persuasions taking an active part in public life rather than doing so through—

Mr. Tyrie: The hon. Gentleman says that people of all persuasions should participate. Does he think that participation of 284 Labour councillors and 23 Conservative councillors is participation of people of all persuasions?

Dr. Brand: I pointed out that the Government overdid it and that we were critical of them at the time.

I am concerned not about the politicisation of the process but about the continued patronage involved. That has gone on under succeeding Governments. Appointment to a national health body has become a second or even first career for some people, leading to well-paid appointments in quango-land. Those appointed have lost the independence of spirit and mind that comes from being democratically elected by a hinterland representing the community.

I shall differentiate between commissioning bodies and provider bodies. The democratic deficit in commissioning bodies is regrettable. The Government should rethink their response to Dame Rennie's report, which is extremely useful as a starting point for dealing with the issue. Commissioners of health services should be firmly based in the local community and democratically accountable, perhaps at local authority level and certainly at regional level. In provider trusts, it is right for a spread of expertise in the non-executive functions to be available to managers and commissioners. I welcome the fact that people from different backgrounds are being appointed on the merit of their contributions. Dame Rennie Fritchie's recommendations in that regard are extremely important.

In the past 20 years, the process has involved an unhealthy power of patronage. I applaud the many people who have made enormous contributions as non-executive members of health authorities and trusts, but they have always had to look over their shoulders in exercising their functions. It is important that the Government produce a substantial response to the report, which also examines the role of NHS boards. Is it the purpose of the boards to control the bottom line—the financial outcome? Is it their prime function to guide officers and managers of authorities and trusts in providing the service mix most suited to their locality? I am sorry that we have not devoted more time to that important issue, instead of having a slightly cheap knockabout.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I cannot agree with the final remark made by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand). My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) highlighted two important issues: the damning conclusions of Dame Rennie Fritchie's report and the Government's contemptuous treatment of those conclusions.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate and on his interest in the subject. I know that his interest was originally stimulated by particularly nasty examples in his constituency of the practices that he described. My hon. Friend has done Parliament and the health service a great favour with his persistence in bringing such matters to wider attention, culminating in today's debate, which has forced the Minister to make a response, however interim.

It is somewhat ironic that although the Government came to office claiming that they would clean up public life, remove suspicions of impropriety and sleaze, and depoliticise the appointments process, they have presided over a massive increase in the politicisation of that process. They have introduced a culture of cronyism into the national health service and elsewhere. The Minister's interventions on my hon. Friend seemed dangerously close to displays of complacency. She appeared to suggest that there was no problem; that Dame Rennie got it wrong and that there is nothing to worry about.

My hon. Friends the Members for Altrincham and Sale, West and for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) recited many of the findings of Dame Rennie's report. I shall summarise the most important points. The report concluded that the process of appointments to national health service bodies had been politicised in a systematic way and that the code of practice, which is supposed to govern those appointments, had been ignored. It said that there were clear examples of a candidate's political association acting as the decisive factor in his or her early selection and appointment and found evidence of the parachuting in of candidates at the instigation of Ministers at a late stage in the process as a result of lobbying by Members of Parliament.

Those practices meant, as my hon. Friends said, that 83 per cent. of councillors who were appointed during the first three years of the Government's term in office spent the first two and a half years as Labour councillors. It is important to recognise that that is against the backdrop of a significant decline in the number of Labour councillors. Four or five years ago, the Labour party had great plurality in the total number of local councillors, but the number of councillors from the two main parties is now almost equal. That makes the disproportion in appointments more shocking.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West referred to the Prime Minister's partial quote of Dame Rennie's finding that politicisation of appointments is not new. We know and accept that. The Labour party identified politicisation in NHS appointments before the general election and said that it would do something about it. What it did not say is that it intended to accelerate that process and bias it in favour of one political party. Dame Rennie noted that the process > has gained a new momentum since the general election.

It has indeed taken a quantum leap. She also noted that, as a result of the process, > less successful candidates have been brought forward to replace those already identified on merit on the grounds of promoting equal opportunities.

Real talent has been lost to the national health service. The NHS is too important to be a plaything of political correctness. The boards run one of the largest organisations in the country. They spend a budget which, over the next three years or so, will rise to £68 billion. That is a tremendous sum of money. They face an enormous task. Anyone who has talked to people who are engaged on the boards will know that the work load and demands are significant. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) made the point that the process has driven many people from providing their expertise to the NHS.

Let me give an example of the way in which the Government, especially in their first year of office, treated people who gave their time to benefit the NHS. People in my constituency who had served on the boards for a long time and whose appointments were due for renewal were sent letters explaining that, because their appointments were coming to an end, they should refrain from participating in significant decisions in the period before their last day.

Mr. Tyrie: Thank you and goodbye.

Mr. Hammond: It was worse than that. They received no further communication, although in one case the retiring chairman of an NHS trust received a letter two weeks after his appointment had terminated informing him that the Secretary of State had decided to reappoint him. His reply was, "Too late, mate; I've already found something else to do"—another valuable talent lost to the national health service as a result of the Government's incredibly incompetent process.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend recall the head of a Newcastle trust, Ann Galbraith, who led for the NHS on the citizens charter team? She did not know that she was not to be reappointed until her successor telephoned to ask whether she could make arrangements for handing over.

Mr. Hammond: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. There are examples from all over the country. I do not want to cite dozens of individual cases because we do not have the time, but I would like to quote an additional global figure, which is telling, that neither my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West nor my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester gave, although I am sure that both of them are aware of it. The figure was produced by the Library and shows that of the 87 appointees to national health service trusts in the Greater London area from May 1997 to 3 April 2000 who had declared political allegiances, 76 had allegiances to the Labour party. That figure is shocking.

What staggers and worries me so much is that the Secretary of State already has enormous power to direct and to control the national health service, which is a hugely centralised bureaucracy. Yet the Labour party apparently feels it necessary to install a second shadow control network, almost like the system that used to operate in the red army, in which there was a formal command structure and a system of political commissars who shadowed decisions and checked on the political correctness of what was being done. Many chairmen of NHS trusts and health authorities find that it is not unusual for them to be in direct communication with politicians. Two systems of control now operate in the NHS—the formal one and the political one, which operates at a different level. That should give us great cause for concern as we proceed with the plans for the development of the NHS that the Government are to announce shortly.

I want to leave adequate time for the Minister to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West, so I will ask just a couple of questions. When will the Government make a full response to the findings of Dame Rennie? Dame Rennie has made it clear that she regards the Minister's letter to her as no more than an interim response. Will the Minister tell us why it has taken so long to deliver even that inadequate interim response? Will she say why the Government were so reticent in talking about the issues after the Fritchie report was published and why they have chosen not to offer Dame Rennie the opportunity to discuss her findings with Ministers?

The Government's behaviour following the publication of the report has been a gross discourtesy to Dame Rennie and to Parliament. A report so damning of the Government has simply been ignored and only now, through the securing of this debate, have we dragged any response from them. We need to hear an assurance today from the Minister that there will be immediate action to implement the report's recommendations and that she will review the appointments that have been made under the flawed process since 1 May 1997. Further, she must ensure that all appointments were appropriate. She must assure us that, where they were not appropriate, and the postholders have not been performing the required function because of the way in which they were appointed, she will take steps to ensure that proper appointments are made in their place.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Gisela Stuart): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on securing the debate. Unlike him, I am extremely proud to be in Westminster Hall, which provides us with extra time in which to discuss issues. The hon. Gentleman was extremely misguided to treat it as a secondary Chamber—it is as important as the House. I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's long-standing interest in public appointments and I welcome the opportunity to respond to Dame Rennie Fritchie's comprehensive report. Time is short, but I want to respond to a couple of specific points that have been raised.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) asked when there would be a full response. I am very sorry that the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) regards it as an insult that an Under-Secretary, and not the Secretary of State, wrote to Dame Rennie Fritchie. However, in that letter I made it clear that, as part of the national plan, we are examining the whole process relating to accountability in the national health service. The role of non-executive directors will be extremely important.

I recollect that, in a Select Committee, an Opposition Member who had formerly served in the Department of Health described the appointments process at that time as highly politicised, with civil servants involved at a great distance and outcomes determined by chance, because it was not possible to foresee what would happen. The implication that the world was well, holy and wonderful before 1 May 1997 and has now gone down the drain suggests the need for Opposition Members to get in touch with reality.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The hon. Lady would be well advised to consult the Nolan report. That was favourable about the new procedures for health authority appointments, which have been established in no small measure because of Dame Rennie Fritchie's work. My point was simply that the matter is of such importance that the Secretary of State should have responded to Dame Rennie.

Ms Stuart: As I have said, what we are doing is part of the development of the national plan. Dame Rennie Fritchie's report was extremely helpful to us. In our initial response, we outlined the areas in which implementation has already taken place. We disagree over one or two aspects of the report, but as the national plan developments become clearer, we shall work closely with Dame Rennie Fritchie on further development.

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Stuart: I should like to continue. Time is needed for a proper response to a one-and-a-half-hour debate.

To listen to the debate, one would think that serving on an NHS board is some kind of gravy train on to which Labour councillors have jumped, with decisions made in smoke-filled rooms. The record should be put straight. The vast majority of members who serve as non-executive directors are lay people who ensure that the needs of their community are represented. They carry out an extremely important function. There are 3,000 of those public-spirited individuals. I agree with the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) about the decline in volunteering to serve in such public capacities. However, I remind Conservative Members that, in the past three years, one in four or one in five of them has responded to requests for nominations. If Conservative Members do not put names forward, they should not be surprised at not having any selected.

Mrs. Bottomley: Every name that I put forward was effectively black-balled. I put forward several names and every time the other individual was chosen. The hon. Lady might want to investigate that. The people whom I suggested were not, as far as I know, Conservatives.

Ms Stuart: That brings me to a useful point made by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight, who said that presenting the choice of two names was a positive step. I am terribly sorry to come across the attitude among Members of Parliament—it has come up in a previous Adjournment debate—that, having made their choice of who should be selected, their wishes have been ignored. The process involves an independent panel and a proper review. On the basis of the assessment, a choice is made. Sometimes those who are involved will not think that the best person has been chosen, but the proper process will have been used.

The achievements in the appointments process since 1997 have been not insignificant, not least because a far greater number of women now serve on NHS boards. That number has increased from 39 per cent. before the general election to 48.9 per cent. Even more dramatically, the number of black people and members of ethnic minorities has increased from 5 to 12 per cent. We should be careful when we use words such as "merit" and "ability". If the definition of merit is having a white, middle-class background, it is hardly surprising—

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Stuart: No, I shall not, as I want to make progress.

An equally successful but more important change is the increase since 1997 in the number of appointments of people with a community background. The proportion of people who are appointed from the voluntary sector and who are primarily users or carers has increased to 20 per cent. We do not for one moment deny that our boards still require the skills of business people, but the need for far wider representation remains. Dame Rennie Fritchie's report should be considered with those increases in mind.

I remind hon. Members that an independent auditor's report has been produced by Ernst and Young, which was employed by the commissioner. The report found that > in 1999, 75% of applicants for posts on NHS boards in the Northern and Yorkshire and North West Regions had declared "no political activity".

It went on to state:

> The data available suggest that the proportion of candidates declaring political activity at the application stage of the process are similar to the proportions declaring political activity at the appointment stage.

Before anybody is appointed or even shortlisted, an independent panel conducts a sifting and assessment process. It would be disingenuous to suggest that anybody is parachuted at the last moment without having gone through that process, as that is not happening.

Mr. Tyrie: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, as I realise that she does not have much time. She is saying that there is no problem and that we are making all of this up. Will she explain the fact that 284 Labour councillors were appointed between 1 May 1997 and November 1999, while only 23 Conservatives were appointed in that time? Does she believe that that can be described as anything else but political bias?

Ms Stuart: It is important to remember the number of people who put forward their names. I would not be at all surprised if more Labour councillors were prepared to put their names forward and to enter the selection process after May 1997. I would like to hear not merely about disagreements, but about evidence of widespread and systematic abuse of the system in the interview and selection process. The Government are responding to the needs of the whole chain of accountability in the national health service. I deeply reject the notion that everything was fine before 1997. Dame Rennie Fritchie referred to the courtesy with which people who are retiring are treated and to delays in appointment. We have addressed those points and moved forward.

I should like to correct the impression that the previous Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), wrote only to council leaders. An administrative error occurred when the first round of letters was sent, but now all of them go to council chief executives, so the opportunity to put names forward is shared equally among other parties.

Our response to the report lists a number of improvements that we have already put in place and others that we are considering. We agree with Dame Rennie's recommendation that Members of Parliament should no longer be asked to comment on shortlists for chair appointments. We inherited the practice from the previous Government—

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Stuart: No, I will not. There are two minutes left, and the hon. Gentleman spoke for 45 minutes. If he wants to hear an honest response, he should listen for a moment.

The practice of allowing Members of Parliament to comment on shortlists gave the impression that the process was politicised. We are happy to change it and are writing to hon. Members about it.

We part company with Dame Rennie on her view of local councillors, whose role we believe to be extremely important. They bring to their posts local knowledge of the community, which our NHS boards are supposed to reflect. There is no presumption, however, that being a councillor is an advantage in the interview and assessment process.

We will proceed with our proposals on the national plan. It is important that the right people are appointed, but we want more people from the regions to come forward as part of the plan. We shall announce further details, but we shall work closely with Dame Rennie to make that process more accountable and open, and to ensure that people see it as such.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. I am sure that the Under-Secretary would not wish to mislead the Chamber. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) spoke for 52, not 45, minutes.

Mr. Brady: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did overrun, but only because I gave way generously to all hon. Members, including the Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. I call Mr. Livsey.

Hyder

12.30 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the impact of the proposed takeover of Hyder plc on water, gas and electricity services. In the mid-1980s, the Liberals initiated a debate on the future of the water industry. When the then Secretary of State for the Environment, the late Nicholas Ridley, was challenged on whether he would privatise the water industry, amazingly, he said yes. He was then asked whether he would include that policy in the next Conservative party manifesto. Again, he said yes—much to the amazement of the Conservative Members sitting behind him, as he was announcing an entirely new policy off the cuff.

The Thatcherite juggernaut steamrollered on, and we have now reached a point when Hyder, one of the successor companies to the water authorities, could be taken over by a Japanese bank or an American power company. As for the Welsh assets, the choice is between a rock and a hard place. John Elfed Jones, chairman of Welsh Water, or Dwr Cymru, built up the company in the late 1980s. It was meant to be an enterprise icon for the new Wales, and it might have happened. However, once Mr. Jones retired, the Government's golden share was abandoned and the public veto therefore disappeared. Hyder was created by a new management team and in its early days that company, too, was successful.

We could dwell on why Hyder failed, but I do not want to speak of the past except to say that the Government levied a windfall tax of nearly £300 million, the regulators imposed full-value cuts on the company and the City forced it to borrow to buy Swalec. The Government and the City took £400 million out of the company, the regulators took another chunk, and the shares lost half their value; the company is now said to be £1.5 billion in debt.

After that debacle, Wales wants a phoenix to arise—a company based in Wales that will take over the water, electricity and gas businesses and which can provide services of good quality and value. I want the Minister to ensure that that will happen because the Government contributed to Hyder's downfall. The Welsh word "hyder" means confidence. I ask the Minister to give us confidence that the company will have a good and successful future.

Hyder has one of its headquarters in my constituency, where it has 60 employees. Its water division, Dwr Cymru, has 14 major reservoirs and associated land in my constituency. The three Taf Fechan reservoirs supply Cardiff, Talybont reservoir supplies Newport, Crai reservoir supplies Swansea and the four Elan valley reservoirs supply Birmingham and so forth. We want to be assured that the former massive public investment and the jobs that go with it will be in safe hands. Hyder employs about 9,000 people in its water, electricity and gas businesses. Their future must be secured.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman remember that, when the windfall tax was introduced, we were told that it was a victimless crime? However, it has put Hyder into an impossible situation and it is now up for grabs, with two companies interested in buying it. Does he agree that if it goes wrong, the victims of the windfall tax will be those employees who work for the company and consumers in Wales who receive their utility supplies from it?

Mr. Livsey: I certainly agree that that is the case; the cause is partially the Government's, but it is not theirs alone. The Liberal Democrats believe that the successful new deal ought to have been financed differently.

The Minister will know that two takeover bids for Hyder are on the table—one from the Japanese bank Nomura and the other from Western Power Distribution, an American subsidiary of Southern Power that generates electricity. It distributes electricity in the west of England and has its headquarters in Bristol. WPD wants to run Swalec and arrange for United Utilities, which is based in Warrington, to run the Welsh Water business in conjunction with North West Water. There are serious reservations about competition regulations connected with the WPD bid. Those issues must be handled in the United Kingdom. Nomura International, through St. David's Capital plc, is bidding for Hyder, and it intends to make it a Welsh-based company, operating from its Cardiff headquarters.

All political parties in the Welsh Assembly have agreed a strategy, which must succeed in the interests of Wales, Welsh consumers, the company's employees and the company and its assets. I can do no better than to state that strategy. It says that any new company should:

> preserve the integrity and identity of Hyder as a distinctively Welsh business and keep its headquarters in Wales...preserve the maximum number of jobs and, as a minimum, limit the number of job losses to those already announced by Hyder plc and agreed with trade unions.

It then states that it must be > committed to investment and development of the regulated and non-regulated businesses of Hyder plc and that, as a minimum, it must > maintain Hyder's environmental record and implement the Dwr Cymru investment programme within existing price limits.

It states that it must > note that the Assembly has a duty under section 121 of the Government of Wales Act to promote sustainable development (and that the Assembly has powers to call in applications for planning permission for decision under section 77 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 where an application raises planning issues of more than local importance).

Next, it states that a new company should > recognise the potential of Welsh water as an economic resource and acknowledge the wish of the National Assembly that the people of Wales should benefit from the use of this resource, especially when water is sold outside Wales...provide a high quality water and sewerage service for the people of Wales, and a high quality electricity service for the region of Wales that depends on SWALEC.

Finally, the strategy stated that the new company should > operate a fair pricing policy and consider the formula set by the industry regulators as setting the maximum charge to be levied, rather than the norm.

I cannot underestimate how important water is as a natural resource to Wales, especially as water will one day be in short supply worldwide. The First Secretary of the National Assembly endorsed the views of the Environment, Planning and Transport and the Economic Affairs Committees, which drew up the statement that I just quoted. The Liberal Democrats in the Welsh Assembly endorsed that statement only too willingly.

The First Secretary has written to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the competition worries resulting from the Western Power Distribution bid. He endorses the Assembly Committees' calls for the bid to be repatriated to the United Kingdom from the EU competition authorities under the provisions of article 9 of European Community Council regulation 4064/89 as amended by regulation 1310/97; he also confirms that the UK should be enabled to take appropriate measures under the provisions of article 21. I hope that the Minister will deal with that matter.

Our main concerns are the combination of two neighbouring electricity distribution businesses, Swalec and SWEB, and the fact that the United Utilities company, under its other aegis of North West Water, will be supplying water in two contiguous geographical areas. Those concerns are to the fore in Wales. The link between the two water companies—United Utilities and what is at present Dwr Cymru—will not be conducive to the promotion of competition in the water industry. Hon. Members will know that the Assembly issued a joint consultation paper with the Government on the subject earlier in the year.

The separation of the ownership of Dwr Cymru's assets from its operations, as well as the possible creation of a mutual company to own it, raises wider regulation issues. The resulting modifications that the Director General of Water Services proposed to the Dwr Cymru licence might raise the possibility of the Assembly using its powers of direction under section 13 of the Water Industries Act 1991. If it did so, the director general would have to consider whether he wanted to pursue the proposals by way of a reference to the Competition Commission and section 14 of the Act. No apparent implications from the bid give rise to competition considerations outside the UK. Such considerations in the UK are sufficient to provide grounds to seek repatriation under article 9. Wider measures may be appropriate under article 21, as well as public interest issues and concerns such as those identified by the Assembly Committee, which have been communicated to the commission.

The First Secretary and all the political parties in Wales believe that there is strong reason to refer the WPD bid to the Competition Commission. The Minister should be able to assure us that that will be done. The bid must be repatriated from the European Union competition authorities, in particular its electricity supply aspects. I have already mentioned those concerns as they affect the water industry. At present, it appears that the Nomura International bid satisfies UK competition criteria but the WPD bid does not. In the public interest, I ask that public documents relating to WPD's relationship with United Utilities are made available and placed in the Library. They have a material influence on how the company proposes to manage Welsh Water, given that there will be two water companies operating geographically side by side.

The deal is complex and it also affects other businesses and professional services operated by Hyder. Another factor that must be accounted for is that the United States controlling company, Southern Power, must clear its bid with the US Securities and Exchange Commission. So far, it has not done so. There may well be conflicts with Southern Power taking over, through its WPD subsidiary, a water company, for example. That process must be monitored and examined in the United Kingdom not only by the Office of Fair Trading, but more importantly by the Competition Commission.

Will the Competition Commission exclusively handle the WPD bid for Hyder? What key points can the Minister assure us will be primarily considered by the Department of Trade and Industry in the investigation? I am especially concerned about those matters that will have a material influence on the final decision. Will the Minister give us the timetable leading to the conclusion of a Department of Trade and Industry decision? What time scale would that process have? Time is not on Hyder's side and an early conclusion of any investigation will give confidence to its customers in Wales, its work force and its shareholders and give security to its assets. Decisive action is required now for the benefit of all concerned.

The Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe (Mrs. Helen Liddell): I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) on securing this important debate, although the timing is inappropriate for me and I am constrained in what I may say in reply.

The hon. Gentleman has made a cogent explanation of his position that will appear in the Official Report and will, I am sure, be borne in mind by the relevant authorities. I am constrained because, as a Minister, I have responsibilities in relation to the competition process. Therefore, it would be inappropriate for me to respond to some of the hon. Gentleman's specific points.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that I am accompanied by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson). He is listening closely to the debate, as Wales has a legitimate interest, and my hon. Friend the First Secretary will soon address the National Assembly for Wales on the matter. The Secretary of State, other Ministers and I have been in communication about the issues that my hon. Friend the First Secretary raised.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire referred to the windfall tax; he may care to reflect that the tax was a consequence of the bungled privatisation of the utilities by the previous Government. That tax was not some wheeze dreamt up at the last minute; it was presented by the Labour party in opposition as a clear route for finding resources to help young people into work. Today, as we celebrate the lowest unemployment figures for 25 years, the hon. Gentleman will recognise that many of our constituents have benefited as a consequence of that tax. As it appeared two years ago, company managements have had time to reassess liabilities and put their companies into a position in which they can continue to operate.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Would the Minister accept that Hyder's situation is a consequence not only of the windfall tax but of the City squeezing that company dry for dividend shares? One does not need to lay all the blame at the Government's doorstep.

Mrs. Liddell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want me to comment, especially in subjective language, on the behaviour of City institutions. Rather than talking about the past, we must deal with the situation as we find it.

The proposed acquisition of Hyder by St. David's Capital plc was considered by the competition authorities under the merger provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry decided, in accordance with the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading, not to refer the case to the Competition Commission. The Department announced the merger clearance on 7 June.

The bid by Western Power Distribution for Hyder has fallen, as the hon. Gentleman knows, to the consideration of the European Commission competition authorities under the European Commission merger regulations. My hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs announced on 7 July that the United Kingdom had decided not to request the European Commission to refer the proposed acquisition by WPD of Hyder to the United Kingdom competition authorities under article 9 of the EC merger regulations, as it did not satisfy the relevant criteria in the regulation.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Minister ask the Secretary of State to reconsider that decision, because many issues will affect the United Kingdom? I drew her attention to them earlier, not least the fact that two electricity companies will be running side by side in the south, as will two water companies further north. Surely such matters should be considered within the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Liddell: The decision was made in accordance with the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading and the sectoral regulators, and we must act within the terms of that advice. It may help the hon. Gentleman to know that the European Commission will decide by 14 July whether to initiate a detailed investigation of the case.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the situation in which WPD proposes to procure certain services from United Utilities. I understand why he wants documentation relating to that matter placed in the Library, but he will appreciate that such information is commercially sensitive. The documents have been made available to the United Kingdom competition authorities in confidence and it is beyond my powers to place them in the Library, given that UK merger legislation protects such information from release unless the relevant companies agree to it being made public.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister agree that such matters are in the public interest? A monopoly-type situation is being created, which it is in the public interest to investigate. Such documentation should be in the public domain, so that people can judge the matter for themselves. The issues are more important than those of commercial confidentiality to which the right hon. Lady refers.

Mrs. Liddell: The hon. Gentleman should take into account the fact that Ministers can act only within the terms of what is available to them. It would not be possible for them to place such commercially sensitive information in the Library without the express permission of the two companies involved. The action that the hon. Gentleman wants to be taken is not at my disposal.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs said on 7 July, the WPD proposal did not fall within the remit of the EC competition authorities. I confirm that the United Kingdom competition authorities, including the sectoral regulators, are examining carefully whether the transaction falls to be considered under United Kingdom competition law and whether considerations are on-going. Irrespective of the changes in ownership of the licensed utilities involved in the bids, the regulatory regimes will continue to apply. That is of direct relevance to the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

I shall outline how the regulatory regimes operate. In response to each of the bids for Hyder, the Director General of Water Services and the Director General of Gas and Electricity Markets issued a joint consultation paper on the consequences of the bids for Hyder-regulated subsidiaries, Dwr Cymru and South Wales Electricity.

First, on the water issues, the Office of Water Services, the economic regulator for the water industry, is required to discharge the functions in the manner best calculated to ensure that the regulated utilities perform their functions properly and can therefore finance the performance of the company. Subject to that requirement, it must secure protection for water and sewerage customers on charges and the quality of service, promote efficiency and facilitate effective competition.

Ofwat considers that proposed mergers and those competition and regulatory issues raised before the Director General of Fair Trading are a legitimate area for the regulator to have in mind. Ofwat has to identify necessary licence modifications that deal with concerns that might arise from proposals. I am sure that the points made by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire will be taken into account.

As an example in relation to the bid for Hyder, Ofwat was interested in whether any prospective owner of DC would be fit and proper to assume the role of statutory water and sewerage undertaker, and whether DC's conditions of appointment might need to be strengthened so that any involvement as part of a larger group should not impede its ability to discharge its duties. In the bids by St. David's Capital and WPD, the director general secured the bidder's agreement to the modification of DC's conditions of appointment, which dealt with the consequences of its possible absorption into a much larger group than Hyder.

The WPD bid raises wider issues, because WPD intends to separate DC's roles as statutory undertaker and owner of the core assets from the day-to-day operation of the business. It proposes an initial contract with a company that is to be purchased by United Utilities, which owns North West Water, the statutory water and sewerage undertaker for the north-west of England. Ofwat considered in particular whether such a proposed operating arrangement would be acceptable.

As a result of negotiations with WPD on the issue and following a public consultation, Ofwat secured WPD's agreement that, if the bid were successful, DC's conditions of appointment would be modified to include a new obligation to replace the initial contract with a programme of competitive outsourcing acceptable to the regulator. As the DTI press notice of last week stated, > irrespective of changes in the ownership of the licensed water and sewerage undertaker (DC) owned by Hyder, the water regulatory regime will continue to apply to it.

The hon. Gentleman raised several other matters. If I am not able to answer them all in the few minutes left to me, I shall write to him. On the electricity issues, Hyder distributes through Swalec, so the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets also took an interest in the competing bids for Hyder. Ofgem's function is clear. It is to protect the interests of consumers, ensuring that they have genuine value and choice by promoting effective competition in gas and electricity markets. It also regulates the monopoly elements. Ofgem considers the competition implications of any proposed merger on its individual characteristics, taking into account the precedent that applies from previous policy statements. It consults the public and third parties, and examines the issue internally before making recommendations to the Director General of Fair Trading.

Ofgem considered the competing bids and took a balanced approach to the consideration of the merger. It applied similar conditions to the equivalent aspects of the offers, and plans to seek licence amendments and assurances from any successful bidder for Hyder. The hon. Gentleman made several points, which I shall ensure that the director general can consider.

I cannot comment on the two bids, or on some of the broader issues that the hon. Gentleman invited me to consider. However, I want to emphasise what all the regulators require from the bidders. They need to ensure that the regulated utilities will comply with their legal obligations and that the quality of service to customers is at least as good as that presently provided. Whoever owns Hyder must ensure that staff and systems are in place so that networks keep working, necessary investments for reinforcement and improvements are made, emergencies can be handled quickly and professionally, and customers continue to be at the centre of the business.

I have not answered all of the hon. Gentleman's questions. I shall happily answer those that I can legitimately answer, within the constraints of my position as a Minister, in a letter and I congratulate him on securing the debate.

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): I am delighted to be able to lead this debate on the plight of Iranian Jews falsely imprisoned for espionage. I have a constituency interest and an interest in international affairs. The constituency interest is that I have the pleasure of representing the majority of Scotland's Jewish community. I also have the unconditional honour of representing a small number of holocaust survivors. My interest in trying to prevent the persecution of and discrimination against Jewish people, in this country and internationally, motivated me to apply for this debate.

Unfortunately, it is impossible to consider the plight of the Iranian Jews without considering the context of the domestic power struggle in Iran, between the moderates on the one hand and the conservatives on the other. I am worried that Iran's wider Jewish community, which numbers 25,000 I think, may be caught up in that power struggle. However, the purpose of today's debate is to focus on the 10 Jews who have been imprisoned.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I am pleased that my hon. Friend mentioned the more general context before moving on to the specific case. Does he not agree that this case is a powerful example of the wider concern about Iran's attitude to Israel and the Jewish community in general? For example, Iran remains one of the leading state sponsors of terrorist organisations such as Hamas which, as we know, wants to disrupt the middle east peace process. Furthermore, Jews in Iran are still forbidden to teach the Hebrew language.

Mr. Murphy: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas), who has raised the matter diligently during Foreign Office questions. Ayatollah Khamenei—a leading conservative who is involved in the power struggle in Iran—chose, on the first day of the new Christian millennium, to celebrate that date by demanding the destruction of the state of Israel. On the other hand, the reformist President Khatami was elected in May 1997—as Britain was electing a new Government, so was Iran—on a 69 per cent. popular vote. His slogan was "Iran for all Iranians". To many friends of the reformists in Iran, that slogan signalled a change in policy and approach.

Unfortunately, persecution continues. The domestic press in Iran is stifled, and, as we know, student demonstrations have been violently put down. The Bahai minority, who number 300,000, have been subject to violent and continued persecution. It is important to recognise where the 10 persecuted Jews fit into that context. Despite my hon. Friend's correct comments, the purpose of the debate is not to consider the wider issue but to focus on those 10 individuals.

Unfortunately, the analysis of the arrests, trial and sentences in The Economist was correct. It stated:

> The sentences were severe enough to pacify Iranian hardliners but lenient enough to save Iran from diplomatic punishment.

Perhaps The Economist was right about the former point, but it must be shown to be wrong about the latter. Iran cannot escape diplomatic pressure and punishment if the sentences are allowed to stand. The charges were false and the trial was a violation of human rights. I shall remind my hon. Friend the Minister of some of the details. In January 1999, 13 Iranian Jews and three Muslims were arrested, but no charges were publicly identified at that time. Six months later, in June 1999, the Iranian revolutionary court charged the Jews with spying for the > Zionist regime, the USA and World Arrogance.

The 13 Jews included a Jewish teacher, a chief rabbi, a kosher meat preparer, a cemetery attendant and a 16-year-old boy. I understand that the charges of spying for the United States of America were dropped, although I have no idea why. Perhaps they were dropped on the understanding that it would be difficult to spy for two countries at once.

The trial was flawed and fundamentally violated human rights. There was no physical evidence whatever. There were only confessions, which were not given in court. The solicitor, a respected former Iranian judge, complained that the alleged confessions were obtained after a period of solitary confinement. I have never been in that situation and I do not know how I would react. What would any ordinary human being do when asked to confess after a period of prolonged solitary confinement? The Jews were secure in the knowledge that they were being used as political pawns in a domestic power struggle. They had been denied access to a lawyer for prolonged periods. They knew that 17 Jews had been executed in Iran since the revolution in 1979. Under all those pressures and worries, perhaps the confessions were, in their minds, an attempt to receive leniency.

With all the mitigating circumstances, the lawyers strongly believed that the confessions should have been inadmissible. I find it absolutely astonishing that the solicitor, who had been appointed by the state, was not allowed access to the accused. It is incredible that the Jews were not allowed access to their solicitor, but television time was given for the alleged confessions to be aired publicly. The solicitor complained that he could not have access to the accused; the television journalists had no such complaint. That is no form of justice as I understand it.

I was absolutely amazed to learn that revolutionary court Judge Nourani was not only the prosecution; he also appointed the defence solicitor and handed down the verdicts. That sums up much of what is wrong in this case of trumped-up charges. One of the accused, Shahrohh Paknahad—I apologise if my pronunciation is not perfect—is a 30-year-old Jewish teacher, charged with passing military secrets to Iraq during the Iran-Iraq war. I have no idea how the Iranian Government reach the understanding that a Jew is passing military secrets to Saddam Hussein's regime. Even if they can make that leap of logic, the fact is that he was eight years of age at the start of that war. The charges do not bear even the most superficial examination, never mind the examination of a fair hearing.

Ultimately, 10 of the accused were found guilty and six were acquitted—three Jews and three Muslims. The sentences ranged from four to 13 years in confinement. The international reaction to the trial and judgment is a matter of considerable public record. The trial process was condemned by the European Union, the United States and—I am pleased to say—strongly condemned by Her Majesty's Government. Our Ministers played a leading role in trying to secure a public hearing and a transparent trial. The reaction was in many ways even stronger when the judgments were passed. Some people had speculated that death sentences might have been passed and suggested that we should therefore be relieved that they were not. However, one can take no joy in the fact that these innocent individuals are faced with jail sentences of four to 13 years.

I was given a categorical assurance during Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs questions, when I asked whether the Government would do all in their power to ensure that the trial would be open and transparent, and that the accused would have access to legal advice of their own choosing. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had been told that those things would happen, but that did not occur. I believe that he gave those assurances in good faith. The source of the problem is not our Foreign Secretary, but the Iranian authorities and the Iranian Government, who misled the British Government and gave them false assurances. What do our Government intend to do in response?

Amnesty International condemned the trial process and the sentences as a violation of international human rights law, saying:

> The proceedings in this closed trial fall far short of international standards for a fair trial.

In a letter to the President of Iran, the Council of Christians and Jews demanded that the trial be transparent and just and said that the accused would be in its prayers. The signatories to that letter are hardly radicals or people who would apply pressure without due consideration. They include the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Moderator of the Church of Scotland. They are honourable people who do not take these actions without proper consideration. I can only hope that their prayers have been more successful than their letter to the Iranian President.

What action can be taken by this and other Governments throughout the world to secure a successful appeal process? International pressure helped to ensure that death sentences were not handed down. International pressure can help to ensure that these appeals are successful when they are heard. Britain is in a unique position for two reasons. First, we have now established diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level with Iran. Our ambassador in Tehran and Iran's ambassador here should be in no doubt of the strength of feeling that exists in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the House of Commons about this issue. We should use the channel of diplomatic relations to ensure that maximum pressure is applied.

Secondly, the UK and Iran are strong trading partners. Our economic ties with Iran are close. In 1999, Britain exported the equivalent of $244 million to Iran and we imported the equivalent of $36 million from Iran. The former Conservative Minister, Mr. Jeremy Hanley, recently led a trade delegation to Iran to try to forge new business links.

On 26 June 2000, the Iranian news agency reported that one of the leaders of that delegation, Mr. John Hill, said that the delegates would report back to British companies to tell them about their experiences of the improvement in the political climate. I do not doubt the sincerity of his comments and there is no limit to my hope that there will be improvements in the political situation in Iran: that will be the hope of the friends of Iranian reform throughout the world. British business cannot ignore the persecution of these individuals, however, and the wider discrimination that occurs in Iran.

I make an appeal to my hon. Friend the Minister and to all Ministers for joined-up government, so that we can ensure that these innocent Iranian citizens can be reunited with their relatives. I appeal to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who will visit Iran in the near future, publicly to state Britain's view on the matter and our disappointment that our Government were misled earlier this year and to ask for assurances that the appeals process, unlike the trial itself, will be open and transparent.

I understand that our Government's position is that the people involved have been treated as pawns in a domestic power struggle. However, it is not good enough simply for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to apply pressure. In the spirit of joined-up government, the Department of Trade and Industry and other Government Departments should play their part to ensure that it is not only a political matter but an economic one and that Mr. Hill's comments and the efforts of Mr. Hanley in taking British trade to Iran and bringing Iranian trade here are not made in a vacuum that ignores the oppression of Iran's Jews.

We should constantly remind Iran that we shall consider the matter in a wider context. I understand that Iran wants to apply for membership of the World Trade Organisation, which is to be welcomed. If Iran opens up to international economies and liberalises its economy, that too is to be welcomed. We should make the case, through whichever Government Department is involved, that Iran's application for membership of the WTO will bring it under closer international scrutiny, including scrutiny of this case.

I make a statement not so much for our own Foreign Office but for Iranian representatives here in London. The issue will not go away. Members of Parliament from all political parties will continue to press the matter as long as those 10 Iranian Jews remain in prison. Indeed, questions on the matter have already been tabled for the next Foreign Office questions.

At stake is Iran's long-term standing in the international community. If the appeals are unsuccessful, the spirit of tolerance and international hope for a new, more tolerant Iran—an Iran "for all Iranians" as the President said very publicly—will be seen to have been put to the test and to have failed. The matter raises much wider issues than the fate of 10 Iranian Jews. Iranian justice and political reform are on trial. If the appeals fail, the Iranian justice system will be found guilty, not 10 Iranian Jews.

1.17 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Peter Hain): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) for having raised the issue of the Iranian Jews found guilty of espionage in Shiraz. I pay tribute to his energy in raising this matter and others. He is highly respected in his own constituency, especially among the large Jewish community there, as well as for his energetic pursuit of human rights issues in Parliament generally. That is important, because his approach to the issue is part of a wider commitment to human rights across the globe. I agree that the Iranian authorities here in London will have to acknowledge that the issue will not go away.

As my hon. Friend knows and has, indeed, been fair in acknowledging, the Government are deeply worried by the news of the sentences imposed on 1 July on 10 Jewish and two Muslim defendants tried for espionage in Shiraz. I agree that, to use his words, the trial was "deeply flawed". We and our EU partners have consistently expressed our anxieties about the conduct of the trial, and in particular about its closed nature. He is absolutely right that, despite earlier assurances to us from the Iranian authorities—indeed, from Iranian Ministers—that the trial would be open, it was not. That is unacceptable.

Dr. Rudi Vis (Finchley and Golders Green): My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said that the trial would be fair because he had been assured that it would be. Is that assurance in writing? If so, should we not go through it line by line and ask the Iranian Government or the Iranian embassy in London what is their reaction to the trial not having been fair?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge my hon. Friend's close interest and, in particular, that of his constituents in the matter, and I am happy to respond to his question. The problem is that our interlocutors in the Iranian Government are Ministers. The court system is run by the revolutionary court, which is largely opposed to the reform process. So, to be open about it, there is a power struggle in Iran between the reformers in the Government, led by President Khatami, who has the overwhelming support of the people, and the entrenched interests that retain control of the court process. The assurances, which were given, accepted and represented in the House by the Foreign Secretary in good faith, got caught in the middle of that power struggle.

Both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary raised the issue with Foreign Minister Kharrazi during the latter's visit in January and I pressed the matter with deputy Foreign Minister Sarmadi when we met in March. More recently, the FCO director for the middle east and north Africa raised it with the Iranian ambassador on 1 June, and the EU presidency in Tehran presented démarches on behalf of all EU partners to the Iranian authorities on 29 April and 23 May. The Secretary of State discussed the matter with members of the Board of Deputies of British Jews when he met them on 14 June. Therefore, we have been fully engaged throughout the process and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood for rightly commending our leading role in the matter.

Immediately after the announcement of the verdicts on 1 July, we issued a statement expressing our deep concern, which we have subsequently reiterated with Iranians in London and Tehran. I welcome the fact that no death sentences were passed; 17 Iranian Jews have been executed since 1979. The sentences are however extremely heavy, particularly given the nature of the charges and the character of the trial. It is important to note that provision is made for an appeal to the Shiraz revolutionary court within 20 days of sentencing and, if need be, to the supreme court. We will continue to monitor the proceedings, on which the eyes of the entire world will be directed, closely.

We regularly raise our concerns about the plight not just of a single minority in Iran, but of the Bahais, students, intellectuals and others, many of whom are Muslims, who also face serious threats.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): What constructive action does the Minister believe that the Government or hon. Members can take to reverse the death sentences that have been passed on a small number of Bahais in Iran, where the Bahai faith is not formally recognised and they are afforded no state protection?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's close involvement with the Bahais, in Britain and internationally. We remain concerned at reports of the death sentences passed on three members of the Bahai faith in Mashad on 3 February. We and our EU partners have raised those concerns with the Iranian authorities. We welcome the news that one of the three, Mr. Khulusi, has since been released. We regularly raise with the Iranian authorities our serious concern about the treatment of the Bahais because persecution of individuals on religious grounds is unacceptable.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: I have to make progress first.

In line with our policy of constructive engagement, we continue to raise our concerns privately with the Iranian authorities. Some hon. Members have argued that we should have no dialogue with Iran. We believe, however, that the best means of encouraging the forces most likely to promote human rights is through critical engagement—the pursuit of political dialogue wherever it can produce benefits. The reformist Government need to be able to show that progress on human rights can bring benefits to their country, through trade and other means. However, engagement does not mean suspending judgment. To engage with Iran, we have not refrained from raising the difficult issues. A number of positive developments support a broader relationship with Iran—a country with a population of more than 60 million, which is rapidly becoming a key player in the region. Its neighbours are seeking rapprochement, and Iran is playing an increasingly constructive role in regional issues, such as Iraq and Afghanistan.

We also benefit from bilateral co-operation on drugs. More than 90 per cent. of the heroin on our streets originates from Afghanistan, and most of it goes through Iran on the way to Europe. Iran has seized more drugs than any other country; last year, the Iranian authorities were responsible for more than 60 per cent. of the world's opiate seizures, but they paid a heavy price for the fight against the drug traffickers. More than 3,000 Iranian drug enforcement officers have been killed in confrontations with smugglers and their gangs in the past 15 years.

Our co-operation with the Iranians in the matter helps them and directly benefits people in Britain. We are developing that co-operation, especially in tackling terrorism. I acknowledge the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) in that respect; we raise the matter continuously.

Despite the outcome of the Shiraz trial, which gives grave cause for concern, there has recently been progress on some aspects of the human rights situation in Iran.

The latest United Nations Commission on Human Rights resolution on Iran, adopted on 17 April, and drafted and sponsored by the European Union, noted positive developments on human rights, including the recent elections, movement towards greater freedom of expression and progress on the status of women, although at the same time expressing its deep concerns on remaining issues. We continue to urge Iran to co-operate with the United Nations on such matters, including allowing a visit by Maurice Copithorne, a United Nations special representative on human rights.

The Iranian people want reform, as shown by the election in May 1997 of President Khatami, who advocates the development of an Islamic civil society based on respect for the rule of law. Since then, in municipal elections in February last year, and in parliamentary elections in February and May this year, the people of Iran have overwhelmingly shown their continued support for President Khatami: 80 per cent. of the electorate support reform, including the vast majority of women and young people. Sixty per cent. of Iranian citizens are under the age of 25 and they all want reform.

However, opposition to reform remains in some quarters. The closure of 18 pro-reform newspapers in the run up to the election is an example. However, the new, largely reformist Parliament, which first sat on 27 May, has already declared its intention to tackle the problem. New legislation is being proposed to safeguard the independence of the press and to curb the powers of intervention of the judiciary. We welcome the comments of the recently elected Speaker of the Parliament, who said that it > must seriously try to meet the wishes of the people...we are sure that the people are after freedom of expression.

The new Parliament also declared its determination to tackle economic issues and the need to streamline Government. It is not for us to intervene in the internal situation, but isolation is not the right policy if we want to engage the process of reform. Only through constructive engagement can we show our support for the will of the Iranian people while maintaining our ability to raise concerns such as the trial, which I mentioned earlier, when they arise.

Mr. Clappison: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. Earlier, he mentioned the Shiraz revolutionary court. Is there a risk of the court increasing the sentence or can it impose only a less severe sentence?

Mr. Hain: I do not think that it could increase the sentence; that would be unthinkable.

I am aware of the statement signed by hon. Members calling for a change in United Kingdom policy towards Iran. We and our European Union colleagues have continuing anxieties about human rights violations, which we regularly draw to the attention of the authorities. We must base our analysis on unbiased sources, however, such as the reports of Maurice Copithorne and the latest United Nations resolution adopted in April, both of which recognise improvements in Iran, rather than the propaganda of the National Council for the Resistance of Iran mentioned in the statement, which appears largely to have inspired it.

Some of my hon. Friends may not be aware that NCRI is dominated by the terrorist Mujahedin-e-Khalq organisation, the MKO, which claims responsibility for a number of terrorist attacks in Iran. The NCRI and the MKO are on the USA State Department's proscribed list of terrorist organisations. We do not recognise either of them, neither did the Opposition when they were in government. The MKO is despised by most Iranians—it is important that hon. Members understand that—as it supported Saddam Hussein in the Iran-Iraq war.

The Government believe that it is right to promote human rights, but we must choose the right way of doing so. That means responding to human rights challenges in a way that is most likely to help the people whose freedoms are being restricted. The way in which the case of the Shiraz defendants is dealt with through the appeals process will be a big test of that strategy and of the future of Iran and its people. The eyes of the world will be on Iran. It is important that the Iranian authorities respect the freedoms of those defendants.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Before we start the next debate, it may be convenient to allow the Minister to take his seat reasonably gently. If he wishes to, he may address the Chair from a seated position.

Policing (Public Events)

1.30 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I sympathise with the Minister in his incapacitated state. My incapacity—such as it is—is my throat. I hope that it will last the duration of the debate.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise an issue that was raised with me by constituents, but has wider relevance. I shall talk about the policing of outdoor public events and, specifically, the traffic management role of police at one-day agricultural shows, Pony Club events, village fetes and the other voluntary or semi-professional events that are held each summer that many people want to attend, but which cause some disruption to local traffic and need to be organised with a little care.

The issue was first brought to my attention by Mr. Charles Bradley Hudson, whom I met at Wincanton races. I do not raise everything that I am told at Wincanton races on the Floor of the House, but the gentleman involved was responsible for stewarding the races and therefore had relevant expertise. He was concerned that police policy had changed and he thought that that would have knock-on effects for commercial organisations such as his and for voluntary organisations.

As I pursued the issue, I found that it was not confined to Avon and Somerset police, with which the Minister knows that I am familiar from my past career. The guidance given by the Association of Chief Police Officers and the public safety policy that it issued on 28 April 1999 mean that the issue is relevant across the country.

The policy represents a shift in police thinking, probably for good reasons. The chief police officers are anxious to use their human and financial resources to best possible effect, and the best use of a uniformed constable is not necessarily directing traffic. I understand that. I have argued for many years that we require additional police officers in Somerset and elsewhere and I understand the difficult decisions that police management must take.

There is concern, which is also expressed in the public safety policy document, about the liability of police officers in such circumstances. The point that has been repeatedly made to me is also made in the introduction to the policy document, which says:

> the Police have no general duty to preserve public safety at any public event, except where there are imminent or likely threats to life.

That is clearly a statement of fact about the responsibility of the police. The introduction continues:

> Legal opinion suggests that the responsibility for public safety rests with the organisers of an event, the owners of the land on which it takes place and possibly the Local Authority if the event takes place on a road. However, other persons or agencies who undertake actions regarding public safety at an event may assume a duty of care and, therefore, also become responsible.
> In the past, the service—

the police service—

> has taken the lead and undertaken actions to facilitate public events, acting for what they believed to be the public good. However, with the emerging spectre of civil litigation, a more focused approach, confining Police action to those issues that are part of our core responsibilities and where there is legal authority, is becoming necessary.

The consequence of that view is that the police should not be directly involved with policing outside public events. That should be the responsibility of the event organisers, and the police should be employed only in the circumstances that I described earlier: where there is an imminent threat, or where there is no reasonable alternative. The outcome of that change of policy has been a withdrawal of police presence at outside public events this year. I understand some of the arguments for that, but I also want to explore with the Minister some of the consequences for others of that outcome and consider how that vacuum might be filled.

There is a vacuum in preparation and planning for events, in training and accreditation of people who take on the role of directing or assisting traffic movements and in terms of signage, liability and powers. During the past few months, I have addressed people in the various Government Departments who have partial responsibility for that area in an attempt to obtain some answers. Indeed, I received a helpful answer from the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), who said:

> I understand from the Association of Chief Police Officers that each Local Authority has a Safety Advisory Group on which the police are represented and they consider the risks associated with any proposed site for an organised local event such as a horse show or agricultural fair.

Actually, that is not the case. I do not deny that the Minister was given that advice, but according to the House of Commons Library researchers, local authorities have not set up safety advisory groups. The Association of Chief Police Officers would like such groups to be set up, but there is no mechanism to make that happen. Indeed, the Local Government Association is wary of following that course. There is a question about which authority is responsible. The responsible authority for licensing a particular area to be used for an event will almost certainly be the district council, which is not the highway authority. Therefore, there is a dichotomy between the responsibilities of the various local authorities.

It would be extremely helpful to have a system that permits a proper exchange of views. That would cure some of the problems, but I suspect not all of them. I also wrote to the public safety committee of ACPO, chaired by Mr. Sean Price, the assistant chief constable of Nottinghamshire. He wrote me an extremely helpful letter and offered to meet me—an offer that I intend to take up to enable me to discuss these issues with him. He said that the intention was for the traffic management policies that emerge from those advisory groups to be self-policing, but I do not believe that that is the case. For example, I do not believe that the Frome cheese show, a significant one-day agricultural show, will be self-policing. However sophisticated the signs and cones, traffic management will not simply happen of its own accord; it will need direction and support.

The likely result of an absence of police, traffic wardens or some other uniformed presence is chaos. Chaos is good for no one and is certainly not good for organisers of events. There is also a potential danger to public safety if emergency vehicles, for instance, have to get through. That is what concerns me.

Mr. Price continued by referring to the point that I had raised with him about the training of those who control or who seek to control traffic. His opinion was:

> As to the issue of training traffic management officers, I feel that in the light of what I have said above this becomes an unnecessary measure.

Again, he prays in aid the traffic management policy because he believes that that will be self-policing and that there is no need for stewards to be on the road directing traffic. First, I do not accept that premise and, secondly, people will in any case want to assist those attending their event. They will go out on the road and don orange jackets, but they will have not the slightest idea of what they are doing in terms of traffic management. They will not have training or accreditation because that is not available.

People whose job it is to organise events, such as Mr. Charles Bradley Hudson, to whom I referred, want their stewards to be trained properly and to be able to do the job properly. They want accreditation, which could best be provided by the police, to enable that to happen.

Adequate temporary signs could make a major contribution in the absence of police but, again, we have a little policy vacuum. Lord Whitty tells me that signs can be put up only with the agreement of the relevant traffic authority, which again puts the onus back on event organisers. He also tells me that the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is reviewing and updating traffic sign regulations—the code of practice and guidance on the provision of temporary signs to special events.

That is all well and good, but to implement half a policy and then wait for the other half to come along is not a sign of what we have come to call joined-up government. The people caught in the middle are those least able to find their way through the jungle—those trying to raise money for charity and to organise events. I worry about the situation.

My final major point is liability. People who have no training or accreditation in directing traffic are personally liable for their actions. They have no power to stop vehicles. If a driver gets fed up in the traffic and does not like the look of the chap in the orange jacket, he could drive past irrespective of the consequences. That was confirmed by my local chief superintendent, Ted Allen, who told me:

> In respect of a member of the public directing traffic on a public highway they have no legal standing and would do so at their own risk with any incident resulting being investigated accordingly.

There is a premium on people who are trying to improve public safety and to do a job for their local community, but who are liable for anything that happens as a result. What worries me is the duty of care that a person with that responsibility would have not to do something reckless or rash—for example, not to call someone forward in front of a moving vehicle. I understand the point; that liability is reasonable. I wonder, though, whether the organisers of an event have a more general liability for circumstances such as those that I have described. When an ambulance or fire engine needs to get through but cannot because a mess of traffic is blocking the road over which the organisers have no powers, are they liable for any injury as a result of their inability to direct traffic effectively? There is a difficulty in the situation.

I could mention in passing the Road Traffic Regulation (Special Events) Act 1994, but that is a different issue as it concerns road closures and smaller organisations. For example, I could mention its effect on west country carnivals—a matter of great importance in my part of the world, which has a superb carnival season and circuit. The new restrictions are justified in public safety terms, but they become very onerous for many event organisers. However, I do not want to divert the discussion into such matters.

I should like to leave the Minister with the final conclusion of ACPO in its policy document. It states:

> The current policing dilemma is created by a number of conflicting issues, although the lack of legislation to regulate public events is a major factor. Inconsistency has resulted. This has the potential to cause disaffection between the police and the public and significantly damage community relationships, which are vital to the Police Service.

I agree with that view and I do not criticise the police for applying their resources in the best way possible to serve the local community. That is why I want to ensure that public events are supported by a proper policy framework and to avoid allowing a unilateral withdrawal of police support without ensuring that there is something to take its place. That requires the concerted action of the Home Office, the DETR, local authorities and the police. Such action should ensure that everyone understands where the responsibilities lie, how support can be given and how the events can be controlled in a managed way.

We should not allow well-meaning people, who are trying to serve their community by putting on events for the public good, to be put in the impossible position of not managing the traffic satisfactorily and in a way that the public will accept and, more importantly, of not ensuring public safety. I invite the Minister to consider the matter and to try to find ways in which the Government can help to resolve these issues, some which have been left open to discussion. No clear solutions are being evolved to many of the problems, either at local or national level.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I thank the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for raising this important issue, which he has done reasonably and sensibly. His quotations from the Association of Chief Police Officers sub-committee on public safety policy were all accurate. The final paragraph of its study states:

> The Police Service will, therefore, encourage the promotion of legislation to properly regulate and control such events in future.

We will discuss with the police their proposals for the proper and effective regulation of future events.

The hon. Gentleman raised a number of issues and I shall try to deal with each in its turn. We all realise that the police have a difficult job and we have recently witnessed a number of public events in which their involvement was crucial. We have seen a number of instances of organised disorder, in which protest groups or others acting under the guise of a legitimate cause have sought to cause havoc on our streets or at public events. In the events of 18 June and 30 November last year and of 1 May this year, the police faced a difficult task in containing those groups and maintaining order in our streets.

Certain police roles are important and central to the handling of such events. The police are expected to prevent and detect crime, to prevent disorder and breaches of the peace and to ensure action is taken together with the other emergency services in the event of any major crisis. That work involves a good deal of preparation, planning and consultation, especially when it relates to sizeable events. The wider community and other agencies must also be fully involved in such work. The police always have a role to play in public events that are likely to result in problems of disorder or that might do so. As far as organisers and the general public are concerned, they also have a role in events that are less likely to result in serious problems, to ensure that they are properly policed and that the core functions and responsibilities of the police are properly attended to. Those functions are preventing crime and disorder, maintaining the peace and investigating offences, which are essentially operational matters. It is for the police to determine the level of resources that they can devote to particular events.

The police are not the only public organisation involved in ensuring public safety at organised events and it is not a core police task to organise or manage traffic or to organise the events themselves. That task falls primarily to the organisers of the event. Other agencies—in particular local authorities—must also play their part. As the hon. Gentleman said, the Association of Chief Police Officers has issued guidance on public safety policy, which clarifies the police role and the tasks of other agencies.

Over several years, a creeping involvement of the police in the management of public events had come about. They had taken over responsibility because the organisers of events had been willing to let them do so. The police therefore were organising traffic management schemes and sometimes advising on the layout and organisation of an event. Those are not core police roles, but the responsibility of the organisers. The police should by all means consider the extent of their involvement in advising on such matters, but it is for the organisers to deal with them.

The premise of the hon. Gentleman's reasoned and carefully argued speech was that the police are better trained to manage the types of event in question. The assumption behind that is that somewhere police officers are being trained in traffic management of more than a basic type—by which I mean standing in a street and directing traffic. As I understand matters, traffic control officers are trained in such traffic management techniques, but ordinary police officers receive only basic training on how to direct traffic.

Some of the events in question require considerable traffic planning. Specially trained traffic control officers would not normally be involved in that. They would be on the motorway, or dealing with large and complex incidents, or the transport of heavy goods. We would not expect specially trained officers to become involved in smaller events such as fetes or carnivals, often in rural areas. That brings us back to the ordinary officer with basic training in traffic management. There is no reason why an organiser of a public event could not investigate such training, assuming that it would be relevant—it might not—or obtain advice on traffic management from other properly trained and skilled people. There are plenty of consultancies. Doing so might require resources and some of the organisations concerned might be charities, but it is the responsibility of people who organise events to ensure that they can do so properly and not to transfer to the police a responsibility beyond their core job of protecting society against crime and disorder.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the Minister and I accept his basic premise. The difficulty is that the police officer, however well or badly trained, has one great advantage: the power of his office of constable and the fact that he is in uniform and that if he puts his hand up the traffic will, by and large, stop. That is an attribute that the volunteer or even the professional steward does not have. That is why some training is important. Some organisations find it difficult to provide that training for their staff.

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman is right that a police uniform conveys authority and that a uniform worn by a steward may not do so. However, we need to ensure that the authority of the police is used in a way that senior police officers feel will best contribute to preventing crime and preserving order. A senior police officer might decide that the best allocation of resources would be to have a police officer on the beat patrolling a particular area, or to use him to investigate a particular crime, rather than making him spend the day directing traffic outside a rural fete. That does not undermine the importance to the local community of that fete, but it avoids placing an additional burden on the police.

When people decide to use their land for a car boot sale, a music festival or a garden party for their friends, they should not be able to call on the police to direct traffic because we have given them a statutory responsibility to do so. That would allow everyone to call in police resources to direct the traffic as they see fit. Too often, the police have taken over the virtual management of an event on behalf of the organisers. That is regrettable.

However, the hon. Gentleman raised a number of concerns. He said that safety advisory groups have not been established in all local authorities. We will have to discuss that with the Local Government Association and ACPO. He also suggested that there is a vacuum in training with regard to how to assist traffic movement and to sign appropriately. We shall also want to discuss that with ACPO.

The subject raises the issue of where power and responsibilities lie. Advice from ACPO properly indicates that there is, to some extent, a lacuna in legal provision. We are trying to engage with ACPO and local authorities to decide how to proceed, but this is not a simple situation. I do not want to create a lot of extra duties for police officers that give public authorities and private individuals the ability to take control of the placement of police officers. That power should remain in the hands of chief constables. I accept that responsibilities should be more carefully defined, but we must not transfer all the responsibility to the police because that would place substantial demands on resources.

The hon. Gentleman asked which authority would have responsibility. In some areas, such as the hon. Gentleman's and mine, the county council is the traffic authority, but the authority that gives permission for events is sometimes a district council. We need to clarify which authority would be responsible. He said that if the police are not involved, public safety would be put at risk by the ensuing chaos. I do not accept that argument. The police in my area are often not directly involved in traffic management at an event and stewards are used instead. That happens in many parts of the country, but the practice varies from place to place depending on the resources that are available to chief constables. I do not envisage any great threat to public safety by allowing the police to be consulted and to give advice, but people who arrange private events must ensure that they are properly organised. It is their job to ensure that traffic is not disrupted. It is up to the police to ensure that if public safety is at risk, or if a crime might be committed, they are there to do their job in the proper way, but they must decide how best to allocate their resources.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned liability. People should be aware that if people organise a private event they might be liable for the consequences. However, in the case of Wincanton, I understand that the Avon and Somerset police reviewed the role of their officers who attend race courses and a great deal of good work has been done in properly stewarding the Wincanton races.

We will consider the issues. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that we have given an appropriate response to an important issue.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

EC Development Assistance

[Relevant document: Minutes of Evidence taken before the International Development Committee on 4 July (HC 669-i)]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): The Government believe that Parliament should have a regular opportunity to discuss European Community development policy. This Chamber provides an excellent opportunity to do that and I welcome it.

In February, we debated in Westminster Hall the European development fund and we had a preliminary canter round the course on the successor to the Lomé convention. The new Cotonou agreement was signed in Benin at the end of June and marks an important step forward in the European Community's relationship with developing countries. It is a welcome step forward and the successful outcome follows a great deal of effort by the United Kingdom Government, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development, my noble Friend Baroness Amos and many of our officials, and a wee bit of help from myself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am especially grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) for his support. We hope that this marks a new beginning for EU development policy generally, which is the subject of our debate.

The EC's reputation in development must be at an all-time low and the Government are the first to recognise that. There is widespread consensus, which we share, that the present situation is intolerable. Poul Nielson, the Commissioner for Development and Humanitarian Aid, said that improvement is a question of do or die for EC programmes and Chris Patten said that they are an embarrassment. I am sure that the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) will agree, in her professional capacity, that the first step to recovery is to recognise that there is a problem. There is now such a recognition.

However, in the midst of this sorry state of affairs, there are at last some encouraging signs, not least because of pressure from the British Government during the past three years. The Commission is now committed to a wide programme of reforms, which Vice-President Kinnock is overseeing. Commissioners Patten and Nielson have announced plans to improve the management of EC development programmes and they are now starting to be implemented. There is at last a good draft development policy statement, again following pressure from a number of people, not least the British Government. However, that policy statement needs an action plan so that we can see how it will be implemented.

I have referred to the new Cotonou agreement, which is a significant improvement. It has the clear objective of poverty eradication, as has our White Paper. It has a trade deal that seeks to integrate African, Caribbean and Pacific countries to the global economy in ways that benefit the poor. There will be an end to pockets of money for special interests and funding will now be linked to performance and needs.

However, I must sound a cautionary note. Those positive signs do not mean that the battle to turn the European Community's development performance 'round has been won. There is still a great deal of resistance to change, even among some Members of the European Parliament, and a lot of pressure to misuse precious aid resources. However, the Government believe that the way forward is clear, and I want to use this opportunity to spell it out.

First, we need a clear policy framework. The Commission has produced a draft development policy statement that goes a long way to providing that. We support its objectives of reducing poverty and integrating developing countries into the global economy, ensuring that globalisation, which could be a threat to them, can be an opportunity. It recognises that development policy goes beyond spending programmes. Other policies, such as trade, agriculture, environment and fisheries must support development too, as we have recognised in our bilateral programme. However, the development policy statement must be agreed and applied by all parts of the Commission to all programmes, not just to Poul Nielson's Directorate-General.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Does the Under-Secretary agree that the development policy statement looks like one of those declaratory rhetorical statements that we have become so used to in the European Community? It makes great statements, and puts forward great aims, but fails to show how it might be implemented and how the Community would marshal its forces to achieve it. How will this rhetoric be matched by action on the ground?

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman has put more eloquently and forcefully what I was just saying. I think that he might also agree that the first step towards achieving implementation is knowing in which direction one is going, otherwise one could go round in circles. The Commission now has a clearer direction, and that is a first step. However, I agree that we now need a plan of action.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon): We all agree that we like the reforms that have been introduced over recent weeks; it is certainly a great advance on the previous state of affairs. How long will the Government wait, however, before they decide whether the reforms will result in practical benefits on the ground for the EU aid policy?

Mr. Foulkes: That is a helpful question and I shall respond to it shortly, in a little more detail than I could in responding to an intervention. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's assumption that it will be a Labour

[Mr. Foulkes]

Government who will have responsibility for ensuring the implementation of the reforms over the next five or 10 years.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Fifteen years.

Mr. Foulkes: Or fifteen years, as my hon. Friend says.

We need EC programmes to be more strategic. The European Community must do less if it is to be more effective, rather than spread its work so widely and try to do everything. There are a few areas in which it has a comparative advantage. Transport and trade are examples. The EC should establish its expertise in those areas and be ruthless about not trying to develop programmes in other areas in which it does not have such a comparative advantage.

Instead, the Commission should build strategic partnerships with other donors—including ourselves and other bilateral donors—and co-fund their, and our, programmes. Perhaps the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) would like to contemplate what that could mean in practice, using the well tried expertise, knowledge and contacts that we and other donors have, while being co-funded by the European Commission. Indeed, all sensible donors do that, not least to cut the burden on developing countries that have to deal with multitudes of donors clamouring at their Ministries' front doors, each with different procedures. That creates difficulties for small countries with limited capacity. It means that the European Community and, in particular, the European Commission should be less concerned about seeing the European Union flag on their projects. Those projects should benefit the developing country, not further the glorification of the European Union.

Thirdly, we need radically to modernise Commission procedures. It is not credible to require 40 signatures before amending a contract or to require all decisions to be taken in Brussels. Streamlined procedures will encourage faster projects and improve their quality because Commission offices overseas will be given more responsibility for programmes.

Many of the proposals that were made by Poul Nielson, Chris Patten and Neil Kinnock go in the right direction. It is likely that the speed of EC programmes will increase quickly. However, the EU needs vastly to improve the quality of its programmes as well as the speed of their implementation. Otherwise, bad programmes will be delivered quickly, which would not be an improvement—quite the reverse. The Government and other member states, civil society, and national and European Parliaments need to work hard to support higher standards.

The greatest remaining concern involves the allocation of EC resources. The Select Committee on International Development, which sits under the distinguished chairmanship of the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), examined this question in detail 18 months ago. Despite that Committee's recommendations, there has been no significant change since then. The case for directing more EC official development assistance to poor countries is stronger now than it was 18 months ago. Research continues to show that poverty will be reduced faster if resource transfers are directed towards poor countries, especially those with good pro-poor policies. Overall, most donors changed their spending during the past 10 years to match that pattern.

The EC is the shameful exception to that trend—75 per cent. of official EC development assistance went to poor countries in 1986, but the figure is only 54 per cent. today. The EC's Mediterranean programme is allocated about 1 billion euros per year, but Asia, which is a much poorer and larger region, with better policy scores and many times more poor people, is allocated less than half as much, which cannot be right.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Does the Under-Secretary agree that that is one of the most shameful aspects of European aid? Did not the Amsterdam treaty mention aid objectives to combat poverty? Are not we simply failing to fulfil those objectives?

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. That is why I said that that is the key criticism.

One good sign is that the Commission has acknowledged the problem in its draft development policy statement and in a staff working paper. As I said to the hon. Member for Richmond Park earlier, she will understand, in her professional capacity, that admitting the problem is the first step. There are pressures to direct EC aid funds to regions of high political profile for the EU, namely, those that are closest to us, including the middle-income countries of the Mediterranean and eastern Europe, rather than to the poorest countries. We are all politicians, and we have to recognise, respond to and counteract such political pressures—we must not ignore those pressures, which come from within the Commission and EU member states. Unfortunately, there is a habit in this context of making gesture commitments, which grab the headlines but are forgotten the next day. In the end, they have little impact because they are poorly thought through.

I hope that hon. Members will not misunderstand my argument. The EU's political, security and trade priorities are important—no one denies that. The EU is rightly concerned about stability on its borders, but it also has important security and stability concerns further afield. It must recognise that instability, conflict and poverty in Africa and Asia have a destabilising effect on Europe, as we know only too well. Poverty, conflict and environmental degradation in Asia and sub-Saharan Africa are a threat to us, as well as to the people of those regions.

That is not to say that the EC should not provide assistance to what is described as its near abroad—especially those countries with large numbers of poor people. However, we would all agree that the needs of middle-income countries are not the same as those of the poorest. The EC needs to develop the right tools for the job. In the poorest parts of sub-Saharan Africa, that might mean using substantial resource transfers to support economic and social reform in countries that are unable to invest in the health and education services necessary for sustainable development. On Europe's borders, that means assessing needs and priorities, and providing technical assistance that will help reform, rather than crowd out important private sector flows. What it does not mean is making huge financial pledges that will not be spent, and which would serve only to undermine further the EU's reputation.

I shall conclude, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I want to give hon. Members the opportunity to participate fully in the debate, but I hope to catch your eye at the end and reply at length to the many points that will be made.

Mr. Streeter: I thought that the Under-Secretary said in response to my earlier intervention that he would tell me how long the Government are prepared to wait, and I should like him to deal with that point. I have disagreed with nothing that he has said so far, but if the current Patten reforms do not work on the ground, how long are the Government prepared to wait? Also, if the reforms do not increase the EU's performance, what do the Government propose to do? What specific action will they call for?

Mr. Foulkes: I have two options: I can deal with that point in my winding-up speech, or I can deal with it now, and I am happy to do so. The hon. Member for South-West Devon wrote to the Secretary of State about the matter on 23 June and received a reply on 10 July. He also raised it in the House during the most recent Question Time, and the Government spokesman gave a very good reply.

The Opposition are proposing what could best be described as an à la carte European Union, which we believe would be unworkable, unnecessary and counter-productive. If EC programmes are to be effective, all member states should contribute to them; if they are ineffective, we should improve them; if they cannot be improved, we should cut them back to avoid wasting money, and set more modest objectives that can be met. Patten and Neilson echo that approach.

To achieve those aims, we do not need the treaty changes that the hon. Member for South-West Devon has bandied about. We need clear objectives, close collaboration with the Commission and other member states, and a good understanding of the way in which EC programmes work. Unlike the previous Government, this Government have delivered all those things, including the publication of reform proposals. As I said during that recent Question Time, the previous Government increased expenditure in the agreement at Edinburgh from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent., and did nothing to improve effectiveness. We, on the other hand, have taken action. Amending the treaty to allow individual member states to opt in or out of the EC programmes would make planning impossible, cut the total amount of aid from the EU, and remove any incentive for reform. It is completely unrealistic and non-negotiable.

In his intervention during Question Time, the hon. Member for South-West Devon said—no doubt, he is thinking about it again—that the matter should be raised at the intergovernmental conference. As he ought to know, the IGC is concerned not with changes of policy but with making the institutional reforms that are necessary for enlargement. That is why the agenda includes the size of the Commission, voting procedures on the Council and other such matters. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not aware of that.

We believe that enlargement should remain on track. If it is to do so, negotiations need to be completed by the end of the year, and we expect them to conclude at the Council meeting in Nice in December. The agenda must remain focused. The IGC does not have time to get into wider policy questions; such a move would risk delaying enlargement and defeat the main objective of the negotiations.

I can assure hon. Members that the Government will continue to push hard for reform. The momentum for improvement is building up, and we are beginning to see real change on the ground. We accept that there is still a long way to go, but we believe that positive engagement is the right approach. That is how we will make progress. Unlike the Opposition, we are not isolationists.

This is a time of opportunity for improving the quality and efficiency of EC aid. We can even enjoy a little cautious optimism. The first challenge is to improve quality, not just speed; there are some grounds for optimism in that regard. The second is to reallocate EC funds, so that they make the necessary contribution to meeting the world poverty reduction targets. The European Community can make a great contribution, and the development assistance programme has one major advantage: it levers in assistance from European countries that would not otherwise use that money for development. That is its real added value. The programme, with that added value, can help us to achieve the poverty reduction targets for 2015—halving the number of people living in abject poverty, providing universal primary education and reducing maternal mortality rates. To do anything less than helping to get the European Commission programme moving in that direction would be to betray the poor, whom we are all here to help.

2.52 pm

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon): I welcome the opportunity to debate this important matter. I congratulate the Minister on the efforts that he has made to get the European Community to move on the aid budget. It has been a shambles for a long time, and has been getting worse in recent years.

The Minister and other hon. Members will know that I believe that the right kind of focused aid can make a difference and change lives. I strongly support such aid. That is why my experience of the EU aid programme has made me so angry. In the past two years, I have seen many examples of excellent bilateral work by non-governmental organisations—some funded by the UK Government, some by the organisations themselves—that has changed lives and made a difference in terms of sustainable development.

However, I have yet to encounter an example of strong and positive EU action that has been effective. I have been to 11 countries in the past two years, and I have yet to find it. I am not an unreasonable person, so I am looking out for examples of good practice, as well as bad. I have seen some plush offices, funded by the EU, but I have yet to see examples of action that has made a difference. It is vital that every pound that we spend and every hour of effort that we put in represents the best possible value. That is why I am angry about the performance of the EU aid budget in recent years and why I am determined to see change.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): The hon. Gentleman says that he has been to 11 countries and seen plush European Union offices. Where?

Mr. Streeter: The best example is Kenya, which the hon. Gentleman may have visited. I believe that the EU office is for three countries in east Africa; no doubt he will make his own inquiries. I am sure that he does not disagree that the EU aid programme has been woefully inadequate.

We all agree that the EU aid programme has failings, and welcome the recent language of the Secretary of State. The key question is, what is to be done about it? The Minister referred to the draft development policy statement. However, the Secretary of State pointed out to the Select Committee on International Development that, although it is a good statement, care is required because it does not include an action plan. She said:

> Everyone will trumpet the Policy Statement, read the words, it says everything that we would wish, and we might feel we have won, but until there is an action plan and a process for implementation, it is another piece of paper saying the right things, and we have seen that before in the Commission on poverty, on gender and all sorts of things, good policy that never got to the implementation stage.

The Minister echoed that, but he also said that he was feeling optimistic. We have heard that before: we want to see changes on the ground.

It is noticeable that, in recent years, EU aid performance has got worse and worse. During Question Time two weeks ago, the Minister, in his non-response to me about looking forwards to what practical changes can be made, merely referred to 18 years of Conservative government in which no changes took place.

Mr. Foulkes: Of course. We have had three years in government, and I have outlined the action that we are taking and the way forward. Can the hon. Gentleman give one example of something that my predecessors—Baroness Chalker or Chris Patten—did to improve the efficiency or effectiveness of EU aid? He is moaning, yet we are taking action. What action did our predecessors in his party's Government take?

Mr. Streeter: I intend to come to that. My first point is that the Minister has not yet achieved anything. As the Secretary of State said, all that the Department has is a piece of paper from the Commission and an intention to reform. The Minister said that until there is implementation on the ground nothing will be achieved. Nothing will be achieved for the children of Africa and Asia until the funding streams are diverted. Has that happened yet? No, it has not.

My second point is that, in the past three or four years, a growing consensus has formed about the true paucity of the EU development budget. The Court of Auditors annual report for the financial year 1997, which was published in 1998, blew the whistle on some of the worst examples of fraud and misuse. In March 1999, the report by the five wise men revealed some of the failings of the EU aid programme. In 1998, the admission by the European Commission showed how poor the performance of the European Community Humanitarian Office was between 1993 and 1995. In January 1999, the Select Committee—which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), who is sitting behind me—unfolded some of the worst examples of EU aid.

The EU aid programme has never been good, but it has got much worse, and there is growing consensus on that. I do not blame the Government. I blame them for an awful lot, but not for that. In the past few years, it has been recognised that the aid programme is not merely poor or second-rate, but utterly unacceptable.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman asked me to give one of the several examples of the Government starting, in practice, to secure agreements to switch resources. In current negotiations, the Council has, on our initiative, severely cut the Mediterranean allocation. France was outvoted on that. We proposed a small increase in the Balkans. Cutting the MEDA programme represents a major change. That is just one example. Of course these things take time; we have to take 15 countries along with us. So far—at least where we can get a qualified majority—we have been able to do so. Can the hon. Gentleman give an example of the previous Government doing anything at all?

Mr. Streeter: I have made the point that it is only in the past three or four years that the true awfulness of the EU aid programme has come to light. The Minister gave one example of a specific decision. Can he give a second example?

Mr. Foulkes: Oh.

Mr. Streeter: Come on; let him give one example of a change in the EU's attitude and performance on the ground. One swallow does not a summer make. The programme will spend £800 million of British taxpayers' money in the financial year 2001-02, and I am angry about the performance in the past few years because we could have done much more bilaterally with the money. The Minister should reflect on that.

We accept that what I still call the Lomé convention funds—we will all get used to the new expression in due course—must be left in the EU kitty. However, if the welcome reforms that have been pushed through do not deliver practical changes after a reasonable period, it will be time to make changes. It does no good for the Minister and his boss to use the right rhetoric if they cannot make the changes needed to improve the aid performance—not for their sakes or for my sake, but for the sake of the children of Africa and Indonesia.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman asked for one example, which I gave to him. He then asked for a second example. If he had listened to my speech, he would have heard the second example, which was Cotonou. That is a phenomenal agreement and a big change in the way in which we deliver European aid effectively to the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries. That fact is generally accepted—even some of the Government's critics accept it. I am not an apologist who says that EU aid is wonderful. I have never said that. The way in which aid is provided needs to change and is now moving in the right direction. If the hon. Gentleman will excuse the phrase, we have made a start, but we still have a long way to go.

Mr. Streeter: I certainly accept that there is still a long way to go. I repeat that I welcome the start, but I do not accept that the recent improvements in the Lomé convention reflect the Patten reforms—negotiations on which have continued for more than a year. All that has happened is that a necessary negotiation has reached its conclusion. If the Minister had a hand in that, we warmly congratulate him.

I want our contribution to the EU aid budget to be properly spent, providing value for money and changing people's lives. We welcome the changes and support the Government's rhetoric, but I want answers to my questions. How long will the Government wait for the reforms to work their way through the system? If the reforms do not succeed, what will the Government do? The Minister's answers worried me greatly. He used the usual rhetoric about having clear objectives, collaborating with the European Commission and trying to persuade people—in the same way as that used for the past three years. Those methods have not worked.

Mr. Worthington: Will the hon. Gentleman answer his own question? What would be the policies of a Conservative Government? Would they withdraw from the EU development budget?

Mr. Streeter: I thank the hon. Gentleman for suggesting that we will shortly have a Conservative Government. That is, of course, the expectation of the vast majority of people. I shall answer his question directly. I am a practical politician, and if there is an opportunity to change something that is going wrong, I will take it.

The agenda for the intergovernmental conference is under negotiation before the summit in December. The Minister is wrong to say that the IGC will discuss only enlargement and consequent structural changes. The IGC can consider any proposals from member states. There is consensus that the EU aid budget is going hopelessly wrong, and the IGC presents the best opportunity for proposing paving reforms. The United Kingdom Government will miss that opportunity if they are not careful.

In 12 months, or even 24 months, the Patten reforms may not have effected changes. The Secretary of State seemed to suggest that in her responses to the Select Committee on 4 July, because in her heart she realises that they will not work. When there is recognition that the reforms have not worked, member states that wish to do so should be allowed to withdraw the majority of their EU aid contributions. Instead of being wasted, that money could be spent bilaterally on improving the lives of people in Africa and Asia. I accept that the Lomé convention money must stay on the table and that there might be other things that should not be removed, but unless EU performance is increased and improved, the lion's share of that £800 million should be spent bilaterally. That will require significant changes, and paving reforms should be tabled now.

I have travelled extensively in the past three years; I was Conservative spokesman on Europe for 12 months, as the Minister will remember, and I know that there is a consensus in the European capitals that the EU aid programme is failing. There is also a consensus in Scandinavia and the northern European countries that radical action is necessary. In the southern Mediterranean countries, however, they use the EU aid budget as a second-tier immigration policy. That is what investment in the northern African states is all about.

It will be a wasted opportunity if there is no action at the IGC; we must capitalise now on the groundswell of recognition that there is a problem. I do not mean that we should withdraw from this or that, but we should spend money more wisely on behalf of the world's poorest people.

The Minister should visit the capital cities of EU member states to build an IGC alliance for action in a year or two if the EU aid budget does not improve. A mechanism may be put in place that is never utilised or implemented, but if it is not done—

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Streeter: I shall give way in a moment, but I want to finish my point.

The changes that I propose require unanimous agreement; they must be made now, or we will have to wait for the next IGC in five years' time. Imagine how many lives could have been improved during that time by implementing a streamlined, bilateral United Kingdom programme, rather than the inadequate, fraudulent, bureaucratic, badly focused EU aid budget. I am making a sensible, reasonable, do-able proposal; there is a window of opportunity in law and politics and the Minister is not taking advantage of it. It was clear from his answers to my questions that, if the reform programme does not work, he does not have a plan B, so the world's poorest will continue to suffer.

I hope that the reforms will work, but I am not optimistic about it. I urge the Minister to do something about the matter now and not to wait five years for another opportunity. There is a consensus that the vast bureaucracies of the multilateral agencies—the EU, the United Nations, the World Trade Organisation, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, which are important in the globalised world—have let us down in recent years because they are trying to do too much. There is a lack of accountability and nation states acting bilaterally can often do better.

Multilateral action is needed and nation-state activity must be co-ordinated, as we cannot go back to a piecemeal world. I would therefore welcome more action from the Minister and the Secretary of State in calling for reform of the multilateral organisations. We have had a debate about the EU; what about the United Nations and the WTO? What about the IMF and the World Bank?

Mr. Colman: The hon. Gentleman mentioned large budgets. Does he realise that the total budget of the World Trade Organisation is the same as the travel budget of the IMF? Given the need for developing countries to be more represented, does he agree that the WTO should be further encouraged to ensure that more money is spent, so that a future development round is properly financed and developing countries are represented?

Mr. Streeter: Yes, that is a sensible suggestion; I am certainly not against it. We all recognise that the WTO has failed in its decision-making procedures and that Seattle was a disaster. The Government went there full of hope and glory, but returned hugely disappointed. We support whatever action is necessary to turn the WTO into a realistic and sensible organisation that can make decisions and implement them. At the moment, it is failing.

I call on the Department for International Development to take a lead in advocating reform of the multilateral organisations, particularly as the Secretary of State has been given the chairmanship of the important co-ordinating committee, about which we read in the week. More than anything, there is a window of opportunity not only to discuss EU aid reform, but to do something about it.

I ask the Minister not to be complacent and not to revel in his optimism about the rhetoric coming from Brussels, but to take practical steps as a practical politician. Will he table reforms at the IGC, so that the world's poorest people will not have to wait five years to get some sense from Brussels?

3.11 pm

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I did not expect to speak now, but I shall. I hope that my voice holds out, as I am having trouble with it today.

I welcome the opportunity to debate EC development assistance again, as all hon. Members do. The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) initiated a debate on the subject in February, but at that time we had not seen much progress, although it had been promised. In fairness, the budget is huge: 60 per cent. of global aid is delivered by European aid. There is no question but that some progress has been made, even since the previous debate. Two commissioners, instead of five, now deal with European aid, which must be good news.

It is even better news that Commissioner Patten is one of my constituents; it is wonderful to know that. I write to him, and he writes back to thank me—rather sarcastically, usually—for taking an interest in my constituents' lives. He is a good commissioner who does very useful work.

Two large papers have been published, including the EC development policy and EC development assistance paper and the management assistance paper, which is an ugly title. There is also the recent Cotonou trade agreement. Much inefficiency remains. I still smart when I think about the Court of Auditors' report that I read at the end of last year. It showed that a big AIDS project set up in 1994 with a lot of EU money to spend in South Africa had made no progress at all by 1997. The money was still sitting in the bank. In the past few days, we have heard more news about the AIDS epidemic raging throughout Africa. I wonder how many AIDS cases we, as European citizens, are responsible for because that money was not spent and the project did not get off the ground. I have a real worry that we are directly involved, because we have been so late in moving things forward.

During the crisis in Ethiopia, which was also debated in this Chamber, we learned that the pharaoh's granary—as I like to call it—that Ethiopia had set up to deal with food shortages following the previous famine had been depleted by the United States of America and the EU. The EU owed 70,000 tonnes of grain to Ethiopia. That is another example of European aid gone wrong. At that time, Ethiopia was suffering and was on the verge of another famine. Something is desperately wrong.

The greatest scandal of all—the Minister touched on this—is that in 1986 the least developed countries received 75 per cent. of the share of aid from the European Union but in 1997 received 51 per cent. I do not know what the present share is but I hope that it is rising again. We are pouring aid into Mediterranean countries in the Balkans, which are hardly least-developed countries: that does not comply with our policy of alleviating poverty.

Where is the true policy? We have it, because Commissioner Patten sent it to me. The EU policy document's conclusions are encouraging. It should

> Better integrate the economic, trade and political aspects of its development co-operation by:
> Strengthening the links between trade and development; giving particular attention to the poorest countries, and
> Centring development policy on the aim of poverty reduction.

It goes on wonderfully. It adopts frameworks, ensures co-ordination between member states, decentralises and redefines. I cannot resist reading one paragraph because it is a gem of Eurospeak, which I think I will send to Commissioner Patten. Under the heading "Improving internal control", the document states:

> As explained in the White Paper for Reform, during the transitional period until the new Financial Regulation enters into force, the ex-ante visa will be carried out by controllers to be gradually deconcentrated to operational Directorates-General. After this period the ex-ante visa will be abolished and control integrated into the relevant units of the operational Directorates-General. The proximity of controllers to the controlled actions, which deconcentration brings, will increase both the effectiveness and the efficiency of financial management and control, while also ensuring a clearer allocation of responsibility.

I love the use of the word "clearer".

Mr. Wells: Can the hon. Lady translate that?

Dr. Tonge: I am hoping that the Minister can do that—and assure us that there are specific objectives for European aid and for monitoring and measuring outcomes. I am keen on evaluating projects. I have worked in the health service for many years and I am always being told that I have to evaluate what is being done with the money that is spent. We want assurance that there is an action plan for reforms and positive engagement by this country in controlling what is happening with the delivery of European aid. I have much sympathy with the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), who, as usual, got carried away by his Euro-scepticism. He was right, however, to say that we have a sincere desire—I hope that the Minister accepts that—to ensure that this country is participating in the delivery of aid. We do not want to come back here in five years' time bemoaning the ineffectiveness of European aid. We want to know that controls are in place and that we are getting to grips with delivering aid.

The other big paper is entitled "Management of External Assistance". I did not find it of great help. There was little reference to the Amsterdam treaty and no mention of international development targets. However, there was a reference to co-funding, which the Minister mentioned and which is dear to my heart. In a debate in February I asked why on earth, if there is a shortage of personnel in Europe, pooled funds cannot be delegated to a specific country with particular expertise in delivery and that country be told to get on with it, monitor it, evaluate it and report back to the EU on how the money was being spent.

I think that I understood the Minister to say that that will happen. I have tried to find concrete evidence in the paper from Europe but I find its language difficult to understand. I want an assurance from the Minister that that will happen.

I wish to say something about specific areas of aid rather than about the management of aid and aid policy in Europe. There is great concern among my Liberal Democrat colleagues about tied aid. I noticed that the issue of tied aid was mentioned in the Department for International Development's strategy paper on EC assistance. However, unlike many of the other objectives that were taken on board by the Commission, I see no mention of it in Patten's strategy. We need to know more about that.

The European Community must take up the cause to untie aid, and put pressure on member countries to do so. Their credibility as donors will be severely undermined if they do not end this commercial self-interest. Will the Minister assure us that the matter is being looked into, and that the European Union—like his own Government—has stopped the practice of tying aid?

Mr. Streeter: The hon. Lady is on to an important point. Does she agree that it would be helpful if the Minister could tell us whether other member states in the European Union—especially France and Spain, which do not have a great track record on straightforward aid—are being gradually brought into line, in relation not only to the EU aid budget but to their own bilateral programmes?

Dr. Tonge: I think that it is rather difficult for the British Government to dictate to other Governments in the European Union how they should deal with bilateral aid. However, in relation to those funds that are diverted to the European Union, we should certainly press for an agreement that European aid should not be tied to commercial interests in any country. Bilateral aid between one country and another is a different matter, in which I suspect we cannot interfere.

There is also the question of debt relief. We hear a great deal about the unspent money in the European aid budget. Perhaps the Minister can tell us what possibility there would be of using the unspent 18 billion euros of aid money on debt relief. Debt negotiations will shortly be held in Okinawa. Why cannot that money be spent?

Mr. Foulkes: I shall say to the hon. Lady now, so that I do not have too much to reply to when I wind up, that 1 billion euros of unspent money from the EDF has been used to fund the heavily indebted poor countries' debt relief. That, too, was undertaken on the initiative of the British Government, and I am sure that she will welcome that.

Dr. Tonge: I thank the Minister for his reply, but 1 billion euros is peanuts, really. It sounds as though there is an awful lot of money swishing around unspent. I would have thought that it could be much better used relieving the debt of the poorest countries of the world, rather than waiting until the European Union can divert it to the Balkans or the Mediterranean.

I also want to discuss the Cotonou agreement. I admit that I have not read it, but I understand that it is good news all round, except—I suspect—for the Caribbean banana trade. I hope that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) will take up that point. He usually mentions it, as it is a subject dear to his heart, as it is to mine. I love bananas and I love the Caribbean. The Caribbean Banana Exporters Association, which has written to me, is still extremely unhappy with the tariff-only or first-come-first-served quota systems, which are being encouraged under the Cotonou agreement. That is serious news for the Caribbean. I shall say a little more about that in a moment.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon and I have just returned from Colombia, where there is a great deal of evidence that if we stop people growing the coca plant there—and, hence, cocaine—it could easily shift to the Caribbean, if the Caribbean countries cannot export their bananas. I urge the Minister to look closely at the matter, with the European Union, to find out whether we can obtain a better agreement for the banana trade, especially in the Caribbean.

Finally, I want to discuss a matter close to my heart—indeed, close to my chest, as hon. Members can hear. It concerns my recent trip to Colombia. The hon. Member for South-West Devon, the hon. Member for Ayr (Ms Osborne) and I investigated the circumstances of the displaced people in Colombia. We had great difficulty contacting the villages where those people were, because of silted-up rivers and transport difficulties. We saw at first hand that, for the people in the countryside in Colombia, by far the easiest thing to do was to grow the coca plant and export cocaine via the paramilitaries and the drug barons. There is no transport for anything else, and there is no access to the outside world. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for South-West Devon, who—literally—extricated me from the mud, having first extricated the hon. Member for Ayr. We are very grateful to him. Indeed, we would have left our wellingtons behind, but he dived in and rescued those as well. I rest my case—the hon. Gentleman is a hero.

The serious point is that the European Union intended to support Plan Colombia, which is the United States' answer to the civil war in Colombia. Under the plan, military aid, helicopters, guns and more guns would be poured in, and the coca fields sprayed, thus encouraging growers to go elsewhere. However, I am glad to say that, in Madrid, the decision was deferred. The European Union intended to support the plan by providing substantial aid for people who would be displaced by such action, and those colleagues who visited Colombia with me will agree that that is a terrible thing to do. Above all, Colombian people need Europe to provide better transport and facilities. They also need food, and they need to be restored to their villages and helped to grow crops other than the coca plant, but a simple measure such as dredging the rivers would have avoided the need for the hon. Member for South-West Devon to dive into the mud twice to rescue frail female Members. Perhaps that last observation should not be included in Hansard.

Matters are desperate—I cannot imagine how people live in such circumstances. It takes four hours of hauling boats across mud and tramping through jungle to get a handful of people up and down a few miles of river. That demonstrated to us in an extremely harsh way just how difficult it is for those people to survive. I plead with the Minister to use his influence in the European Union to try to do something.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): If anything proves the worth of Westminster Hall, it is debates such as this. Although only a few people are present, it is always interesting to note the replies received from other places on issues raised in this Chamber. This year, there has been more debate on international development than ever before. Nowadays, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for International Development has a high profile in this Chamber, but in the past, he would not have appeared in Parliament, apart from at Question Time.

I congratulate the Government on securing this debate, because the issue is extremely important. The European Union distributes 30 per cent. of the world's aid, as part of some 60 per cent. that is distributed through the European Union and the member states. I have learnt that the development business must be principled, and by putting poverty at the centre of development, DFID has brought principle and priorities to development. Where there is no principle or overarching ideal, where the development process becomes contaminated, and where there is back scratching and paying off one's friends, we get into trouble. The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) referred to tied aid and short-term political gestures. There is a desperate need for poverty to be put at the centre of Europe's development budget. That has not happened because there has been no principled aid. Other hon. Members have asked about that and why areas bordering the Mediterranean are treated most favourably. Areas such as Asia, where the majority of the world's poor live, receive a tiny sum in comparison and sub-Saharan African hardly features.

Aid has been unprincipled, inefficient and underspent. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that, when faced with overwhelming need, there is a peculiar offensiveness about underspending—and the degree of that underspending is incredible. According to Chris Patten's figures and at the current rate of delivery, the Commission will take nearly nine years to deliver the aid promised to Mediterranean countries, seven years for Asia, 6.5 years for Latin America and 4.2 years for South Africa. The politicians representing the people of the European Union have willed that money but we have not even been efficient enough to spend it, never mind spend it wisely. It is an utter scandal that not one penny has yet been disbursed for reconstruction following the damage caused by hurricane Mitch. No doubt a Commissioner went to Honduras at that time to pledge money for the devastation caused by hurricane Mitch, but we have not managed to spend one penny through the European Union. The problem has become worse due to the lack of principle and because the poverty focus has lessened. My figures show that in 1986 51 per cent. of aid went to less developed countries and by 1996-97 that had fallen to 33.7 per cent. That is not good enough.

Having that poverty focus and putting it at the centre of development is particularly important in a multi-country organisation such as the European Union, in which allocations would otherwise be made according to traditional ties, with MEPs arguing for the parts of the world with which their countries have been associated.

There has been an immense improvement in the structure of the Commission and its responsibilities. No one in this country will sob about the departure of the Spanish Commissioner, Mr. Marin, whose activities in the distribution of aid were not what we would have wanted. The new structure is an improvement, but I am not happy that the Commissioner for Development and Humanitarian Aid, Poul Nielson, is junior to the External Relations Commissioner, Chris Patten. The hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), who speaks for the Opposition, is nodding under the old Tory Government structure. Under that structure, Chris Patten, when he was a Foreign Office Minister, and Lady Chalker, when she was responsible for overseas aid, were in the same Department. We have taken enormous steps since DFID was set up independently.

Mr. Wells: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will compare that with the French position. The socialist Government in France have moved from an independent aid Department and merged it with the Ministry for External Affairs. They have moved in exactly the opposite direction, and I am not sure that this is a party political matter.

Mr. Worthington: Terms such as "socialism" are awfully confusing.

We should not assume, with regard to development, that one size fits all. In this country, the amount of attention that is given to development has increased exponentially since DFID's creation. That represented an enormous step forward, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development for what has been achieved. It is almost perverse that the influence of development over trade and debt has increased since DFID's creation. Many people feared that development might be marginalised when DFID was created and that the Department would be regarded simply as an aid agency. It is an immense achievement that such marginalisation did not occur during the past three years—that may be partly due to the personalities involved. There is no doubt that there is much more liaison with the Chancellor and the Department of Trade and Industry than was the case previously.

I am worried about how rarely the word "poverty" appears when Chris Patten speaks as the putative Foreign Minister for Europe. In a speech that he gave on 15 June, which was entitled, "A European Foreign Policy: Ambition and Reality", he listed three overall goals for him and his Commission during the next few years. The first goal was to work "with our nearest neighbours" and the second was to sell the EU to other parts of the world as a model of integration because it suggests how states can be gathered and power shared regionally. One can see the sense in that, if worldwide trade groupings develop in a manner that parallels the situation in the EU. The third goal was to create with a common foreign and security policy. He discussed external assistance, but he did so in relation to the west Balkans, the Mediterranean and Russia, and he welcomed the fact that he is working well with Poul Nielson. It sounds to me as if, from his perspective, development is already being marginalised. His view of the grand picture does not appear to put development at the centre. We must ensure that development is more in the centre of the EU's activities.

A speech on this subject would not be recognisable as mine unless there was a reference to the European Community Humanitarian Office. As my hon. Friends know, ECHO obsesses me. It raises questions about transparency and it needs to communicate better about what it does. I mentioned earlier the lack of disbursement of money in response to hurricane Mitch. ECHO provides an express form of European aid—it involves the quick disbursal of aid in response to humanitarian disasters.

In our debate on this subject earlier this year, to which the Under-Secretary referred, I discussed the extent to which ECHO's website was kept up to date. In February, it contained a speech by Emma Bonino, who had ceased to be a European Commissioner some considerable time previously. Some updating has occurred since then, in that Mr. Nielson's name now appears on press releases. However, it is interesting that the latest statistics that it quotes on the disbursement of aid are more than a year old. If one is looking for information about Ethopia or Mozambique, there is no point in looking there. According to the website, the most recent parliamentary question about ECHO was asked in 1998. It is significant if an organisation of that scale cannot keep the information on its website up to date.

I want to quote from the news release about Mozambique that was issued on 3 March, with which many hon. Members are familiar. It symbolises what is wrong with the organisation. Some of us were in Brussels last week and met Mr. Nielson. He thought that he had been prompt in giving attention to Mozambique because he went there on 1 March—after the crisis had largely abated. We, and others, responded much faster than ECHO, which is supposed to lead the way.

The press release illustrates the way in which the European Commission and ECHO respond to problems. In it, Mr. Nielson announced 25 Million Euro in aid for victims of the floods.

Apparently, about 2 million euros of that had already been released to NGOs, and another 2 million euros was to be delivered shortly. That left 21 million euros to be disbursed in response to the floods in the form of short-term activities. I am unable to find where that money has gone.

Hon. Members who were with us last week will remember asking the head of ECHO about what had been spent in Mozambique. She did not know, and told us that she would have to write to us about it. Given that we had produced a major report about Mozambique it was strange that she had not prepared for it, and did not have an answer. It is not good enough to announce that 25 million euros of emergency aid to Mozambique was forthcoming.

The press release goes on to state:

In meetings with leaders of the government,— that is, the Mozambique Government—

Mr. Nielson stressed the need for a well coordinated effort with the Mozambican authorities.

A well co-ordinated effort within the European Union would be a start. One should sort out what one is doing oneself before seeking to co-ordinate with anyone else.

The press release concludes:

This year, the EU will increase its development assistance to Mozambique to 150 Million Euro...compared to 100 Million Euro for 1999.

If the EU goes on behaving as it is, that will be delivered in 2005, because that is the average rate of delay for an African programme.

Dr. Tonge: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows this, but the communication from the European Commission on reform of the management of external assistance specifically states in its operational conclusions that the present arrangements for ECHO are "unchanged". There is no will to do anything about the situation.

Mr. Worthington: The hon. Lady has stolen my punchline. Despite all the changes that are occurring in the EU in terms of the structure of development, it is clear that, as she says, arrangements for ECHO remain unchanged. That is not good enough, and it must be changed.

Mr. Streeter: I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's speech. I recognise his experience, so I will ask him a genuine question. He has criticised previous EU aid arrangements and has expressed a lack of confidence in the current reforms, particularly in relation to the emphasis that Commissioner Patten gives to poverty focus. He has also agreed that ECHO will remain unreformed.

Is the hon. Gentleman optimistic that, in the medium term, the EU is capable of running an effective and efficient aid programme? Will there come a time—perhaps we are approaching it—when we must draw the conclusion that much of the money would be better spent bilaterally? I am not talking about cuts; I am talking about getting better value for our money. Is he close to reaching that conclusion?

Mr. Worthington: I have not agreed that ECHO will remain unchanged. It has been said that it will, but I believe that, through the kind of pressure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have applied, change has occurred and more will come. That change will be extremely useful. It will be an uphill task, but one that can be accomplished.

There will be enormous gains to be made from getting Europe moving together on development issues. Development will be delivered only if there is the necessary money. It cannot be done simply by words. We cannot say that we must all work together and then go for bilateral work. There is enormous benefit in having a development budget as our input into solving the north-south issue. The money must be there and it must be spent wisely.

I have referred previously to the link between the provision of assistance in humanitarian disasters and the military. Every time that I consider major disasters, such as the Mozambique crisis or the refugee crisis in Kosovo, I am more convinced of the need for a mechanism to facilitate the rapid deployment of military equipment. Now that our feelings about Mozambique have, perhaps, cooled a little, we must remember that, in this place, we argued about getting helicopters to Mozambique—5,000 miles away. It was absurd: there are helicopters all around the world. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) asked where the Americans were. Those regions are full of American helicopters. We must be able to link up logistically, either at a European level or at the level of NATO.

I remember going to the headquarters of the Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs, the UN organisation concerned with humanitarian response, and being astonished when I was told that, within the previous nine months or a year, the office had responded to about 30 humanitarian disasters. We had not heard of some of them, such as the snowstorms in Mongolia, but they were all major disasters, requiring a co-ordinated response, including the provision of heavy-lift facilities to get the supplies in. We are doing things amateurishly, and we must stop. The European Union has a role to play in improving how we operate.

The more I see of where EU money goes, the more I think that we must start using the funds that are spent on central and eastern Europe. I have never heard anything favourable about how they are disbursed. This is an unexamined area, and we should consider it carefully fairly soon to make improvements. I look forward to the Minister's response to that and other issues.

3.50 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): We should acknowledge the progress made by the Department for International Development on the European development budget since the report of the International Development Committee on the future of the European Community development budget on 21 January 1999.

Although we have not achieved one commissioner to administer European development aid, we have reduced the number from approximately six to two, which is a major achievement. The Select Committee, and the Secretary of State, who gave evidence to it, wanted the number to be reduced to one. However, we have reduced the chaotic structure of the European Community. I agree with the Minister that we have a long way to go from here.

Our paper set out the objectives and the general policy to be followed by the European Community in aid matters. They are wonderful words, but we have a deep suspicion that words and big figures are not followed by action. As the Minister said, we need an action plan.

We must now move on and do what needs to be done to make management and organisation of the European development budget more effective. I shall speak first on the co-ordination of European development aid, secondly on its management, thirdly on its accounting in the United Kingdom and Europe and, finally, on the role of the European Parliament and the budget. In response to the remarks of the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), I shall speak briefly about bananas.

I start my discussion of co-ordination with a quotation from Chris Patten's first speech, on 15 June, in his new role as the External Relations Commissioner. The title of his speech was "A European Foreign Policy: Ambition and Reality". He said, in paragraph 13:

> this brings me at once to external assistance—an area in which the EU reality, at present, falls embarrassingly far below its potential. The EU and its Member States account for 55 per cent. of all official international development assistance, and some 66 per cent. of all grant aid. Yet the money is not well managed. In saying that, I do not want to cast aspersions on the many excellent and dedicated staff who have worked their hearts out trying to turn things around. But they have been saddled with lousy procedures and there are too few of them. EC aid volumes have increased two or three times as fast as the staff at our disposal to manage the funds. We have to work with absurdly heavy procedures imposed by Member States wanting to micromanage projects, and to secure contracts. As a result, in the last five years, the average delay in disbursement of committed funds has increased from three years to 4.5 years. For certain programmes, the backlog of outstanding commitments is equivalent to more than 8.5 years' payments.

I refer hon. Members to the report of the International Development Committee, which sets out the position clearly. In table 5 we show that the deficiency in allocation of spending has progressively and severely increased since 1992: 6.6 billion euros were not disbursed in 1999. That is a serious problem, which even Commissioner Patten acknowledges.

The figures that I mentioned show that much aid from Europe is delivered not by the EU but by its member states. We must properly co-ordinate the functions of the EU's development aid programmes with the functions of member states' bilateral programmes. Since its formation, the International Development Committee has managed to persuade most presidencies—although, notably, not the Portuguese presidency—to organise a meeting of the chairmen of each national Parliament's development committee to discuss co-ordination of bilateral programmes. We have included the European Parliament's committee in our deliberations. That is a start, but member states are not pursuing it with meaningful co-ordination of their actions. The result is that in Nairobi and the rest of Kenya, in Uganda, in South Africa and wherever European bilateral programmes or EU aid programmes operate, our actions are almost totally unco-ordinated. Co-ordination takes place only through a sort of networking among ambassadors and aid officials. Much money is wasted and the scarce time of officials is wasted in trying to develop meaningful programmes that will help the poorest of the poor. There is a huge question to be answered about co-ordinating the bilateral projects and reaching agreement on the division of functions between the European Union and the bilateral players.

There is a case for centralising the co-ordination and negotiation of EU aid and bilateral aid in one office in each country in which European aid programmes operate. Such offices could be led by one member state. It is rare for all member states to have a presence in a country. The French could lead one project, the British another, the Danish another, and so on. Such co-ordination is needed to provide aid properly.

Given the total amount of European aid, one European voice pushing a policy of poverty-focused world aid programmes could influence international organisations such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in their roles in development and debt issues. Nothing less than that should be our aim. If Europe pulled its weight and was properly co-ordinated, it would dominate organisations in the United Nations family such as the United Nations development programme, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations conference on trade and development and the WTO. However, we must first start with Europe, and we have not even begun there.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow): Is there not an inherent tension between member states' desire for step-by-step accountability and the ability of the Commission to do the job? Will not enlargement make the task more difficult by involving 27 countries and, I think, 21 languages, instead of the current 15 countries and 11 languages? We must consider the implications of enlargement when trying to achieve the more streamlined approach that the hon. Gentleman described.

Mr. Wells: The hon. Lady is right. Enlargement will pose a huge problem for co-ordination and co-operation. That is why it is urgent that we get on with the proper management and reorganisation of the Commission. Unfortunately, the hon. Lady could not be with us in Brussels last week, but she will have learned that we began, tentatively and inadequately, to move towards co-ordinating the EU.

Now we need to push hard. The Minister needs to visit Brussels weekly to assess the EU's progress. He should set objectives, have them agreed and send Mr. Anthony Smith to find out how much progress the EU has made in a week. Perhaps a week is too short in Europe, but he should certainly go at intervals at which we can measure progress. To put things right, we must be determined. Madam Deputy Speaker has a reputation for being determined and persistent. The Minister and his officials must be equally determined and persistent to make the co-ordination effective.

As a result of the Committee's work, the Minister's work and so on, we have also managed to secure a promise from the EU to produce an annual report on European development assistance. If that is produced, it will have a co-ordinating and an accountability function, which will be extremely valuable. I am sure that the Committee looks forward to seeing the report and working on it.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington), my colleague on the International Development Committee, has spoken about the management and administration of the programme and how we should move that forward. The Committee's report quoted Philip Lowe, who was the director-general of DG VIII at the time, but is now the chef du cabinet of Vice-President Kinnock, who is re-organising the Commission. He said—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but it might be helpful for the record if he identified exactly which quotes he is giving.

Mr. Wells: I am delighted to do so, Madam Deputy Speaker. The quote is from paragraph 60 in the summary of conclusions and recommendations of the International Development Committee's report. That should lead hon. Members to the right place. I cannot see the number of the House of Commons paper.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps 669.

Mr. Wells: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Paragraph 60 says that Philip Lowe pointed out that > the budgetary discipline, or lack of it, evident in the EC was far below the standard expected of its peers. He suggested that the EC must adopt such procedures: "that is we forecast a budget which we plan to meet 100 per cent. and we tell the member states at the beginning of the year how much the contributions shall be and we stick to it and we do not take any more or any less than what we say at the beginning of the year...that is the normal budgetary mechanism of every national administration, and by the way it is the normal budgetary mechanism which other parts of the Commission respect."

That is what the Commission must do—no more and no less.

Incidentally, the Department for International Development is sometimes guilty of not introducing easily understood budgets that are spent 100 per cent. in line with what the Department said at the beginning of the year. The famous unallocated portion of the DFID's budget has not completely disappeared. Under "technical assistance", which is just under half of total expenditure, DFID gives very little explanation to Parliament or the British public of how it proposes to spend that and how it succeeds in spending it. We are sometimes guilty of not introducing the type of budget that Philip Lowe described, but we must aim to do so. The European development budget is very far from that ideal.

Much of the problem is undoubtedly due to the EU's not having sufficient people on the ground in the countries to identify the sort of investment that it should make, and to liaise with the Government and with people engaged in development matters, health, population and education. They simply do not have sufficient people in their offices to do this. The result is that they get lumbered with the bottom of the shopping list of the Department that is dealing with outside bodies that wish to help or aid the country, and often get the dud projects. That is part of the problem. We must focus on the staffing of the European development budget if we are to get this right.

Only last week the Secretary of State said in evidence that there was a proposal to deconstruct what are termed in the European budget "technical assistance offices". We are not at all sure what TAOs are. We are told merely that they are a kind of consultancy to which the European Union delegates the implementation of all the projects to which they agree. They are clearly highly inefficient because the EU does not implement them and spend the money allocated to them. Indeed, TAOs are constantly subject to condemnation by the Audit Commission for very serious fraud, maladministration and mismanagement. Projects are simply not evaluated. It would appear, prima facie, that to get rid of them and deploy people in the Commission is the only answer to the lack of personnel available to carry out sensible assessment of projects on the ground and have them properly evaluated, implemented and agreed to in Brussels.

The second problem is micro-management in Brussels. There are people in the Department for International Development who have a season ticket to Brussels and who go over to look at a series of project proposals and solemnly make great detailed decisions on them. That takes a huge amount of time; this is the micro-management of the programme. The EU says that it should not have to countenance such detailed management by member states. That is probably right, but what has to be set up is a sort of board process by which we agree the projects that are to be funded and implemented. Following that, projects with objectives that have been agreed and evaluated should be delegated to the management in the countries in which there are EU aid officials, possibly helped by bilateral programmes with the member states in those same countries. If that were done, there would be no micro-management by Brussels and we could get on with the job.

I will cite an example, which brings me a little way towards my banana remit. In St. Lucia, the EU has agreed to implement cultural and social programmes to compensate for the unemployment caused by the decline in the banana industry. A promise was given that aid would be delivered when banana production began to decline as a result of EU action. That promise was made three years ago. The banana industry has declined; it is delivering only half what it used to deliver. Yet the villages and towns and their people have not received one cent of EU aid. They have been left to get on with those difficult adjustments all on their own. That is the sort of thing that happens because the EU simply does not implement the programmes. We must aim to do something about that. The Minister and his staff must agree a management structure with the EU and monitor its implementation.

My next point is a technical one relating to how we account for EU aid in the British budget. I think that in this we are unique. We assign all money spent as part of the EU budget and the European development fund to the budget of the Department for International Development. That comes through the Treasury. The EU sends the bill to the Treasury. I do not know whether the Treasury pays it or simply sends it to DFID, which then pays it. That includes the whole of the European Union budget, which means all the money spent on the Mediterranean and north African programme, MEDA, on the PHARE programme for the applicant countries, on the TACIS programme for the former Soviet Union, on the Asian and Latin American countries, and so on.

That money is all lumped together and put into the budget of the Department for International Development. It appears in the budget that the International Development Committee monitors. That distorts statistics, because much of the money does not go directly to the poor. The objective is not that it should go to the poor. It relates instead to European Union foreign policy objectives such as MEDA, which is designed to keep north Africans out of southern Europe and provide economic opportunities in those countries. It is a perfectly legitimate programme, but not one that we would classify as overseas development. The same applies to PHARE and TACIS.

The Treasury should stop passing on expenditure on MEDA, PHARE and TACIS to the DFID budget. We could then compare the DFID budget with the budgets of other European Union countries which do not assign those programmes to their overseas development budget. That would change the statistics and change the perspective on the European Union budget within that of DFID. That has not happened because the present circumstances hold an advantage for DFID. If the European Union does not spend the money assigned to it, DFID can spend that money on other matters of a bilateral nature, because the money has been assigned to its budget by a vote in Parliament. Of course, we applaud that, but it is no excuse for distorting the normal method of accounting for European programmes.

It is not generally understood that the European Parliament's Development Committee has no control over the budget of the European Union. That function is carried out by a large committee called the Budget Committee. The members of the European parliamentary committees have one representative on the Budget Committee, or possibly a few more. I am not certain of the number, but their representation is small. Therein lies the reason why the European Parliament does not effectively monitor and control the European Union budget. I advocate a change in that method of operation. I understand that it is a popular continental method of budgeting, but it is clearly to the detriment of the proper administration and accountability of the European Union development budget.

Finally, I come to the banana issue. The European Union has issued a statement this week in which it says that, because it has been unable to agree an alternative programme, it will go along with the American proposal for a tariff-only solution. According to the Caribbean Banana Exporters Association—I believe that the hon. Member for Richmond Park has its briefing document in front of her—that would bring about a catastrophic and immediate end to the Caribbean banana industry. The British Government cannot view that prospect with equanimity, and no Member of Parliament should endorse it.

The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is taking a lead on this matter, but I beg the Under-Secretary and the Secretary of State for International Development to call together all concerned—as I have urged the Minister of State at MAFF to do—and, as a matter of urgency, go and link arms with the West Indian banana producers and persist, bully, shout, scream, stamp and do whatever is necessary to protect those vulnerable countries. Otherwise, they may turn to the drug industry, as the hon. Member for Richmond Park said. Many will be extremely reluctant to do so because of the implications for law and order, society and education—leaving aside the implications for this country, the rest of Europe and the United States—but will be unable to defend themselves from the huge sums of money that are involved. Unless the United States manages to stop that transition, a serious social and developmental problem will eventually be laid at the Minister's door.

Dr. Tonge: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is curious that the United States is prepared to step up the war against drugs in Colombia, and spend huge amounts of money fighting the drug barons and the growing of coca, yet it does not see that the problem will get even closer to its back door if it allows the new banana regime to continue?

Mr. Wells: It is inexplicable, as the hon. Lady says. As with many aspects of the world in which we live, we must look to the world of politics to understand what has happened in the United States. The situation is partly explained by the large contributions that are made to the political parties of the Democrats and the Republicans by the large US banana producers. In fact, they do not produce bananas. They merchant, ship and sell them, but the companies are US-owned, which distorts the picture.

According to the information that has reached me, an opportunity exists to negotiate an agreement—which the Americans would go along with—to get a WTO waiver for a regime that will allow for a transitional period, and may ensure the survival of at least the most efficient parts of the Caribbean banana industry. I enter a plea for that in the context of this debate about European Union development budget matters.

We have begun to make progress on the European Union development budget. There is a will on the part of the Commission, and of the two Commissioners involved, to improve performance. We must now move on to the detailed technical management of the budget. If further progress is to be made, enormous effort and energy from the Department for International Development will be required. The Department has excellent Ministers and staff, and I hope that they are given the necessary time to do that.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to be able to speak again.

I am sure that hon. Members agree that this has been a useful, important and comprehensive debate, and an effective use of Westminster Hall, as my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) said. I shall try to respond to all the points that have been raised. One thing that I am not short of is time, although I might be short of other relevant materials. I shall do my best.

The debate has been significant not only for its speeches, but for the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) sat through its entirety, asking only a couple of questions. I understand that she has to leave early for other important business. I noticed that my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Ms Osborne), one of those saved by the hero of the hour—the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter)—during the visit to Colombia, popped in to listen to a substantial part of the debate. The debate was notable for three—four, if I include myself—very balanced speeches, although one was a little more partisan than the others. We understand why, and sympathise with the hon. Gentleman about his need to take that approach. He and other hon. Members made several excellent points.

It is vital that we should constantly keep up the pressure on the European Commission to improve the quality of its aid programme. However, that is the responsibility not only of us in government, but of the International Development Committee—which has been fulfilling that responsibility—other Governments and Members of the European Parliament. The Commission, which is accountable to the Council of Ministers, is to some extent accountable to the European Parliament.

Although others therefore have a responsibility, we of course accept ours. We have published our reform proposals, and the paper has been circulated widely and picked up by other Governments. To some extent, it is the blueprint for the reform that is taking place. As I said, we have seen some signs of improvement, and they are genuinely attributable to constructive dialogue. Standing and shouting does no good, but we have tried to express our concerns forcefully and illustrate the way forward.

As has been noted, the Commission has been reformed. Where five commissioners used to deal with the matter, two now do so. Vice-President Kinnock is overseeing a programme of reforms, and Commissioners Patten and Neilson plan to improve the management of development programmes in particular. As several hon. Members—including me—have said, we need to implement the plans, criticise constructively and push hard for further reform.

In an astonishingly wide-ranging concluding comment, the hon. Member for South-West Devon advocated reform of organisations such as the United Nations, the World Trade Organisation, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Of course, that goes beyond the substance of this debate, but I can assure him that the Government are looking at reform of the World Trade Organisation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is taking the matter forward, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking a lead on the reform of international financial institutions. We are also taking a lead on UN reform, particularly in respect of agencies that are involved in development, for which we have a particular responsibility.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon suggested that, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has taken the lead in a cross-departmental committee on conflict in Africa, she has immediate responsibility for all such areas. Of course, we accept the need for coherence; we have introduced coherence into the language of development. I spoke about the importance of trade and agriculture policies, among others, and we are developing such policies. However, the hon. Gentleman's comments were rather niggardly, and I found his equating a specific announcement with an entire range of reforms somewhat strange.

The hon. Gentleman also said that I revelled in optimism. I tend to be accused of being somewhat jovial and optimistic from time to time, but I am realistic.

Mr. Worthington: My hon. Friend is a Hearts supporter.

Mr. Foulkes: My hon. Friend reminds me that I support Heart of Midlothian football club, which explains why I sometimes look disappointed. However, if one is a Hearts supporter, one is by definition optimistic.

In my opening speech, I dealt in detail with the specific proposal of the hon. Member for South-West Devon on the intergovernmental conference, so I need not do so now. He tried to convince hon. Members that the IGC is an appropriate forum—and that the paving mechanism is an appropriate way—in which to deal with such matters, but he has convinced no one but himself. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow rightly said in a telling intervention, enlargement will make some of the problems even more difficult to deal with. That underlines the need to deal with them now, before enlargement. To incorporate the paving motion that the hon. Gentleman proposes into the IGC discussions would complicate matters enormously.

The hon. Gentleman also failed to appreciate the question of leverage, which is one crucial benefit of the EC development programme. In this country, we have a very effective bilateral development programme, as does the Netherlands, Germany and some Scandinavian countries. The EC development programme levers in a percentage of money from other countries that may not have effective development programmes, may not put resources into development and may not have the mechanism for delivering development programmes. If the EC development programme can be made efficient and effective, the great prize will be resources from those countries that would not normally contribute money for development.

Mr. Streeter: I intended to deal with the leverage point because it is important. It is not beyond the wit of man or woman to come up with a system that introduces an appropriate mechanism into the EU aid programme in the way that I am suggesting, so that member states that want to opt out would have to demonstrate that their bilateral programme was of no less value than their contribution to the EU aid programme. What is wrong with that? It is simple and sensible. What is the point of levering in extra money if it is spent in the wrong place, in the wrong way and does not arrive on time?

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman is living in cloud cuckoo land. If he accepts, as I do, that it is difficult, but achievable, to make the EC programme efficient, effective and poverty-orientated, he must realise how much more difficult it would be to persuade an independent sovereign nation to change its programme, to put in more money and to change its priorities to accord with our priorities. That would be impossible.

Mr. Streeter: Diplomacy.

Mr. Foulkes: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman is the best person to advocate that.

Mr. Streeter: The Minister may be.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's confidence.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the policy statement and its fine words, but asked about the action and where the beef is. I said earlier that we must know the direction before we can work on its implementation. The policy statement must be made operational. An action plan must state who will do what and when. We are working on a road map to help the Commission with its operational action plan. The Department for International Development is offering that practical assistance so that it knows the direction in which to move and how to do so.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that Ministers should be travelling around the capitals of Europe to advocate his crackpot idea. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have frequent discussions with Development Ministers of our partner countries to try to bring them on board. It sounds patronising to say that they are coming round to our agenda, but we are making alliances with people who believe the same as we do—for example, Evelien Herfkens in the Netherlands and Eddy Boutmans in Belgium.

I shall be in Madrid the week after next because we believe that more work is necessary with our partners in Spain. I am hoping to go to Rome in a few weeks to speak to Rino Serri to try to ensure that we are moving in the same direction on making EC programmes more effective and more poverty-orientated. I recently met some Development Ministers at an informal meeting in Paris, and the Secretary of State met them at the Development Council—we are having constant discussions. I endorse the comments of the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), who said that there are excellent officials in the DFID section that deals with Europe. They work day and night, almost literally—perhaps they are training to be Members of Parliament—in pursuit of our agenda.

I turn to the comments of the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), who made a constructive speech. I hope that I will do her no harm by praising her—she was good enough to say some good things about the Department. We are at one with her on tied aid, which we have pursued strongly. It is our policy to press for the untying of EC aid and to get other members to come along with us. We are also pursuing bilateral untying, which she—or perhaps it was another hon. Member—said would be more difficult to achieve. At a recent meeting of the development assistance committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, we pressed strongly for that but, unfortunately, four countries were opposed to increased untying. We need to maintain the pressure in that context, and I am happy to give the assurance that we shall do so.

Mr. Wells: Will the Minister name the four countries? I can think of three—the United States, Germany and Japan—but what is the fourth?

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman got two out of the four right—the United States and Japan. My recollection is that the other two are Denmark and France. If I am wrong, I shall correct myself later.

The only slightly grudging part of the speech of the hon. Member for Richmond Park was when she rightly said that unspent European money should be used for debt relief. In that context, I quoted the astonishing figure of 1 billion euros, but that is just one chunk of unspent money from one fund—the European development fund. On our initiative, it was taken out. We are also pressing for other contributions, including, for example, a further 54 million euros that is financed from the EC budget for Asian and Latin American heavily indebted poor countries. We are keeping up the pressure in that context—that approach involves an effective use of underspend to help the world's poorest countries. I hope that the hon. Lady appreciates that 1 billion euro from that fund is a not ungenerous contribution.

Dr. Tonge: Will the Minister confirm—I have lost my notes—that unspent European aid amounts to 18 billion euros?

Mr. Foulkes: Money that should have been spent this year but has not yet been spent may well be spent in subsequent years. I agree with the hon. Lady about the principle that money that is unspent and is unlikely to be spent in the relevant area in future years should be considered for diversion to debt relief.

The hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford asked about Commission staff. Some Members of the Commission and of the European Parliament have suggested that we should increase the number of staff who work in the Commission on development. I suspect that that would not go down too well with the British public or in the British Parliament. We want more effective use to be made of staff who already work for the European Community. We should also ensure that they are more effectively deployed and improve the skill mix.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford, I believe, asked about technical assistance offices. Our view is that we should get rid of poorly controlled and monitored technical assistance offices, which would free up programme resources for contracting in expertise. That is in the management reform plans, which are being overseen by Neil Kinnock. Progress is being made, in terms of reallocating staff responsibilities and increasing effectiveness. I can confirm that 1 billion euros was unallocated and was transferred to the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, and 8 billion euros from EDF aid has been allocated but is unspent. We are trying to ensure that that money is spent on the purposes for which it has been allocated.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park also gave us a dramatic account of her visit to Colombia with the hon. Member for South-West Devon and my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr—an interesting and unusual trio. They deserve our congratulations for taking that initiative. I spoke about it to my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr and—briefly—to the hon. Member for Richmond Park, and I know that the visit was not without danger. It bodes well for us that members of the Select Committee, party spokesmen on international development and others are willing to take such risks to get a better understanding of the issues.

The hon. Lady referred to infrastructure projects, mentioning, in particular, the dredging of a river. My hon. Friend the Member for Ayr also spoke to me about that. The European Union has projects worth 9 million euros currently under way. I do not know the exact details, but I can certainly check out that specific case. Indeed, my hon. Friend has written to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about it, and I shall make sure that the hon. Member for Richmond Park receives a copy of the reply. The EC is also supporting the Colombian peace plan, although the figure has not yet been agreed.

The hon. Lady referred to Plan Colombia. I appreciate her concerns about the plan. We had reservations about it too, until my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office, who has taken on responsibility for the matter, discussed it with the Americans and managed to persuade them to change the military aspect of the plan. That was a great step forward. We are now more supportive of the Colombian peace plan. We support the idea that the Commission should contribute to it, on the clear understanding that the plan must be even-handed in relation to all the parties in Colombia and must help to improve the Colombian Government's performance on human rights.

Dr. Tonge: I am surprised that the military element of Plan Colombia has been modified. If that has happened, it is extremely good news, and huge congratulations are due to the Minister for the Cabinet Office. Can the Minister give us more details?

Mr. Foulkes: Certainly. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office recently went to the United States and subsequently took part in meetings in London and Madrid. She has taken a great personal interest in the matter and has worked closely with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. My Department also provided briefing. She made a significant impact on the issue. I agree with the hon. Member for Richmond Park about the needs of Colombia. In Cartagena, I saw the real poverty among black people.

Several hon. Members, not least the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford, raised the question of bananas. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the discussion on that issue has dragged on for too long. Throughout all the discussion, the United Kingdom Government have involved every Department, in an example of joined-up government. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has led, supported by the Foreign Office, the Department for International Development, the Department of Trade and Industry and other Departments. Our objective remains a rapid WTO-compatible solution that meets the needs of the vulnerable Caribbean producers.

[Mr. Foulkes]

I shall not describe all the work, lobbying and discussions that we have undertaken. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford said that we should shout and stamp our feet. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has impressed on the President of the United States the importance of the issue to the small and vulnerable economies of some of the Caribbean islands. That shows how important we consider the matter to be. We will continue to press the issue, because it would be unhelpful if the EU were driven down the tariff-only route.

Mr. Wells: I am delighted to hear that response and I want to encourage more activity. However, the Government make the mistake of looking for a WTO-compatible agreement. That is like pursuing a will-o'-the-wisp. No agreement will be WTO-compatible. The only possible solution is to reach an agreement with the United States and obtain a waiver under the WTO for the developing countries.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman expanded on what I said. I might have used some shorthand. We are trying to ensure that neither the United States nor any other country will challenge the agreement in the forum of the WTO, because we want to assist the Caribbean producers.

I shall respond to some of the points made by the hon. Member for Richmond Park, who mentioned evaluation. We are trying to ensure that EU projects can be more easily evaluated and clearly shown to be effective. Instead of examining inputs and how much money is spent, the EU should monitor outputs and the effectiveness of programmes.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park also asked about AIDS. That is particularly topical, as the AIDS conference in South Africa has just concluded. She mentioned an ineffective programme from a few years ago. Changes have taken place and the European Commission is now taking a leading role with its HIV-AIDS strategy. As a doctor, the hon. Lady will understand the details better than I do. The Commission is concentrating on four key elements: mother to child transmission, essential care for people living with AIDS, vaccine development and microbicides for HIV prevention. We support those priorities and strongly support the vaccine development role. I hope that she will agree that we are developing new initiatives that could be models for other measures.

Dr. Tonge: I was not suggesting that we were not taking positive action on AIDS. I simply deplored the delay, which allowed the epidemic to take hold in Africa. The world has not seen such an epidemic since the bubonic plague.

Mr. Foulkes: We could spend a long time talking about the growing problem of the AIDS epidemic. To be honest, I think that the biggest cause of its taking hold was not the slowness in EC delivery, but the reluctance of some African leaders to accept that it is a problem, their turning a blind eye to it and their not having their own programmes and not taking up some of ours that we offered them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie, in a customarily informed speech, raised the question of underspending—as, I believe, did the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford—and the scandal of non-disbursement of hurricane Mitch money. This also relates to questions raised by Commissioner Patten in his criticisms of micro-management of programmes by member states. That is a good example of the invalidity of Commissioner Patten's criticisms. Member states' micro-management was not the main cause of the delay in relation to hurricane Mitch. The Commission's proposals took a year to prepare. That is one of the criticisms that we share with my hon. Friend. The member states approved it within three weeks of receiving it. That suggests that the delays in the Commission's procedures, with the 40 signatures and the referrals back to Brussels, were the problems in the past.

My hon. Friend said that he was not happy with the new structure. He agreed that the reduction from five to two Commissioners was an improvement. I have reservations about there being two Commissioners rather than one, about one being senior to the other and about the Development Commissioner being the junior one. Our separate development Department is increasingly seen by other bilateral donors as a good model for having development assistance as a high priority. Even Charles Josselin, the French Minister with responsibility for development, who, as the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford said, now works in the Quai d'Orsay, agrees that our model is very effective, but because of his influence in the Government and the party in France—although he is, of course, part of the structure of the Foreign Ministry—he has very much an independent remit and can get on with a great deal of the work without interference and supervision.

My hon. Friend rightly mentioned the importance of coherence in relation to working with other Departments and the influence that a separate Department for International Development can have on other areas.

My hon. Friend also mentioned ECHO, as my colleagues and I thought he might. It is right for him to raise his concerns, which he also did when he was in Brussels last week. I hesitate to say this, but I feel that we have to be balanced in our judgment on ECHO. Emma Bonino, who was quite an individual—dynamic, and unpredictable in some ways—made a significant impact on the EC's humanitarian work. Two major evaluations were made of ECHO's work in 1998 and 1999: they gave a positive assessment of ECHO's performance but identified a number of areas that could be improved. For example, its performance in key areas such as co-ordination with other agencies and transparent strategies for engagement, particularly in the grey zone between relief and development, which my hon. Friend identified, was to be improved.

We are particularly supportive of the evaluation's recommendations to improve transparency and to enhance co-ordination mechanisms with other parts of the Commission. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees with that. ECHO has recently introduced new strategy guidelines, with proposals for a global plan, which it will present to the Humanitarian Aid Committee before it is finalised. That has been a positive exercise and has given member states the opportunity to feed in information and views at the planning stage.

My hon. Friend said that the new ECHO director, Constanza Adinolfi, could not answer his questions about money for Mozambique. She was appointed only in February, and we can understand that she may take some time to get into the job. However, she has a reputation for achieving results, and I hope that my hon. Friend and other hon. Members will give her time to implement some of the new recommendations on the organisation of ECHO.

Mr. Worthington: I recognise what my hon. Friend is saying and I am trying not to be unbalanced about ECHO. However, every other aid organisation could give specific information about how it had spent money. If we asked OCHA about emergencies, it could tell us exactly what was spent and when. On Mozambique, ECHO refers to 31 and 24 March, and 25 February. It talks about giving money to no specific target population. The primary aid type is general. The amount is 5.58 million euros. We receive meaningless information, so I ask my hon. Friend to keep up the pressure on ECHO to be transparent and to show how, when and where it is spending money.

Mr. Foulkes: I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall keep up the pressure on ECHO, although I am not sure which document he referred to. He also mentioned ECHO's out-of-date website, but we must all be careful about criticising other organisations on that matter, which has today been raised in the other Chamber. Like other hon. Members, I plan to have a website, so that people can access information about my surgeries and other issues. I already appreciate that it is not easy to find a system that can regularly be kept up to date with all the information. That imposes particular responsibilities.

My hon. Friend also asked about co-operation with the military, and I think that he used the word "absurd" regarding what happened in Mozambique. On reflection, what happened was not absurd. My Department obtained helicopters that were immediately available close to Mozambique. We hired pilots who were nearby and transported them to Mozambique effectively. Having agreed an appropriate funding arrangement with the Ministry of Defence, we mobilised resources from the United Kingdom for the next stage of assistance.

We are considering, rightly, how development workers and military personnel can work more closely together. Next week, I shall visit Kosovo, and I look forward to seeing Operation Trojan, which my officials and other hon. Members have told me is a good example of co-operation between development workers and the military.

My hon. Friend asked about PHARE and TACIS. Time moves on for all of us, and PHARE is now part of the pre-accession budget, along with separate funds for infrastructure and agriculture: ISPA and SAPARD respectively. He is probably becoming as fed up as I am with all these acronyms. Their aim is not development, but helping applicant countries to converge with EU policy and EU standards.

Incidentally, we are phasing down our development programme in eastern European countries and increasing our activity in the poorer countries in the far east of the former Soviet Union. We shall certainly keep PHARE and TACIS under review, as far as we are affected. If the International Development Committee felt that it was appropriate, it could doubtless do the same.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford made positive remarks about the Department and the genuine improvements to European Commission development assistance, while acknowledging that more still needs to be done. He also raised the important issue of co-ordination. We agree that countries both inside and outside the European Union should co-ordinate their programmes. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited Tanzania with three other European Development Ministers to investigate working together more effectively. That was a welcome initiative.

All donors need to co-ordinate more. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the World Bank recognised that fact with its initiative on the comprehensive development framework, which aims to co-ordinate donors in backing poverty reduction strategies drawn up by developing countries. He should welcome the move towards accepting poverty reduction strategies as varying the criteria for assistance. We recognise the need to minimise the burden on poor countries with limited capacity. When the President of Guyana was a Finance Minister, he often asked me how a small country with 750,000 people could deal with all the donors and all their requirements. We understand that problem, which is why we are trying to improve co-ordination.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the accuracy and transparency of the Department for International Development budget and whether the budget had been fully spent. I do not have precise figures, but almost 100 per cent. of the money allocated to the Department was spent last year. That is not bad. I am sure that he agrees that that level has been similar in the past two years. As for variation from published plans, I am sure that he is not suggesting that we should not change priorities. Conflicts and natural disasters require responses, and we might have to suspend programmes with countries in which coups or political changes take place until they return to democracy. Given that need for flexibility, it is even more remarkable that we have spent 100 per cent. of the budget.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of a single voice in the United Nations. The EU already co-ordinates well in UN development bodies. I have attended meetings and seen that for myself. Normally, an EU statement agreed in advance is read by the representative of the presidency. He mentioned the European Parliament and correctly said that its Development Committee did not control its aid budget. The Development Council has no such responsibility either. The General Affairs Council decides development budgets. We have examined that issue and will continue to do so. We are also talking about poverty eradication to members of the European Parliament's Budget Committee. I spoke to a British member to ensure that she understood our priorities of targeting poverty and questioning some of the allocations to Mediterranean development assistance.

[Mr. Foulkes]

I hope that I have answered most of the questions raised. The Government feel that Europe's development assistance stands at an important crossroads. We need to resist short-term political pressure for gesture spending and focus resources where they are needed most. Some sensible proposals for reform are on the table, and we press at every opportunity for their implementation . We are cautiously optimistic that they will provide concrete improvements in the quality and efficiency of programmes. We will continue to apply pressure. That will allow the EC programmes to fulfil their potential and make the impact on global poverty that they must have if we are to meet our poverty eradication target.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Five o'clock.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Distress for Rent

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to review the practice of distress for rent. [128323]

Mr. Lock: The practice of distress for rent is currently being reviewed. I am aware that there are some concerns over this practice and, in particular, its compatibility with the European Convention on Human Rights. We are investigating these concerns urgently and any problems identified will be addressed promptly.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) of 8 February 2000, Official Report, column 89W, on secondments, if she will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into her Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128252]

Clare Short: The figures given in the reply of 8 February referred to four individuals, all of whom were seconded for periods of more than 12 months and thus figured in the statistics for more than one of the years dealt with in the reply. The information required is as follows:

Name	Grade	Job title	Section	Work
Mr. J. C. Barrett	Grade 6	Natural Resources Research Programme Manager	Systems Management Office	Management of the Natural Resources Systems Programme
Dr. R. G. Poulter	Grade 6	Senior Natural Resources Adviser (Research)	Natural Resources Research Department	Advice on Research Policy issues. Liaison with the UK science base
Ms F. J. Proctor	Grade 6	Senior Natural Resources Adviser	West and North Africa Department	Natural resources advice on bilateral and regional programmes to Ghana, Nigeria, Senegal and Chad
Ms S. Moorehead	Band A2 (Grade 7 equivalent)	Research Manager	Economic Policy and Research Department	Management of research commissioned by the DFID Advisory Committee on Economic and Social Research (ESCOR)

Moluccas

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funds Her Majesty's Government have allocated to provide humanitarian aid to those suffering in the conflict in the Moluccas. [128813]

Clare Short: My Department is not currently funding relief operations in the Moluccas, but is willing to do so if safe access is obtained to make the necessary needs assessments. The rise in violence is preventing effective and impartial humanitarian access and has forced most relief agencies to evacuate and suspend their operations. We will continue to monitor the situation through our contacts in the few remaining operational agencies and will reassess our inputs once the security situation stabilises and humanitarian access is once again guaranteed.

A DFID team has just returned from Indonesia where they were advising the United Nations on possible options for engagement in conflict reduction activities. We have also seconded a humanitarian specialist to the United Nations in Jakarta. He is assisting with the co-operation of relief efforts throughout Indonesia, whether resulting from natural disasters or conflicts as in the Moluccas.

UN Social Summit

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's representation at the UN Social Summit in Geneva. [128714]

Clare Short: My Department's delegation to the United Nations General Assembly Special Session in Geneva last week, which followed up the Copenhagen Social Summit five years ago, was led by my Chief Social Development Adviser, supported by other senior DFID social development professionals and officials.

China Western Poverty Reduction Project

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the status of the China Western Poverty Reduction Project. [128477]

Clare Short: Britain supported this project in the Bank Board meeting in June 1999 because it would bring significant benefits to 1.7 million of the poorest people in China. We also supported the Board conclusion that no funds would be disbursed on the Qinghai component of the project until an independent Inspection Panel had conducted an investigation, and pending further environmental and social assessments.

The report by the Independent Inspection Panel, and Bank Management's response to it, will be discussed at a World Bank Board meeting on 6 July 2000. We are looking very carefully at the conclusions of the Inspection Panel Report, and Management's response to it, in preparation for the Bank Board meeting.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has received concerning the status of the China Western Poverty Reduction Project. [128478]

Clare Short: I have received representations on the issue of the China Western Poverty Reduction Project from members of the public, from hon. Members and from organisations which concern themselves with the welfare of Tibetans.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sudan

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the recent SPLA violations of the ceasefire in Bahr al-Ghazal, Sudan. [129074]

Mr. Hain: We have been following with grave concern reports of violations by the SPLA of the humanitarian ceasefire in Bahr-al-Ghazal and in particular the attack on the town of Gogrial. We call on the SPLA and the Sudanese Government to exercise restraint, to respect humanitarian principles and the agreed ceasefire in that region and to work to negotiate a comprehensive, permanent, effectively monitored ceasefire throughout Sudan. We reaffirm our support for the peace efforts being made under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) and firmly believe that only a negotiated settlement can bring all the people of Sudan the peace and stability they deserve.

Indian Sub-continent (Nuclear Weapons)

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what circumstances a licence is required to export strategic goods or technology to India or Pakistan; and what the Government's policy is regarding exports to nuclear or nuclear-related end-users in India and Pakistan. [129016]

Mr. Hain: A licence is required to export to India or Pakistan any goods or technology that are listed as subject to control in the legislation under which strategic export controls are implemented or any goods or technology subject to the Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) end-use controls set out in Article 4 of Council Regulation (EC) 3381/94 and Regulations 4(1) and 4(2) (b) and (c) of the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1996.

Where a licence is required then, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), the then Minister of State, said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) on 10 July 1998, Official Report, columns 687–88W, we will not allow the export of items listed in the Nuclear Suppliers Group Dual-Use List to nuclear or nuclear-related end-users in India or Pakistan, nor any other goods to these end-users which could contribute to the Indian and Pakistani nuclear programmes. The exception is equipment which would not normally require an export licence but is deemed licensable under the WMD end-use controls and where the initial concerns about WMD end-use are not subsequently substantiated.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129091]

Mr. Hain: Four New Dealers have been recruited. This represents 1 per cent. of Band A1 staff (which is the grade at which we recruit New Dealers), and .07 per cent. of total staff.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives the Government have (a) taken and (b) propose to take on modifying the UN Security Council resolutions governing the presence of United Nations forces in Sierra Leone. [127997]

Mr. Hain: We have actively supported the UN Secretary-General's initiatives to adapt UNAMSIL to meet changing circumstances; most recently leading the Security Council in adoption of resolution 1299 of 11 May 2000 to expand UNAMSIL from 11,100 to 13,000. We have been leading discussions on a further resolution on UNAMSIL in the Security Council, in the light of the Secretary-General's most recent report of 19 May 2000.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what factors he took into account in assessing the need for UK action in response to Security Council resolution 1289 concerning the increase in manpower of the UNAMSIL force in Sierra Leone. [127998]

Mr. Hain: We strongly support the UN's effort to help bring peace and stability to Sierra Leone. Since the adoption of Security Council resolution 1289 on 7 February 2000, we have provided an MOD team to help on the ground with UNAMSIL force deployment as well as our 15 UN military observers. We are also continuing to provide technical advice and support to UNAMSIL both in Freetown and New York.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations he has made to those countries which agreed to make a contribution to Sierra Leone through the Lomé Peace Accord but have (a) not or (b) only partly met the commitment they entered into; [128573]

(2) if he will list the countries which agreed to make a contribution to Sierra Leone through the Lomé Peace Accord, but which did not make the contribution agreed or any contribution; and if he will make a statement; [128572]

(3) if he will list those countries which have made contributions to Sierra Leone through the Lomé Peace Accord, indicating the amount of each contribution; and if he will make a statement; [128522]

(4) if he will list those countries which agreed to make contributions to Sierra Leone through the Lomé Peace Accord, indicating the amount of money each country agreed to give; and if he will make a statement. [128521]

Mr. Hain: Following signature of the Lomé Peace Agreement, a number of countries and donor institutions pledged and provided political and financial support to help re-build Sierra Leone after eight years of brutal conflict.

Around US$65 million was pledged at the international donor's conference, chaired by the Secretary of State for International Development in London on 27 March.

Practical support from the international donor community will continue to be needed if lasting peace and stability is to be achieved in Sierra Leone.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) British and (b) other western nationals have been evacuated from Sierra Leone since 8 May . [127688]

Mr. Hain: 125 British nationals and 49 other western nationals were evacuated by British forces from Sierra Leone since 8 May (the figure for other western nationals includes EU, US and Canadian nationals).

Child Labour

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made on the implementation of ILO Convention No. 182 on the prohibition of child labour; and if he will make a statement. [127917]

Mr. Hain: The UK ratified ILO Convention 182 on the worst forms of child labour on 23 March 2000. The provisions of the Convention are met in the UK. The Government are committed to eradicating the exploitation of children. ILO Convention 182 represents an important step towards achieving this goal. The UK strongly supports the ILO in its campaign to encourage all ILO member states to ratify and implement the Convention as soon as possible. The UK is now considering how best to take bilateral action in support of the ILO campaign.

European Social Charter

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on how many EU member states have ratified, and accepted as legally binding, the European Social Charter in whole or in part. [127913]

Mr. Vaz: The Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers was adopted by 11 of the then 12 EU member states in December 1998, with the UK dissenting. The Charter was declaratory and is not legally binding.

Article 136 of the EC Treaty (Title XI), as amended by the Amsterdam Treaty 1997, mentions the Community Charter, alongside the European Social Charter 1961, within the context of the objectives of the social chapter of the Treaty. All 15 member states have ratified the Amsterdam Treaty.

Human Rights and Biomedicine Convention

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the number of EU member states which have ratified the Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine. [127914]

Mr. Hain: The Convention came into force on 1 December 1999. Three EU member states have ratified the Convention: Denmark, Greece and Spain. Seven have signed the Convention: Finland, France, Italy, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden.

The Convention contains a mixture of devolved and reserved matters. The Government are considering the most appropriate way forward in the light of devolution.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the European Convention on Human Rights and its protocols, with special reference to those parts which some EU member states have not agreed to ratify. [127995]

Mr. Hain: This year is the 50th Anniversary of the European Convention on Human Rights. The Convention has now been ratified by all 41 member states of the Council of Europe. It has become the Europe-wide standard for fundamental rights and freedoms providing, as its founders hoped, cohesive values and a bulwark against tyranny. In the UK, the Human Rights Act 1998, which comes into force on 2 October 2000, will enshrine in UK law the guarantees provided by the Convention.

Since the Convention's entry into force, a series of additional protocols have been adopted. Where these elaborate the rights set out in the Convention or add new rights, they are optional. Like other EU and Council of Europe states, the UK keeps under review its position with regard to those protocols it has not already ratified.

Gibraltar

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 7 June 2000, Official Report, column 295W, how many people are in the United Kingdom Government/Gibraltar Liaison Unit for EU Affairs which has been established in his Department. [128487]

Mr. Vaz: The United Kingdom Government/Gibraltar Liaison Unit for EU Affairs was established on 1 June, within the Southern European Department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Initially, three members of this Department have been allocated responsibility for running the Unit alongside their other duties. We will keep the resources of the Unit under review.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the actions of ZANU(PF) during the election campaign and on polling day in Zimbabwe. [128716]

Mr. Hain: We fully agree with the statement issued by Pierre Schori, the Head of the EU Observer Mission, in which he indicated that during the election campaign. The two days of polling were peaceful and orderly.

> ZANU(PF) was responsible for the bulk of political violence

Serbia/Iraq Trade

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on financial and trade links between (a) Serbia and Iraq and (b) the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Iraq. [126626]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 19 June 2000]: There are no reliable figures for FRY/Iraq trade but according to official FRY figures it does not appear to be a significant element in the FRY balance of payments. The FRY has participated in the UN's oil for food programme, bartering grain exports for oil.

EU Political and Security Committee

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what items have been on the agenda of the EU Political and Security Committee since 1 January; and what decisions it has taken. [128505]

Mr. Vaz: The Interim Political and Security Committee started work on 1 March 2000. Since its establishment, the Committee's principal task has been to contribute to the preparation of the Council's decisions on the new European defence and security arrangements and in particular the Report and Annexes on European defence and security adopted by the European Council at Feira on 19–20 June. The Committee has also started to contribute to the Council's work on current CFSP issues, such as Zimbabwe and Sierra Leone.

Moluccas

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Indonesian authorities to ensure that those responsible for the sectarian violence in the Moluccas are brought to trial. [128786]

Mr. Battle: EU representatives called on the Indonesian Government on 12 June to remind them of their responsibility to maintain law and order, and to request an investigation and immediate steps to bring the perpetrators to justice. I issued a statement on 23 June, and saw the Indonesian Ambassador on 3 July. In the light of the alarming escalation of the violence, we and others are urging the Indonesian authorities to redouble efforts to take effective action.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Organophosphates

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of recent research on the effect on the nervous system of exposure to organophosphates. [126036]

Ms Quin: A Working Group of the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT) undertook an in-depth study in 1998 and 1999 of whether exposure to low doses of organophosphorus compounds can cause long-term adverse health effects. The Working Group considered the most recent research in this area. The COT's Report to Ministers was published on 26 November 1999 and copies were placed in the Library of the House. Presentations from researchers working on OPs were made to a Scientific Workshop on 28 March 2000 which was organised by the Government. We hope shortly to call for proposals for further research in this important area.

Lindane

Angela Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received about the health implications of Lindane. [127817]

Ms Quin: MAFF has received numerous representations from individuals and organisations concerning the pesticide Lindane. Most of these have expressed concern over the possible environmental or human health effects of the use of Lindane in this country.

The Government act whenever necessary on pesticides in order to safeguard health and protect the environment. In the case of Lindane, using a precautionary assessment, independent scientific advice is that the currently approved agricultural uses of lindane do not pose any unacceptable risk to people. Ministers are currently considering the advice from the independent Advisory Committee on Pesticides on the home garden and non-agricultural uses of Lindane and will announce their conclusions as soon as possible.

Pesticides and Fertilisers

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which discussions he has had with his counterparts in other EU member states on establishing reciprocal recognition arrangements on the use of pesticides and fertilisers. [127663]

Ms Quin [holding answer 26 June 2000]: All EU countries regulate the safety and efficacy of agricultural pesticides on the basis of scientific data under their respective national legislation. However, a gradual transition is already underway to an EC system of regulation which in addition to safeguarding people and the environment is also aimed at freeing the market in agricultural pesticides by achieving consistent standards between member states.

As such it provides for the mutual recognition of pesticide product approvals and uses granted in other member states.

Officials from the various member states are frequently in contact with each other to discuss the issues relating to harmonisation of the authorisation procedures and the regulation of agricultural pesticides.

The EU has established procedures whereby fertiliser companies can seek to have products designated as "EC Fertilisers" thereby enabling those products to be sold in all member states. Non-EC designated fertiliser products may be sold to another member state only where they comply with that country's domestic legislation.

Organic Farming

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 56W, on organic farming, what plans he has to undertake research into the balance of trade in organic produce in the last 12 months for which figures are available; and what representations have been made to him regarding the balance of trade in this respect. [126474]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 June 2000]: We have no plans at present to undertake such research.

We have received a number of representations concerning the proportion of organic food which is imported, usually coupled with requests that support for organic conversion be increased. The Government have substantially increased funding for conversion: £12 million has been committed in the current financial year and we plan to spend £140 million on conversion aid over the life of the Rural Development Plan for England.

Sheep Farmers

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will press for additional compensation for sheep farmers affected by cuts in the sheep annual premium. [128058]

Ms Quin: There have been no recent changes in the way the sheep annual premium is calculated. As part of the Action Plan for Farming, the Prime Minister announced on 30 March that this year sheep farmers will receive £22 million to compensate for the effects of exchange rate fluctuations during 1999.

Fishing (Russian Vessels)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the appearance of Russian blue water vessels off Rockall; and if he has assessed the consequences for UK haddock fishing. [128158]

Mr. Morley: This spring there was evidence of increased activity by Russian vessels fishing for haddock and other demersal stocks in international waters to the west of Rockall. Unregulated fishing of this kind risks undermining EU management measures aimed at conserving stocks. At the Fisheries Council in June we called upon the European Commission to press for the adoption of specific management measures by the North East Atlantic Fisheries Commission (NEAFC) to constrain fishing in the area. We are supported by a number of other member states. The European Commission has undertaken to pursue the necessary action in NEAFC.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), of 10 February 2000, Official Report, column 292W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128246]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 29 June 2000]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. Before an Interchange can occur all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

Further to my earlier reply to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), the secondee from the Royal Bank of Scotland worked in the Finance Unit at the Central Science Laboratory in York on the production of a report on operating procedures for contracts. The secondee from Manor Bakeries undertook a programme of visits within the Department.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sport Funding

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much the Government spent per head of population on supporting sport in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Northern Ireland in the last financial year; what the planned figure is for 2000–01; and what assessment he has made of such spending in other EU member states. [127127]

Kate Hoey: The information requested by the hon. Member is included in the table.

Exchequer and Lottery funding for sport is channelled primarily through the four home nation sports councils (Sport England, SportScotland, Sports Council for Wales, Sports Council for Northern Ireland) and the UK Sports Council (UK Sport). Funding is also provided to the Football Licensing Authority, which is charged with ensuring the implementation of Government policy regarding grounds at which designated football matches are played. Support for sport and recreation is also provided by local Government expenditure.

No direct comparison of expenditure on sport by EU member states has been made by my Department or the Sports Councils. Meaningful comparisons are difficult because of the way in which sport is structured and financed from country to country.

[3] UK Sport provides support to those sporting programmes and policies that are of benefit for the United Kingdom as a whole. It is not possible to determine the amount of benefit provided by UK Sport to sport in individual home countries.

[4] In addition, Local Authority estimated outturn on current and capital expenditure on sport and recreation activities in 1999–2000 totalled £767 million in England and £55 million in Wales. Expenditure details for 1999–2000 for Scotland and Northern Ireland and Planning figures for 2000–01 are not available.

Spoliation Panel

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the Spoliation Panel inquiry into works of art looted by the Nazis has met; and if he will make a statement. [128118]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 29 June 2000]: The first meeting of the Spoliation Advisory Panel was held on Thursday 8 June. To date, the Panel is aware of only one claim—that of Jan Griffier the Elder's View of Hampton Court Palace—which was acquired by the Tate in 1961. On 12 June, the Panel issued a news release inviting both the claimants and the Tate to submit their case as soon as possible. The Panel desires to complete its proceedings on this claim as rapidly as possible consistent with proper consideration of the evidence.

Royal Palaces

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what, at constant prices, has been the cost of maintenance projects in each year since 1991–92 at the occupied Royal Palaces after deducting the costs of the exceptional rewiring programme in hand at the time of the Windsor fire, and the costs relating to the restoration after that fire. [128461]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The costs are as follows:

1991–92	14,999
1992–93	10,768
1993–94	9,105
1994–95	10,637
1995–96	12,547
1996–97	11,630
1997–98	7,437
1998–99	7,392
1999–2000	6,788

Excluding minor maintenance costing less than £2,500

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in each year since 1993–94, what has been the (a) gross income and (b) net income from charges to visit Buckingham Palace; and to which Department the income was paid. [128460]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The gross income and net income from charges to visit Buckingham Palace in each year since 1993–94 are as follows:

		Net income
	Gross income	WCFR[1]	RCT[2]
1993–94	2,277	1,391	0
1994–95	2,662	1,398	0
1995–96	2,948	1,667	0
1996–97	2,812	1,686	0
1997–98	2,353	1,080	0
1998–99	2,505	1,066	0
1999–2000	2,349	0	907

[1] Windsor Castle Fire Restoration Project

[2] Royal Collection Trust

The net income accrues to the Royal Collection Trust rather than to any Government Department. Just under £8.3 million has been contributed toward the cost of the Windsor Castle Fire Restoration Project. Having completed the Fire Restoration Project, the net income has been retained by the Royal Collection Trust to fund ongoing conservation of the Royal Collection and the project to re-develop the Queen's Gallery.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in each year since 1993–94 what has been the (a) gross income and (b) net surplus from charges to visit Windsor Castle precincts. [128459]

Mr. Alan Howarth: No gross income is attributable to the Windsor Castle precincts as visitors buy one ticket which covers the State Apartments, Queen Mary's Dolls House, St. George's Chapel, the exhibition and the precincts. The net surplus from charges to visit Windsor Castle precincts in each year since 1993–94 is as follows:

1994–95	1,616
1995–96	1,908
1996–97	2,257
1997–98	2,381
1998–99	3,416
1999–2000	2,400

[1] Charges for entry to the Windsor Castle precincts introduced on 4 January 1994

Hollywood Films

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has (a) received and (b) made regarding allegations of anti-British bias in Hollywood films; and if he will make a statement. [128815]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have received a number of letters from members of the public about historical misrepresentation in Hollywood films, and while it is not for the Government formally to intervene in the creative process of film-making, I have made my personal views on the subject clear and will do so again when appropriate occasions arise.

Tourist Industry (Crime)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the effect of a rise in the crime rate on the tourist industry. [128814]

Mr. Chris Smith: The vast majority of tourists to Britain have a safe and enjoyable visit. Misleading comparisons of crime in Britain with that in the United States are of course unhelpful; but we expect to welcome many overseas visitors to Britain this year, four million of whom are expected to come from the United States alone. The Government are, of course, determined to tackle violent crime and are providing resources to address the issue.

United Kingdom Sports Institute

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many contracts have been let by the United Kingdom Sports Institute; for what purposes; and if he will make a statement. [128812]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department has asked both Sport England and UK Sport to provide the information requested, and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits (Foreign Countries)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the foreign countries where people claiming social security benefits currently reside; and how many customers of his Department reside in each such country. [127351]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 22 June 2000]: Such information as is available has been placed in Library.

Child Support

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 22 June 2000, Official Report, column 256W, on child support, if the new criminal offences for providing false information will apply retrospectively; and if he will make a statement. [128153]

Angela Eagle: It would not be appropriate under the terms of the European Convention on Human Rights for such provisions to have retrospective effect, allowing prosecution for an act or omission which was not a criminal offence at the time it was committed.

Ancillary Employees

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest position regarding the payment of Jobseeker's Allowances to school ancillary employees during the school holidays. [128293]

Angela Eagle: The current legal position, confirmed by the Court of Appeal in October 1999, is that ancillary workers with an on-going contract of employment, who are not entitled to Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) or Income Support (IS) during term-time because of the hours they work, are also not entitled to JSA or IS during the school holidays. We understand that leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the Court of Appeal decision was granted on 11 April.

Where any doubts exist over entitlement to JSA or Income Support, school ancillary workers may make a claim, which will be decided on an individual basis. School ancillary workers with low incomes may still claim in-work benefits such as Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit. Those with children may also be eligible for the Working Families Tax Credit.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects men aged between 60 and 64 years in the West Chelmsford Constituency to receive their Winter Fuel Allowance; and if he will make a statement on the delays in paying it to them. [128320]

Angela Eagle: Retrospective payments for previous years winter fuel payments started to be paid in the week commencing 26 June 2000 in line with our targets. The payments will be issued as claims are processed and are not defined into postcoded areas. Some customers in West Chelmsford may have already received their payment and the remainder will receive them over the coming months as claims are received and processed.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will investigate the treatment by SEMA and by the Benefits Agency of Mr. John Ward, a constituent whose address has been supplied to him; and if he will make a statement. [124877]

Mr. Bayley [holding answer 12 June 2000]: This matter has now been fully investigated. Due to the Data Protection Act 1998 I have written to my hon. Friend privately.

State Pension

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 480W, on the state pension, if he will estimate the cost of Option (b), an increase of £5 in the rate of the basic state pension and the introduction of age additions of £5 for pensioners aged 75 to 79 and £10 for pensioners aged 80 years or over, on the basis that the age additions for those aged 75 to 79 or 80 years and over are paid in full, regardless of contribution record. [128605]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

£ billion

	Gross	Net of means-tested benefits and income tax
2001–02	4.6	3.1
2004–05	4.8	—
2005–06	4.8	—

Notes:

1. Figures include the cost of benefits whose rates are linked to the rate of basic Retirement Pension.

2. Figures are rounded to the nearest £0.1 billion and are in 2000–01 price terms.

3. Gross costs estimated by the Government Actuary's Department. Costs net of income-related benefit savings are estimated using the Policy Simulation Model. Income tax revenues estimated by the Inland Revenue.

4. Estimates of income tax revenues not available beyond 2003–04.

5. Age related increase uprated in line with RPI, as in previous reply.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the annual cost would have been in respect of pensioners in Scotland if the level of the state pension for (a) single pensioners and (b) couples had been uprated in line with earnings from May 1997. [128064]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is shown in the table.

Gross cost of uprating the basic state pension in line with earnings for pensioners in Scotland from April 1998

1998–99	20
1999–2000	70

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 213W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124820]

Mr. Rooker [pursuant to his reply, 7 June 2000, c. 290W]: All four of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff were seconded from the private sector to his Department in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to the latest date for which figures are available, stating in each case the companies from which staff have been seconded. [109293]

Mr. Rooker [pursuant to his reply, 9 February 2000, c. 213W]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All Sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

For the periods in question, four private sector staff are recorded as having been seconded to the Department. One was from the Guardian Media Group plc between September 1997 and December 1997, one from Sacker and Partners between October 1997 and February 1998, one from Oracle from March 1998 to September 1998 and the final one from CSL Managed Services between August 1999 and February 2000. Other inward secondments of three months or more recorded centrally in the above periods were mainly from local government and other parts of the public sector outside the Civil Service.

Heating Fuel (VAT)

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what analysis he has made of the annual financial benefit in respect of pensioners resulting from the reduction of the rate of VAT on heating fuel; and if he will make a statement. [127586]

Mr. Timms: I have been asked to reply.

Customs and Excise estimate that households in which the head is of State Pension Age and economically inactive will benefit on average by around £13 in 2000–01 due to the reduced rate of VAT on fuel and power.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Corruption and Bribery

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 26 June 2000, Official Report, column 351W, on corruption and bribery, if he will list the number of cases in the last five years where the ECGD judged (a) the level of commission to be excessive and (b) the payment procedures unusual, indicating the companies concerned and the reasons why cover was refused. [128571]

Mr. Caborn: In the last five years there have been no cases where the levels of commission were deemed to be excessive or where there were unusual payment procedures.

Our customers understand and abide by our procedures in this regard.

Deer Management Qualifications Ltd.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department was informed that Deer Management Qualifications Ltd., Registration Number 3449049, was continuing to trade from a new registered office at Wrexham. [128568]

Dr. Howells: Deer Management Qualifications Ltd. has not informed Companies House of any change of address of their registered office, and remained at 381 Kingsway, Hove, East Sussex, the original address, until struck off and dissolved in September 1999.

A representative of the former company subsequently wrote from Wrexham on 28 December 1999 claiming that the organisation of that name was still trading. Information on restoration was sent in January 2000, but no application for restoration has been received to date.

In the interim, a new company, Deer Management Communications Ltd., Registration Number 4019145, has been incorporated.

MCI WorldCom Sprint Merger

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations his Department has received regarding the proposed merger of MCI WorldCom and Sprint. [128493]

Dr. Howells: This case fell to the consideration of the EC competition authorities under the EC Merger Regulation (ECMR) and the Commission prohibited the proposed deal on 28 June.

It is not our policy to disclose the identity or content of representations on cases so that interested parties may comment freely without any concern that their comments might then be disclosed.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations the Government have made to the European Commission regarding the MCI WorldCom Sprint merger. [128494]

Dr. Howells: This case fell to the consideration of the EC competition authorities under the EC Merger Regulation (ECMR) and the Commission prohibited the proposed deal on 28 June.

Member states have a formal role in the ECMR process. However, in order to protect the integrity of the ECMR process, member states do not disclose the line they took on individual cases.

Malaysia

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the licensed production agreement between Pains Wessex (Schermuly) and SME Ordnance in Malaysia for the production of (a) low enforcement pyrotechnics, (b) CS irritant cartridges and (c) CS canisters; [128281]

(2) if he will list the licensed production agreements between British and Malaysian defence companies. [128280]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) on 22 March 1999, Official Report, column 117W.

However, I would also refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary of State for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, on 12 January 1999, Official Report, columns 149–50W. The response to the Committee, referred to in this answer, was published on 23 February 1999, HC270.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), of 11 February 2000, Official Report, column 313W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128244]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 29 June 2000]: Giving the information in the format as set out in my answer of 11 February, details of the DTI grades of the posts filled and the Directorate in which the secondees were placed are given in the table.

For data protection and privacy reasons it is not possible to give names of individuals.

The Department has a long-standing programme of interchange with the private sector to promote the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. Before a secondment can occur, all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

Wind Energy

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance his Department is giving to support offshore wind generator research, development and manufacturing; and if he will make a statement. [128145]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government recognise the potential of the offshore wind energy industry both in the UK and internationally. Accordingly, offshore wind energy is a priority area within my Department's research and development programme for new and renewable energy.

The programme has so far committed £790,000 in two projects. One will monitor and evaluate the installation and performance of the UK's first offshore installation of two 2 MW turbines being installed off Blyth Harbour this summer. The other is supporting the development of a new rotor hub, aimed at the offshore market, being assembled in the UK using UK components. In addition, the programme also has several high-value research proposals currently under consideration to develop and evaluate installation systems and techniques for offshore wind farms with prospects for reducing costs.

A further aim of our programme is to establish the environmental effects of offshore wind farms. A project providing an initial assessment of all the potential effects has been completed and is being followed up by scoping studies focusing on the effects on sea wild life, birds and coastal processes such as erosion and deposition.

The Government are also considering the scope for additional support for offshore wind in the context of the new renewables obligation.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the potential contribution of offshore wind energy to electricity production; and if he will make a statement. [128146]

Mrs. Liddell: An analysis of the potential contribution of offshore wind energy and other renewable energy technologies was produced for my Department in March 1999 by the Energy Technical Support Unit (ETSU) and formed the Supporting Analysis to the Consultation Document on Renewable Energy then published. A copy of the Supporting Analysis is in the Library of the House.

The UK's wind resources are potentially much greater offshore than onshore. They are limited only by practicable working water depths, the use of maritime areas for other activities, and the costs of achieving linkage with the onshore electrical network. Moving from onshore to offshore need not require major changes in the technology, but additional technical problems arise because of the more hostile environment. Offshore installations could increase the contribution from wind power substantially.

Hyperlinking

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what interest the Government hold in a patent on hyperlinking; and if he will make a statement. [128322]

Ms Hewitt: The Government hold no interest in any patents on hyperlinks.

Magnox Fuel

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the technical papers on the dry storage of previously wet stored magnox fuel that he has commissioned; and if he will place copies of all such papers in the Library. [127962]

Mrs. Liddell: My Department has commissioned no such technical papers. Government policy is that the owners of spent fuel are responsible for its management subject to meeting regulatory requirements.

Export Credit Guarantees

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the net savings to the Exchequer in each of the next 10 years from restricting export credit guarantees to non-military exports; and if he will make a statement. [127502]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 27 June 2000]: If the hon. Gentleman's question is intended to ascertain the effect of a general restriction on export credit guarantees to non-military exports, the answer is that I do not envisage any net savings given that ECGD supported business caught by it would have been priced and managed with a view to at least breaking even. Additionally, while such a restriction would tend to reduce ECGD's exposure to interest make-up risk, it cannot be predicted at the outset whether this would generate net savings or expenditure for the Exchequer.

Indeed there would be a cost to the Exchequer from such a general restriction arising not only from forgone tax revenues which would arise otherwise from business thwarted by the restriction but also from any consequent reduction in employment.

If however the question is intended simply to elucidate the effect of the Chancellor's announcement of 11 January, extending the UK's unilateral ban on export credits in respect of "unproductive expenditure" to include a further 22 countries, then assuming recent trading patterns continue I would not envisage any costs or savings to the Exchequer given that, from information readily available, the £775 million business with these countries supported by ECGD guarantees over the last five years falls within the productive expenditure criteria against which future export credit business will be assessed.

Electricity Consumers Committees

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the regional electricity consumers committees. [128024]

Mrs. Liddell: The new Gas and Electricity Consumers Council (GECC), being established under the Utilities Bill, will replace the Gas Consumers Council and the electricity consumers committees. An announcement was made in both Houses on 23 June on GECC's future organisation. It will have a head office based in London, an office in Glasgow serving Scotland, one in Cardiff serving Wales and further offices in Manchester, Birmingham, London, Newcastle and Bournemouth serving England.

Engineering

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which organisations were represented at the meeting on 23 May to discuss the work of the Hawley Review Group; and what was the outcome of the meeting. [127736]

Mr. Alan Johnson [pursuant to the reply, 27 June 2000, c. 456W]: Unfortunately the list of organisations shown in the answer was incomplete. Following is the full list:

AEA Technology

BAE Systems

BioIndustry Association

PRIME MINISTER

New Deal

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answers of 7 June 2000, Official Report, column 288, and 14 June 2000, Official Report, column 934, if he will reconcile the figures given in the two answers for the number of jobs created under the New Deal; and if he will make a statement. [127588]

The Prime Minister: Over 250,000 people have found jobs as a result of the New Deal, 210,000 of whom have been young people.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Prime Minister how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April which requested information, pursuant to his previous answers. [128009]

The Prime Minister: Of the 454 written answers I provided within the specified period, 41 were in answer to questions pursuant to previous answers.

SCOTLAND

Tall Ships Race

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the economic impact of the Tall Ships Race in Scotland. [127714]

Dr. Reid: I understand that Inverclyde Council and Renfrewshire Enterprise commissioned an economic impact evaluation of the visit of the Cutty Sark Tall Ships Race to Greenock in summer 1999. This showed that new expenditure of £8.5 million was generated in the Inverclyde Council area. It was estimated that this level of expenditure would support a notional 248 jobs for one year in Inverclyde.

Assisted Areas

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received from (a) hon. Members, (b) MSPs, (c) local councils and (d) local enterprise companies in connection with the definition of assisted area status submitted to the Commission on 10 April. [128561]

Dr. Reid: I have received the following representations in connection with the definition of assisted area status submitted to the Commission on 10 April:

(a) 12 from hon. Members (six of these hon. Members are also MSPs but they have not been included in the number at (b))

(b) Eight from MSPs

(c) 19 from local councils

(d) Five from local enterprise companies.

Skye Bridge

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of tolls paid at the Skye Bridge tollbooth, after discounts, goes towards paying back the money owed on the project. [128286]

Dr. Reid: Responsibility for tolls paid on the Skye Bridge is a matter for the Scottish Executive.

Fisheries

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of angler-caught (a) salmon, (b) grilse and (c) sea trout caught in Scotland in each of the last five years; and what is his estimate of the number of each of these three categories of fish taken by seals in Scottish waters in each of these years. [128854]

Dr. Reid: Information on catches up to 1998, the latest year for which statistics have been published, are contained in the Statistical Bulletin, Fisheries Series published by the Scottish Executive Rural Affairs Department. A copy is available in the House of Commons Library. Information on the number of salmon, grilse and sea trout taken by seals is not available.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Robert Hamill

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the decision of the Greater Belfast Coroner not to hold an inquest into the murder of Robert Hamill. [127719]

Mr. Ingram: The decision of whether or not an inquest is held is entirely a matter for HM Coroner.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are concerned that an inquest will not be held in Mr. Hamill's case and have asked for all the facts to be made available to us.

Fisheries

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of (a) salmon, (b) grilse and (c) sea trout caught by anglers in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and what is his estimate of the number of each of these three categories of fish taken by seals in Northern Ireland waters in each of these years. [128853]

Mr. George Howarth: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

HEALTH

Influenza

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many influenza vaccinations were given in the run-up to the winter of (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000; what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the flu vaccination programme in each of these periods; and what assessment he has made of the incidence of flu in the (i) immunised and (ii) non-immunised groups in each of those periods. [127302]

Yvette Cooper: Manufacturers' data show that 7.6 million doses of influenza vaccine were distributed for winter 1998–99 and 7.8 million for 1999–2000.

Data on the incidence of flu in immunised and non-immunised groups are not routinely collected. Efficacy data are based on published studies, some of which have spanned several years, showing that current available influenza vaccine gives 70–80 per cent. protection against infection with influenza virus strains related to those in the vaccine. In the elderly, protection against infection may be less, but immunisation has been shown to reduce the incidence of pneumonia, hospital admissions and deaths.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the total NHS trust extra contractual referrals for 1997–98 (a) from GP fundholding practices and (b) from health authorities, excluding GP fundholding practices; [124380]

(2) if he will publish, for each trust completing table 1 on pages 17 to 19 of "The New NHS Guidance on Out of Area Treatment Consultation Paper", the total trust adjustment for columns B, C and D. [124379]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The consultation on "The New NHS: Guidance on Out of Area Treatment Consultation Paper" took place between May and July 1998. In the light of this the information requirements for the out-of-area treatment (OAT) data collection exercise were modified.

The exercise to establish the 1999–2000 OAT adjustments was led by National Health Service trusts. It was carried out in two stages.

At stage 1, NHS trusts identified their 1997–98 extra contractual referral (ECR) income from health authorities and cost per case income from general practitioner fundholders. They then reduced these amounts to take account of activity that had already been put into contracts or service agreements. The data were validated by health authorities and submitted to regional offices. These data are shown in columns A and B of the table that has been placed in the Library.

At stage 2, the amounts established at stage 1 were analysed by NHS trusts. In agreement with health authorities the amounts were further reduced to take account of the activity which would be covered by new or expanded service agreements in 1999–2000. The amounts not covered by service agreements formed the base for the 1999–2000 OAT adjustment. This is shown in column C of the table. These figures, uplifted by 8.5 per cent., comprise the 1999–2000 OATs adjustment.

The information collected to establish the 1999–2000 OAT adjustment was provided by NHS trusts. The figures were derived from NHS trust ECRs but do not represent the totality of NHS trust ECRs.

The amounts in column C of table 1 formed the basis of the OAT adjustments made to health authorities.

Table 2, a copy of which has been placed in the Library, shows NHS trusts' 1997–98 forecast ECR and cost per case income. This information was collected as part of the in-year financial monitoring returns.

The figures in tables 1 and 2 are not comparable.

TV Advertisements

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 26 June 2000, Official Report, column 356W, on television advertisements, if he will list the advertisements which were not provided with closed caption subtitling. [128518]

Ms Stuart: Further to the answer given on 26 June, I regret the information given the hon. Member was incorrect and the total number provided with closed caption subtitling was 32.

The three advertisements commissioned without closed caption subtitling were:

Campaign Against Living Miserably (CALM)

Nurse Recruitment 2000—"Joe" (60 seconds version)

Nurse Recruitment 2000—"Joe" (30 seconds version).

Meat Inspection Charges Task Force

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish his response to the report of the Meat Inspection Charges Task Force. [R] [128735]

Ms Stuart: We are grateful to the Task Force and its chairman for the thorough and comprehensive investigation they have carried out into this complex issue. We are now urgently considering the Task Force's recommendations and will announce its conclusions once that consideration is complete.

Health Action Zones

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what role health action zones will play in addressing the decline in children's activity levels and the increase in the number of overweight children; and if he will make a statement. [128385]

Mr. Hutton: All health action zones are working towards the key aims of reducing health inequalities and modernising services in the most deprived parts of England. HAZ programmes include a number of projects that focus on exercise and diet for children.

Care Leavers

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children have left local authority care since the implementation of the Children Act 1989 in (a) England and (b) Wales. [128776]

Mr. Hutton: The estimated number of children who have ceased to be looked after in England between the implementation of the Children Act 1989 (14 October 1991) and 31 March 1999 is 190,000.

The provision of data for Wales is a matter for the Welsh Assembly.

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the average size of the grant made by local authorities to care leavers going into (a) further education and (b) higher education; [128775]

(2) how many young people who were in local authority care have been awarded a university degree during the past year in England and during the previous two years in (a) England and (b) Wales. [128777]

Mr. Hutton: The information relating to England is not available centrally.

The information relating to Wales is a matter for the devolved Administration.

Hospitals (Adverse Incident Report)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent advice he has issued to hospitals on the circumstances in which they must produce an adverse incident report. [128479]

Ms Stuart: In November 1999, the Minister of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), launched a series of standards underpinning the National Health Service Executive's "controls assurance" project. One of the standards outlines a number of key components of an effective system of risk management that all NHS hospitals must subscribe to, including incident reporting. A key criterion contained in the "risk management system" standard requires NHS hospitals to ensure that > Incidents, including ill health, are systematically identified, recorded and reported to management in accordance with an agreed policy of positive, non-punitive reporting.

Guidance supporting this criterion elaborates on certain circumstances requiring an adverse incident to be reported, and to whom. Further specific guidance is planned based around a more comprehensive "incident recording and reporting" standard which is currently being developed by the NHS Executive to augment the guidance contained in the Controls Assurance risk management system standard, and to underpin incident reporting requirements forming part of a new national incident reporting system planned in response to the Chief Medical Officer's recently issued report "An Organisation with a Memory".

GM Foods

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes has given to research into the long-term effects on human health of eating GM foods. [128294]

Ms Stuart: The Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes (ACNFP) has considered the practicality of post-market health surveillance for all novel foods, including genetically modified foods. Based on their advice, a feasibility study is due to start in July to test the robustness of data collection procedures. The results of this study will then be assessed by the ACNFP.

MS Patients

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for nurses to be employed by health authorities specifically to advise and help MS patients. [128773]

Mr. Denham: It is for individual National Health Service trusts and health authorities to determine the number, grade and mix of staff they will require to deliver services.

A partnership arrangement between The Multiple Sclerosis Society and the NHS has been set up to contribute to the development of MS specialist nurses. The funding arrangements include a formal evaluation of the nurses' roles that are being developed through this interesting partnership arrangement. There are currently around 70 of these specialist nurses. The further development of specialist nursing posts, however, is a matter for NHS commissioners and providers to determine as an integral part of neurological services.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if UK trials to validate myelin as a drug for MS patients have begun; and if he will make a statement. [128321]

Ms Stuart: No clinical trials have been authorised in the United Kingdom.

Cannabis

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects Government research into the use of cannabis for medical purposes to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [128765]

Mr. Denham: There are currently two trials underway. The first, a three-year study to attempt to measure the therapeutic efforts of cannabis extract in people with multiple sclerosis, is due to report early in 2004. This study has received £950,000 from the Medical Research Council.

The second trial is being managed by GW Pharmaceuticals Ltd. with the aim of developing a cannabis-based medicine. Initial findings from this trial are expected later this year.

Electronically Powered Wheelchairs

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent guidance he has given to (a) health authorities and (b) NHS trusts regarding the provision of electronically powered wheelchairs. [128713]

Mr. Hutton: Comprehensive guidance on the introduction of electrically powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs (with phased funding between 1996–97/1999–2000) was issued to the National Health Service in May 1996 (Health Service Guidance (96)34).

On 31 May this year, all health authorities were notified of their recurring allocations from 1 April 2000 for the continuation of the powered wheelchair and voucher scheme initiatives. This letter advised health authorities of our decision that allocations should:

> be free of distinctions between what should be spent on powered wheelchairs or vouchers schemes, and that health authorities and provider services should consult with service users and take a flexible approach to ensuring this money meets local needs and priorities in wheelchair services, and > that all services should continue to operate a voucher scheme which offers users a choice in having a wheelchair which meets their needs.

Bovine Materials

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date the Committee on Dental Surgical Materials required that no materials containing United Kingdom bovine material be used. [111895]

Yvette Cooper: [holding answer 1 March 2000]: The Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials (CDSM) did not impose a ban on the use of bovine materials in the production of surgical materials. Licensable dental and surgical materials were subject to the guidelines on the sourcing and processing of bovine materials for use in medicinal products that were issued by the Committee on Safety of Medicines as a precautionary measure in March 1989. The effect of the guidelines was to require all United Kingdom licence holders to source bovine material from outside the UK. Existing supplies of dental or surgical products that used UK sourced bovine materials were not withdrawn and it is therefore not possible to confirm when those products ceased to be used.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department made of the risk of transmission of BSE from the use of bovine material in (a) surgical catgut and (b) cosmetic products in deciding whether or not to prohibit the use of such material. [111896]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 1 March 2000]: The use of bovine material in the production of surgical catgut was considered by the Committee on Safety of Medicines (CSM), the Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials (CDSM) and the bovine spongiform encephalopathy working party, set up to advise the CSM and CDSM on the implications of BSE for licensable products in the light of the Southwood Report conclusion that any potential risk of transmission of transferable spongiform encephalopathies associated with medicinal products was remote. They advised that, as a precautionary measure, surgical catgut should be subject to the CSM guidelines issued in March 1989 on the sourcing and processing of bovine material for use in medicinal products. The effect of the guidelines was to require all United Kingdom licence holders to source bovine material from outside the UK.

Cosmetic products are controlled by the Cosmetic Products (Safety) Regulations 1996, which implement in the UK the European Union Cosmetics Directive (76/768/EEC). The Department of Trade and Industry has responsibility for these Regulations.

No independent risk assessments were carried out on use of bovine material in cosmetics prior to the opinion of the EU Scientific Committee on Cosmetology (SCC) given in 1996. However, in 1990 the Department of Trade and Industry considered that, although risks were likely to be very low, it would be prudent to take similar action to that taken in the food area on use of UK sourced bovine material. In 1992 guidance was issued by the UK trade associations on the use of bovine and ovine extracts, based primarily on sourcing material from outside the UK or with extracts that conformed with World Health Organisation advice on infectivity.

The National CJD Surveillance Unit monitors the incidence of CJD and undertakes a detailed examination of cases of variant CJD (vCJD) for any evidence of common risk factors. Investigation of the cases to date has found no evidence of an association with the use of surgical catgut or cosmetic products.

Vaccines

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many yellow card reports have been received by the Medicines Control Agency of suspected adverse reactions to each routine vaccine in each year since 1990. [122910]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 19 May 2000]: The yellow card reports to the Medicines Control Agency of suspected adverse reactions to a routine vaccine are presented in the table. A report of a particular suspected reaction does not necessarily mean that it was caused by the vaccine; other factors may have contributed.

Because multiple antigens can be included within a single vaccine, such as the combined diphtheria, tetanus and whooping cough vaccine, single reports may be listed more than once, against each different antigen involved. Children often receive more than one vaccine at a time and therefore a single report can be linked with all of those vaccines and similarly appear more than once in the list.

Over 150 million doses of vaccines have been distributed in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if vaccines are produced using human serum for individuals who would suffer an allergic reaction to the presence of bovine material in the vaccine. [124087]

Yvette Cooper: No. No bovine material is used as an ingredient in vaccines. Where bovine material is used in manufacture, purification processes are designed to remove material from the finished product.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 424W, on human vaccines, what was the first date of the use of bovine material in the early stages of the manufacture of vaccines. [124372]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Vaccines were in use many years before there were controls on safety, quality and efficacy of medicinal products as introduced by the Medicines Act 1968 and have traditionally used bovine materials in their production since the 19th century.

Since 1968 there have been increasing controls on the manufacture of medicines, including vaccines, such that today we require manufacturers to supply very detailed information about materials and processes used in manufacture and we have a well-developed system of routine inspection against those standards.

As a result it is not possible to specify the first date of the use of bovine material in the early stages of vaccine manufacture.

Donaldson Report

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to publish the Donaldson report on amending the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990; and if he will make a statement. [124083]

Yvette Cooper: The Chief Medical Officer's Expert Group on Therapeutic Cloning has completed its work on the potential benefits, risks and the ethical issues raised by developments in stem cell research and cell nuclear replacement. The report is expected to be considered by Ministers shortly.

Pain Management

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps he is taking to ensure that a full cost-benefit analysis, including financial savings accruing to all Government Departments is available to support Department of Health decisions about guidance on investment in pain management; [124327]

(2) what estimate he has made of the budgetary benefits accruing to other Departments from NHS investment in pain management programmes. [124360]

Mr. Denham: The Department recognises the importance of improving pain services as highlighted by the recent Clinical Standards Advisory Group report. We have supported a number of studies on pain, particularly low back pain—a major cause of morbidity and absence from work. While we have not commissioned a specific analysis of the benefits accruing to other Government Departments from National Health Service investment in pain management, we would, where appropriate, make all studies commissioned by the Department available to other Government Departments to support their policies.

Disease Cases

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of (a) measles, (b) mumps, (c) rubella, (d) diphtheria, (e) tetanus, (f) whooping cough and (g) polio there were in each of the last 10 years. [124211]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The data in the table, which is for England and Wales, have been provided by the Public Health Laboratory Service, Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre. For measles, mumps and rubella, data are collected as both notifications of disease and as laboratory-confirmed cases. Laboratory-confirmed cases give a more reliable guide to the true incidence of a disease, and in recent years a low proportion of suspected cases of measles, mumps and rubella have been confirmed as true cases.

Data prior to 1995 on how many notifications of measles, mumps and rubella were tested and confirmed are incomplete and are incomparable with that for 1995 onwards from which date more accessible salivary antibody testing was introduced. Prior to 1995 confirmation required a blood test; these data are not collated but it was likely to be few. The number of cases of pertussis (whooping cough) is based on notifications; only hospitalised cases are tested and the test is only positive in severe disease and very early in infection. The data for diphtheria are for laboratory-confirmed toxigenic diphtheria isolates. The figures for tetanus and polio are for cases ascertained by all methods.

Lung Cancer (Radon)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of recent evidence on the correlation between rates of lung cancer and long-term exposure to radon gas. [126042]

Yvette Cooper: We obtain advice from the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) on matters of radiological protection. NRPB reviewed the evidence on the risks of exposure to radon in the 1993 "Board Statement on Diagnostic Medical Exposures to Ionising Radiation During Pregnancy and Estimates of Late Radiation Risks to the UK Population" (Documents of the NRPB Vol 4, No 4). Copies are available in the Library.

The NRPB's Advisory Group on Ionising Radiation has recently started a new review which will be completed in about two years. Although some new evidence, including a case control study in South-West England—"Risk of lung cancer associated with residential radon exposure in South West England: a case-control study" S.C. Darby et al British Journal of Cancer (1998), 78(3), 394–408 (copies are available in the Library)—has become available in the interim, the NRPB advise it is unlikely to alter the broad assessment of risk which is that living for a lifetime in a house at the United Kingdom action level for radon (200 Bequerels per cubic metre of air) carries a 3–5 per cent. risk of lung cancer.

HIV/AIDS

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of HIV infection in 1995 was spread through (a) homosexual contact, (b) heterosexual contact, (c) drug use and (d) other specified means; and what are the most recent figures for transmission in these categories. [126830]

Yvette Cooper: The table provides the information requested, with the proportions expressed as percentages.

Probable route of HIV infection	1995 Number	1995 Percentage	1999[1] Number	1999[1] Percentage
(a) Homosexual contact	1,458	56	1,198	42
(b) Heterosexual contact	844	32	1,277	45
(c) Injecting drug use	180	7	91	3
(d) Other specified means	79	3	57	2
Undetermined[2]	55	2	224	8

[1] Data to end March 2000; proportions may change over time as more information is obtained.

[2] Includes mother to child and blood/tissue transfer or blood factor.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on (a) drugs, (b) care, (c) other treatment and (d) research in relation to AIDS in (i) 1985, (ii) 1990 and (iii) 1999. [126828]

Yvette Cooper: Spending on HIV/AIDS research in each of the three years is given in the table (in £ millions). Information is not available for the other categories in the form requested. The table shows allocations for 1985–86 and 1990–91 for HIV/AIDS treatment and care made to the National Health Service (which includes drug costs), support to local authorities through the AIDS Support Grant (which will include a contribution towards community-based support) and grants made to voluntary organisations for support and counselling. Actual spend is shown for these budgets for 1999–2000.

Year	NHS	Local authority	Voluntary sector	Research

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate how many of those with (a) AIDS and (b) HIV come from broken families. [126800]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people with AIDS and HIV there were in the UK in (a) 1985, (b) 1990 and (c) 1999. [126748]

Yvette Cooper: The numbers of people alive with diagnosed HIV or AIDS at the end of 1985 and 1990 are estimated to have been about 4,500 and 14,000, respectively. Data are not yet available to answer this question for 1999, but for 1998 the estimated number is 20,000.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total cost of running drug dependency units and treatments for drug addicts broken down between (a) in-patient and (b) out-patient care, separately identifying the costs for (i) methadone prescribing and (ii) prevention schemes in (1) 1970, (2) 1980, (3) 1990 and (4) 1999. [126747]

Yvette Cooper: The requested information is not collected centrally. Data are available for methadone used in the treatment of substance dependence, covering prescriptions dispensed in the community only. The table shows the number of prescriptions, the actual net ingredient cost, and the net ingredient cost at 1999 prices for the period 1980 to 1998, and the first nine months of 1999. Data before 1980 are not available and full data for 1999 are not yet available.

The regional drug misuse databases are the main source of information on persons presenting to drug treatment services with a drug misuse problem. Copies of the six-monthly statistical bulletin are available in the statistics resource unit of the Library.

Notes:

1. The methadone hydrochloride drugs used in substance dependence are shown in the British National Formulary (BNF) section 4.10, "Drugs used in substance dependence".
2. The data up to 1990 are not strictly consistent with data from 1991 onwards. Figures for 1980–90 are based on fees and on a sample of 1 in 200 prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors only. Figures for 1991 onwards are based on items and cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists, appliance contractors, dispensing doctors and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered. The data do not cover drugs dispensed in hospital or private prescriptions.
3. The net ingredient cost (NIC) is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.
4. Figures at 1999 prices are calculated using the GDP Deflator.

Genito-Urinary Services

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people visited a genito-urinary clinic in (a) 1970, (b) 1980, (c) 1990 and (d) 1999; and what was the cost of drugs prescribed to deal with sexually transmitted diseases in each of these years. [126798]

Yvette Cooper: The available information is as follows.

Diagnoses[1] of sexually transmitted diseases in genito-urinary medicine clinics in England

Year	Number of diagnoses
1970	251,256
1980	288,315
1998[2]	507,655

[1] Provide an indication of patient numbers but individuals may have more than one diagnosis

[2] Data for 1999 are not available yet

Information on overall drugs expenditure to treat sexually transmitted diseases is not available.

Sterilisation

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) sterilisations and (b) reversals of sterilisation were carried out by the NHS in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980, (iii) 1990 and (iv) 1999; how many were requested as a result of people getting married or acquiring new partners; and what the total cost to the NHS was in each of those years. [126838]

Yvette Cooper: The following table shows Hospital In-Patient figures for 1980, 1990–91 and 1998–99. Data are not available for 1970 and are not collected on reasons why procedures were performed.

Information is also not available on the total costs to the NHS.

Procedure	1980	1990–91	1998–99
Female sterilisation	16,954	44,904	48,194
Female sterilisation reversal	6,831	1,556	699
Male sterilisation	651	36,670	35,609
Male sterilisation reversal	652	1,745	896

1980 data were collected via the Hospital In-Patient Enquiry which was based on a one in 10 sample of discharges and deaths from non-Psychiatric and non-Maternity NHS Hospitals in England

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) hip operations, (b) knee replacements, (c) hernia operations and (d) cataract operations were carried out at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital in the last available year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [126590]

Yvette Cooper: The table shows the information requested for the period 1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000.

	Number of operations
Hip operations	80
Knee replacements	5
Hernia operations	717
Cataract operations	1,546

Action is being taken specifically on both reducing waiting times for patients needing orthopaedic procedures and on improving services to them. We are also improving access to cataract services. In doing so, it will improve the volume of surgery and reduce waiting lists. A capital modernisation fund of £20 million over two years from 2000–01 will allow local services to modernise.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital have benefited from the two week wait for treatment for cancer; and if he will make a statement. [126591]

Yvette Cooper: The National Health Service White Paper sets a cancer standard of two weeks from general practitioner referral to first outpatient appointment. This arrangement has been in place since April 1999 for breast cancer and a rolling programme is in place to achieve the same standard of care for all cancers during 2000.

The table shows the number of women seen at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital NHS Trust within two weeks of urgent referral for breast cancer since the standard was introduced.

Fluoride

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to monitor the levels of fluoride added to toothpaste, mouthwashes and dental floss by manufacturers of dental products; and if he will make a statement; [127234]

(2) what powers are available to him to require manufacturers to include the fluoride contents of (a) toothpaste, (b) mouth washes and (c) dental floss on product labels. [127233]

Yvette Cooper: The Cosmetic Products (Safety) Regulations 1996 controls the safety of cosmetic products in the United Kingdom. Toothpaste and mouthwashes can be classified as oral hygiene products and are controlled under these regulations. Oral hygiene products containing fluoride can contain a maximum of 0.15 per cent. The product must also be marked "contains . . . fluoride". Regulations require all cosmetic products to be marked with a list of ingredients. Ingredients in concentrations of less than 1 per cent. may be listed in any order after those in concentrations of more than 1 per cent.

Some toothpaste and mouthwashes containing fluoride are classified as medicinal products if claims are made for the products in accordance with the definition in section 130 of the Medicines Act 1968 and the relevant definition in Directive 65/65/EEC. Manufacturers of licensed medicines have a statutory obligation to list all the product's ingredients on the label and patient information leaflet. Active ingredients (those with therapeutic effect), including fluoride in toothpaste and mouthwashes, must be expressed in terms of their concentration.

The General Product Safety Regulations 1994 apply to dental floss. Under these Regulations manufacturers must provide relevant information to enable consumers to use the product safely and to warn about hazards that are not immediately obvious.

There is no evidence that these arrangements are causing public concern and we have no plans for any further monitoring of levels of fluoride added to toothpaste, mouthwashes or dental floss.

Immunisation

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of children have received the BCG immunisation in (a) London, (b) Brent and Harrow Health Authority area and (c) England and Wales; and what target the Government have set for such immunisation. [127348]

Yvette Cooper: The information available about the number of children who have been immunised with BCG vaccine is contained in the Statistical Bulletin "NHS Immunisation Statistics, England 1998–99". Copies of the bulletin are in the Library and it can also be found on the Department of Health website www.doh.gov.uk/public/ab9928.htm. Because the immunisation programme is two-pronged, some are given the vaccine shortly after birth neo-natal and others at 10–14 years as long as they are tuberculin skin test negative, reliable estimates of coverage are not readily available. As a result targets are not set for BCG immunisation.

Our BCG policy is that it should be offered first and foremost to all those considered to be at a higher risk of exposure to tuberculosis such as certain neo-nates and those whose occupation may put them at increased risk (eg. health service and veterinary staff). In addition the policy includes those classed at "normal" risk such as school children between the age of 10 and 14 years.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of children have been immunised against measles, mumps and rubella in (a) London, (b) Brent and Harrow Health Authority area and (c) England and Wales; and what target the Government have set for such immunisation. [127349]

Yvette Cooper: The information available about the percentage of children immunised against measles, mumps and rubella nationally and by health authority is contained in the Statistical Bulletin "NHS Immunisation Statistics, England: 1998–99", copies of which are available in the Library and can also be found on the Department of Health website www.doh.gov.uk/public/sb9928.htm. The target set for immunisation coverage is 95 per cent. for all vaccines by age two.

Alcohol Misuse

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the timetable is for publication and implementation of the Government's national strategy on alcohol misuse. [127412]

Yvette Cooper: We plan to publish a consultation paper later this year, which will allow a period for comment, prior to the publication of the strategy.

Huntington's Disease

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he is undertaking to recategorise Huntington's disease; and if he will make a statement; [127410]

(2) what representations he has received (a) requesting that the present categorisation of Huntington's disease be reassessed and (b) opposing any recategorisation; [127409]

(3) when Huntington's disease was declassified as a mental condition. [127411]

Mr. Denham: Huntington's disease is regarded as a neurological condition, although in its end stages it does lead to dementia. Patients need to receive care appropriate to the stage of the disease they have reached, and this may include management by nursing staff who have experience of treating patients with challenging behaviour.

There are no plans to recategorise Huntington's disease at present, and no representations have been received by the Department asking for recategorisation.

CFS/ME Working Group

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the work carried out to date by the CFS/ME Working Group. [127701]

Yvette Cooper: The Chief Medical Officer's Working Group on Chronic Fatigue Syndrome/Myalgic Encephalomyelitis (CFS/ME) has just completed a year-long scoping exercise, which included a children's sounding board event held in October last year and an adult sounding board event held on 7 June 2000. These events were designed to gather patients' views of service. The Group will now begin to move into the second phase of work which will include a consensus-building exercise, to assist with the development of clinical guidance as well as the drafting of the final report.

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to receive the final report of the CFS/ME Working Group. [127702]

Yvette Cooper: The Chief Medical Officer expects to receive and consider the final report from his working group on Chronic Fatigue Syndrome/Myalgic Encephalomyelitis in 2001.

Cancer Care

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the national standards for access to cancer care services; and if he will make a statement. [127656]

Yvette Cooper: We are determined to improve access to cancer care services and have set the standard that, by the end of the year 2000, patients referred urgently by their general practitioners will be seen by a specialist within 14 days. This standard has been in place for breast cancer since April 1999 and in the first year, 86,000 patients have benefited. We are rolling out this high standard of care for all other cancers so that by December 2000 all suspected cancer referred urgently for investigation will be seen by a specialist within two weeks.

General Practitioners

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received with regard to Government policies which affect general practitioners in the NHS. [127717]

Mr. Denham: Ministers and officials regularly receive representations on a wide range of National Health Service matters, including those affecting general practitioners.

We have, in addition, just undertaken the most comprehensive and ambitious consultation exercise in the history of the NHS in England. This has given every member of the general public and all NHS staff an opportunity to have their say on what they think would make the NHS better. Some of the responses have commented on or made suggestions about the role of general practitioners.

Lindane

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the incidence of breast cancer associated with the use of Lindane. [127815]

Yvette Cooper: The Department has received a number of representations from hon. Members which have been noted. The Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment reviewed all the available published literature and recent research on the association between exposure to Lindane and breast cancer in 1999. The Committee concluded that

> Overall the available data do not suggest that environmental exposure to Lindane is a cause for concern as a risk factor for human breast cancer.

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what (a) recent research and (b) evaluation of research his Department has undertaken into the possible health risks associated with the use of Lindane. [127818]

Yvette Cooper: None.

The Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment reviewed all the available published literature and recent research on the association between environmental exposure to Lindane and breast cancer in 1999. The Committee concluded that

> Overall the available data do not suggest that environmental exposure to Lindane is a cause for concern as a risk factor for human breast cancer.

Continence Services

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what procedures he has set in place to monitor whether targets for the implementation of the new guidelines for NHS continence services have been met; [127966]

(2) what procedures and funding he has set in place for the NHS at the local level to provide support for national continence awareness campaigns. [127964]

Mr. Hutton: The Department issued "Good Practice guidance for continence services" in April. This guidance suggests that continence awareness activities should be initiated locally as part of the responsibilities of local integrated continence services. The Department has no plans to provide further support for national continence awareness campaigns.

The guidance also includes appropriate references to the National Health Service performance assessment framework, which is used by the NHS in its planning and monitoring of the delivery of services. The Department has no plans to develop separate procedures to monitor the implementation of the guidance on continence services.

Antidepressants

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue a warning to doctors about the danger of suicidality in certain patients through the prescribing of Prozac and Sertraline; and if he will make a statement. [127960]

Ms Stuart: It is well known that suicidal ideation is associated with depression. Features of depression, including suicidal behaviour, can worsen after introduction of any antidepressant prior to its beneficial effects being apparent. The British National Formulary, issued to all general practitioners, pharmacists and other health professionals, advises that patients treated for depression should be assessed frequently for suicidal tendencies. The summaries of Product Characteristics (SPCs) for Prozac (fluoxetine) and Lustral (sertraline), in common with those for other antidepressants in the class, warn that the possibility of a suicide attempt may persist until significant remission of depression occurs and that patients should be closely supervised in the early stages of treatment.

Child Deaths

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many children aged under 16 have died non-accidental deaths while receiving treatment from a paediatric toxicologist in each of the last five years. [128047]

(2) how many children aged under 16 have died non-accidental deaths in each of the last five years while receiving treatment from (a) general practitioners and (b) paediatricians. [128048]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is not available centrally.

Surgical Instruments

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS operations in England have been cancelled in the last 12 months for which records are available due to delays in procuring surgical instruments; and if he will make a statement. [128021]

Mr. Denham: Quarterly reports of figures for all cancelled operations in England, which arise on the day a patient was due to come into hospital, or after they have been admitted, are available in the Library. We do not collect data on the reasons for the cancellation of operations but we have no information to suggest that delays in the procurement of surgical instruments have caused cancellations.

Residential Homes

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that older people living in residential homes have sufficient opportunities for leisure and recreational activities; and if he will make a statement. [128144]

Mr. Hutton: The Care Standards Bill makes provision for a new independent regulator for care homes, as well as a range of other care services. The National Care Standards Commission will register and inspect care homes against national minimum standards. Statements of these standards will be developed which will be based upon the regulations made under clause 21 of the Bill. We intend to publish the finalised standards for care homes before the end of the summer, and we will be aiming to ensure that residents in care homes have their social, cultural, religious and recreational needs satisfied.

PFI Hospitals

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average period is between completion of the Full Business Case and signing of the Final Contract for PFI hospitals; and what delays have been experienced in the delivery of services under those contracts. [128102]

Mr. Denham: The length of time between the approval of the full business case and signing of the final contract for the major private finance initiative hospital schemes (capital value greater than £25 million) which have reached this stage is shown in the table. All these schemes are in the construction phase, for which they are either on or ahead of schedule, except Carlisle, which became operational in April 2000, 34 days ahead of schedule.

Period between FBC approval and contract signature	Scheme
Less than 7 days	Calderdale Healthcare NHS Trust
	North Durham Healthcare NHS Trust
	Leeds Community and Mental Health Services NHS Trust
	Bromley Hospitals NHS Trust
	Greenwich Healthcare NHS Trust

	Hereford Hospitals NHS Trust
Greater than one month
52 days	Carlisle Hospitals NHS Trust
65 days	South Manchester University Hospitals NHS Trust
640 days	Norfolk and Norwich NHS Trust

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what mechanisms are in place to monitor the (a) service provided by hospitals delivered under the Private Finance Initiative and (b) performance of PFI contracts for hospitals. [128100]

Mr. Denham: National Health Service guidance requires NHS trusts to establish arrangements to monitor the implementation and performance of the private finance initiative contract in both the period up to completion and commissioning of the new facility and during the operational phase of the contract during which services are provided to the NHS trust.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what penalty clauses there are in the standard PFI contract for hospitals; and how often these have been invoked. [128101]

Mr. Denham: The payment mechanism in a private finance initiative contract, which includes mechanisms for the withholding or deduction of payments to private sector partners for their failure to perform to time or to standard, is negotiated individually for each scheme within guidelines set out by the National Health Service Executive.

There has only been one instance to date of a penalty clause being invoked at the new major PFI hospital schemes.

NHS Consultation Process

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in the recent NHS consultation process (a) how many leaflets were issued, (b) how many leaflets were returned by 5 June, (c) how the leaflets were distributed and (d) what conclusions he has drawn; and if he will make a statement. [127901]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 28 June 2000]: Over 12 million leaflets were produced and made available to the public and National Health Service staff through hospitals, general practitioners, surgeries, supermarkets and other retail outlets asking for an outline of the top three things that would make the NHS better.

The Department has received 219,943 responses. The top three priorities for the public were more capacity (doctors, nurses and pay), less waiting and doing things differently.

Health Services (North Yorkshire)

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) intensive care, (b) acute, (c) recuperative, and (d) intermediate beds are maintained by Harrogate District Hospital. [128085]

Mr. Hutton: The number of intensive care beds for Harrogate Health Care National Health Service Trust as at 15 January 2000 was three intensive care and five high dependency beds in a combined unit.

The average daily number of available acute beds during 1998–99 was 310. Data on recuperative and intermediate beds are not collected as a separate ward classification.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) nursing and (b) residential beds are paid for by North Yorkshire Health Authority. [128084]

Mr. Hutton: Central information on bed numbers is only available on a National Health Service trust basis. The total number of available beds in trusts bounded by the North Yorkshire Health Authority is 2,641. General and acute beds make up 1,937 of this total. Data on nursing beds are not collected as a separate ward classification.

Data on residential beds are not available centrally.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent consultation has taken place on reorganisation of the health services in North Yorkshire. [128079]

Mr. Hutton: The North Yorkshire Health Authority has recently consulted on proposals by York Health Services National Health Service Trust for the development of services for older people with mental health problems in Easingwold. The consultation ended in January 2000.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacancies for (a) junior doctors, (b) consultants, (c) nurses, and (d) locum staff there are at Harrogate District Hospital. [128086]

Mr. Denham: The information is given in the table.

Staffing description	Whole-time equivalents
Junior Doctors	[1]2.0
Consultants	[1]1.0

[1] Locum staff and agency staff are currently employed by the trust to cover these posts. There is also one locum employed covering annual leave and one locum covering sickness.

[2] Where nursing vacancies exist, bank and agency staff are used.

Harrogate Health Care National Health Service Trust

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will hold a public consultation on the future configuration of health services in North Yorkshire. [128077]

Mr. Hutton: The development of primary care trusts requires all local health communities to consider the implications for the configuration of National Health Service organisations. The North Yorkshire health authority has been working with a wide range of local stakeholders, including National Health Service trusts, primary care groups and local authorities, on future organisational configuration issues. Local Members of Parliament have been kept informed about these discussions.

Should these discussions result in formal proposals for the reconfiguration of National Health Service trusts, these would be subject to a full public consultation.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures his Department has taken to help ensure people in North Yorkshire health authority have access to drugs and other treatment for Alzheimer's disease. [128088]

Mr. Hutton: It is the responsibility of individual health authorities to have policies in place for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease. Drugs for Alzheimer's disease will be reviewed by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and guidance should be issued to the National Health Service by December 2000.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of the (a) accident and emergency, (b) cardiac, (c) orthopaedic and (d) cancer care at the (i) Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust and (ii) York and Scarborough NHS Health Trust. [128080]

Mr. Hutton: The Department has made no formal assessment of these services. Such work would normally be undertaken by the relevant National Health Service trusts and health authorities.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) junior doctors, (b) consultants, (c) nurses, and (d) locum staff are contracted (i) full-time and (ii) part-time to Harrogate District Hospital. [128087]

Mr. Denham: The information is shown in the table.

Data on hospital and community health services medical and dental staff holding either directly employed or agency locum appointments have not been collected centrally since 1996.

Department of Health Medical and Dental Workforce Census

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of Harrogate District Hospital. [128078]

Mr. Denham: Harrogate District Hospital will remain a general hospital serving the local community. Achieving this will require development of clinical partnerships with neighbouring general hospitals, and work to achieve this is under way across North Yorkshire. It has benefited from a major capital development of £37 million. The main phases have been completed and final construction work will be completed in November 2000.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many instances of MRSA have been reported in the past five years in (a) Harrogate District Hospital and (b) North Yorkshire Health Authority; and what measures his Department has taken to eliminate instances of MRSA. [128089]

Mr. Denham: The data requested are not held centrally. Tackling hospital acquired infection, including MRSA, has been set as a "must do" for the NHS. We have developed and issued national standards for infection control that places responsibility on chief executives of NHS trusts to deliver locally. Progress on compliance with these standards will be independently reviewed and monitored by both the Audit Commission and the Commission for Health Improvement.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) of 8 February 2000, Official Report, column 119W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128253]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 29 June 2000]: Secondments and attachments are part of the interchange initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. Before an interchange can occur all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

Details of secondments from the private sector commencing in the years shown are set out in the tables.

GM Feed

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to fund research into the health effects of GM animal feeds. [127052]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 29 June 2000]: I am informed by the Food Standards Agency that all genetically modified animal feed has been rigorously assessed by United Kingdom and European Union experts for possible effects on the health of consumers of the resulting animal products. Research to date has concentrated on the effects of processing on animal feed materials and the ability of DNA to survive processing and passage through an animal's gut. No incidental ill-effects have been detected in countries where GM crops have been grown and they and their by-products have been fed to animals for a number of years.

The agency is funding a study to investigate whether, and under what circumstances, antibiotic resistance marker genes from GM feed materials might transfer into the genomes of gut bacteria in the buccal cavities and gastro-intestinal tracts of ruminant animals.

Mileage Allowances

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to increase the Whitley Council mileage allowance for NHS staff using their own transport. [128282]

Mr. Denham: Mileage and travelling entitlements for National Health Service staff on national contracts are determined by an agreement of the General Whitley Council. A working group of the Council which includes representatives from trade unions and employers is reviewing existing provisions with the aim of recommending new arrangements which are fair to staff, meet service needs and reflect our wider environmental policies. We are aiming to complete these negotiations shortly.

Teenage Pregnancies

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the link between personal, social and health education and targets to reduce teenage pregnancy rates. [126110]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 20 June 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 27 June 2000, Official Report, columns 473–74W.

DEFENCE

Procurement

13. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the Government's defence procurement policies. [127269]

Mr. Hoon: The Government's procurement policy is based on delivering value for money through competition and prime contracting. Our Smart Procurement reforms focus on improving procurement effectiveness by introducing commercial best practice and working more closely with all our suppliers, at both project and policy level.

The benefits of smart procurement are beginning to work through, and I am confident that this forward-looking approach will lack the legacy of cost overruns and slippage that have bedevilled equipment procurement in the past.

23. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what meetings he has had with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to discuss defence procurement; and if he will make a statement. [127279]

Mr. Hoon: I have had frequent meetings with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury where we have discussed a wide range of issues, including defence procurement.

UN Operations

14. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British armed forces personnel are allocated to UN operations; and in how many places. [127270]

Mr. Spellar: The UK currently contributes 356 military personnel to six UN-commanded operations. These operations are in Cyprus, Georgia, Sierra Leone, East Timor, the Democratic Republic of Congo and on the Iraq/Kuwait border. Some 6,000 further troops are deployed with NATO on UN mandated operations mostly in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo. Fifty-six MOD police personnel are deployed with UNMIK in Kosovo.

Eurofighter

15. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence with what weaponry the Eurofighter will be armed when it first enters service with the RAF. [127271]

24. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence with what weaponry the Eurofighter will be armed when it first enters squadron service with the RAF. [127280]

Mr. Spellar: Eurofighter will be armed with the Advanced Short Range Air-to-Air Missile (ASRAAM) and the Advanced Medium-Range Air-to-Air Missile (AMRAAM) when it first enters service.

SA80

16. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on the SA80 modification programme. [127272]

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State announced on Friday 23 June that we intend to award a contract to Heckler and Koch, a subsidiary of Royal Ordnance, to modify some 200,000 SA80 weapons, including both the Individual Weapon and the Light Support Weapon. The SA80 is a generally effective weapon system. But we now know that it can be improved. Our Service men and women deserve a reliable weapon in which they have confidence. The modification programme will make the SA80 among the best in the world. And it demonstrates our willingness to take quick and decisive procurement action when required.

Iraq

17. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what operations Her Majesty's armed forces have been engaged in over Iraq in the last month; and if he will make a statement. [127273]

Mr. Hoon: In the month to 30 June, coalition aircraft have continued to patrol the no-fly zones over Iraq in support of UN Security Council Resolution 688, which demanded an immediate end to Saddam's brutal repression of his people. During that time, the Iraqi air defence system attacked or threatened coalition aircraft carrying out their legitimate duties on 18 occasions. Acting entirely in self-defence, RAF aircraft took part in eight operations against those military facilities threatening or attacking our aircraft.

Computer Failures

19. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made concerning the level of computer failures in his Department, its agencies and the armed forces. [127275]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence does not keep central records of non-critical computer systems as it would be uneconomic to do so. However, no operation has been curtailed due to a computer system failure in the last year.

The Ministry of Defence regularly assesses the criticality of all its computer systems. Based on these assessments there are contingency plans in place to ensure vital functions are provided with an alternate means of processing the data in the event of a computer failure.

Submarines

21. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy submarines are operationally available. [127277]

Mr. Hoon: There are currently nine Royal Navy submarines operational or engaged in preparing for service, trials or training.

Homosexuals (Armed Services)

22. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received calling for improved support for homosexual service men and women; and if he will make a statement. [127278]

Mr. Spellar: My right hon. Friend the Defence Secretary announced our renewed policy on homosexuals in the Armed Forces in January this year. Since then, we have not received any representations for improved support for homosexual servicemen and women. Sexual orientation is now viewed as an entirely private matter. All Service personnel, regardless of their sexual orientation, have full access to the entire range of Service welfare agencies, including confidential helplines.

European Security and Defence Identity

25. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent meetings he has had with his opposite numbers in EU member states to discuss European security and defence identity issues; and if he will make a statement. [127281]

Mr. Hoon: I last discussed European security and defence issues with my EU counterparts at the General Affairs Council on 13 June.

27. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the armed forces of the United Kingdom's continental European allies in the context of the European security and defence identity. [127283]

Mr. Hoon: The Kosovo crisis has shown that European nations need to be better able to deploy rapidly and sustain the right mix of armed forces for NATO or EU-led operations.

To this end, EU member states made a commitment to improving their military capabilities by signing up to a collective target—known as the Headline Goal—at the Helsinki Summit in December 1999. This goal is complementary to NATO's Defence Capabilities Initiative.

In line with the measures endorsed at the recent Feira European Council, we expect EU member states to nominate their voluntary contributions to this goal at the Capabilities Commitment Conference later this year.

Recruitment (Ethnic Minorities)

28. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made by each of the three armed services in meeting their targets for recruitment among Britain's ethnic minorities. [127284]

37. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made by each of the three armed services in meeting their targets for recruitment among Britain's ethnic minorities. [127293]

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made by each of the three armed services in meeting their targets for recruitment among Britain's ethnic minorities. [127257]

Mr. Spellar: In 1990–2000, 1.9 per cent. of the total Armed Forces intake were from the British ethnic minority communities. Single Service achievement levels were:

Naval Service: 1.7 per cent.

Army: 2.1 per cent., and

RAF: 1.5 per cent.

Although we are disappointed that this is short of our own 3 per cent. tri-Service goal, all three Services have continued to improve on the previous year's performance. The figures are in the right direction. We are committed to meeting these goals and working hard to meet them in the future.

Ro-ro Vessels

29. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will make an announcement on the award of a contract for roll-on, roll-off vessels. [127285]

Mr. Hoon: The competition for the Strategic Sealift (RORO) service is very close and more than one bidder has made improved offers which cannot be taken into account under the existing procedures. Moreover, circumstances have changed significantly since the original bids were submitted on 14 January; not least as a consequence of the British Aerospace merger with Marconi Electronic Systems. We have therefore decided that, to ensure the best value for money to the taxpayer, we should conduct a further round of bidding.

This will allow UK shipyards the opportunity to show that they can be competitive, but we have not changed the specification for the competition. The decision will still be taken on best value for money grounds, and all bidders will be treated fairly under the European public procurement rules which still apply to the competition.

After consulting the bidders and explaining the reasons for this further round, the Ministry of Defence has invited the four competing consortiums to "Revise and Confirm" their bids by 6 July 2000. It remains the MOD's intention to place a contract later this year.

Bullying

30. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about progress in combating bullying in the Army. [127286]

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to address the issue of bullying in the armed forces. [127276]

Mr. Spellar: All three Services have a clear policy, which is promulgated to all personnel, that no form of harassment, victimisation or other unacceptable social conduct will be tolerated and all allegations of ill treatment are thoroughly investigated. It is the duty of all those in a position of responsibility to protect others from physical and mental bullying and to report any incident promptly. Appropriate action is taken against the perpetrators. Potential recruits are made fully aware of this policy. The policy of zero tolerance towards ill treatment was re-emphasised when the new code of social conduct was issued to all Service personnel in January. In the last two years, all three Services have set up Confidential Helplines which can be used by any member of the Armed Forces or their families, if necessary anonymously, who believe they are being ill-treated.

Missile Defence System

31. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has made to the USA and NATO on the proposed new missile defence system. [127287]

Mr. Hoon: We have a continuing dialogue with the US Administration on their proposed National Missile Defence system. It also continues to be the subject of collective discussion by NATO Allies.

Defence Medical Services

32. Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many extra personnel the Government aim to recruit to the Defence Medical Services in the next three years. [127288]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) earlier today, Official Report, column 15.

Troop Deployments

33. Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the Army is (a) committed to (b) preparing for and (c) recovering from military operations. [127289]

Mr. Spellar: Some 27 per cent. of the trained Army is committed to Operations. This figure includes units preparing for, deployed on, and recovering from, operations. Of these, 20 per cent. of the trained Army is currently deployed on operations. The total is down from a peak of 47 per cent. committed at the height of the Kosovo campaign in July 1999 and below that inherited from the previous administration.

34. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many armed forces personnel are serving overseas. [127290]

Mr. Spellar: As at 1 April 2000, 42,710 Armed Forces personnel were serving overseas.

Army Recruitment

35. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on Army recruitment. [127291]

Mr. Spellar: The Army achieved 15,026 soldier enlistments during the last financial year. This was lower than the numbers enlisted in 1998–99 (15,609), but output to the Field Army in 1999–2000, which is the more important figure, was up by over 1,000 on the previous year. This is partly as a result of changes made to the selection criteria for new entrants and other changes introduced in the initial training regime. In respect of Officer recruiting, the numbers entering Sandhurst last year were 646 and output from the College was 534 against targets of 777 and 620 respectively. However, this year, the Army expects that numbers entering Sandhurst will be on target. Also the numbers of inquiries for officer careers are up on previous periods, as is the number of successful candidates at the Regular Commissions Board, which is a precursor to Sandhurst entry. Advertising for Army careers, for both soldier and officer candidates, is being more specifically targeted this year.

Aircraft Carriers

36. Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the value is of the contracts awarded so far for the design of the future generation of aircraft carriers. [127292]

Mr. Hoon: Two contracts, each worth up to £30 million, for work to investigate options for the design of the future aircraft carrier have been awarded to BAE Systems and Thomson-CSF Naval Systems.

Potential Recruits (Fitness)

38. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to help young unemployed people who want to join the armed forces attain the necessary fitness levels. [127294]

Mr. Spellar: Fitness levels found in the average young person have been in decline for some time. On the other hand, the fitness standards required of armed forces' recruits by the end of their training have not been reduced. Consequently, in addition to tailored fitness training programmes during recruit training, the Services recognise the need to give guidance to initial applicants, who may include the young unemployed, on the issue of physical fitness to enable them to attain the high level of fitness required to pass recruit training. The Naval Service issues a pre-joining fitness programme booklet to all potential recruits. The length of the programme lasts four weeks for officers and ratings, and eight weeks for Royal Marine other ranks applicants. If an Army recruiter believes that a potential applicant should take action to improve his/her fitness, he/she is given a video and a pamphlet which describe the training that should be undertaken. Similarly, all RAF recruits are given a booklet on physical fitness training prior to commencement of Recruit Training.

Territorial Army (Balkans)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the contribution of Territorial Army soldiers serving in the Balkans. [127274]

Mr. Spellar: Members of the TA have provided a vital contribution to operations in the Balkans. A total of 3,983 Territorial Army soldiers have been mobilised for duty in the Balkans since December 1995. Their role has been to provide individual reinforcements with a variety of skills to Regular Units on operational tours, and fill a number of staff appointments in the various headquarters in the Balkans.

Kosovo

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department plans to spend on operations in Kosovo this year. [127282]

Mr. Spellar: The 2000–01 estimate of additional expenditure likely to be incurred on operations in Kosovo is approximately £220 million.

Fuel Costs

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the Royal Navy's budgeted fuel allocation for 2000–01 is; and what the figure was for each of the previous five years. [127996]

Mr. Spellar: The Commander-in-Chief Fleet's total fuel allocation for 2000–01, including fuel for ships, submarines, aircraft, the Royal Marines and domestic purposes, is £57 million.

The actual spend for the previous five years, again giving a total of all fuel used, was as follows:

Financial Year	£ million
1995–96	48.5
1996–97	44.5

Year on year variations are largely attributable to fluctuating fuel prices. In 1998–99 prices dropped very steeply, followed by sharp rises since then.

Flying Hours

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying hours were flown in (a) Tornado GR 1 or 4, (b) Tornado F3, (c) Jaguar and (d) RAF Harrier aircraft in each of the past five years; and what the planning assumption is for 2000–01. [127999]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is in the tables.

Flying hours (Aircraft flying hours)

Year	Tornado GR1/4	Tornado F3	Jaguar	RAF Harrier GR7
1995–96	34,273	28,375	13,065	15,525
1996–97	31,511	25,634	11,916	16,003
1997–98	31,275	27,076	12,346	15,307
1998–99	28,780	22,769	12,417	15,246

	Hours
Tornado GR1/4	28,970
Tornado F3	26,136
Jaguar	12,437
RAF Harrier GR7	15,378

Note:

Figures include OCU, OEU and 1435 Flt

Western European Union

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will assess the speech of the French Deputy Defence Minister to the Parliamentary Assembly of Western European Union on 8 June as part of his formulation of Her Majesty's Government's policy on the future of this body. [127473]

Mr. Hoon: The Government will take all relevant information, including the views of the other WEU member countries and associate countries into account in formulating its policy on the future of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Western European Union.

Service Personnel (Compensation)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in the review of arrangements for compensating service personnel and their dependants, killed or injured while on service announced on 7 December 1997; and when he will publish a consultation document. [107439]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 28 January 2000]: My right hon. Friend has been considering draft proposals from the Joint Compensation Review. He believes, however, that it will be possible to reach final conclusions about attributable benefits only in the context of proposals about the future of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme as a whole, which will emerge from the parallel Review of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme (AFPS). That Review is still in progress. My right hon. Friend will therefore make an announcement once he has considered the draft recommendations of the AFPS Review. The announcement will be followed by a period of public consultation.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Home Detention Curfew Scheme

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for the period between the commencement of the home detention curfew scheme and 31 May (a) the number of prisoners who were released on the scheme, with a breakdown of the specific offences which they committed, (b) the average sentence (i) received and (ii) served, and the average period spent on the scheme, in respect of each specific offence, (c) the number of prisoners released on the scheme, with a breakdown of the offences committed, who (1) breached the conditions of the curfew, (2) disappeared and were recaptured, (3) disappeared and remain unlawfully at large, and (4) had their licences revoked, and for what reasons, (d) the specific offences committed by prisoners released on the scheme while on the scheme, including all offences committed by prisoners who committed more than one offence and (e) a breakdown of the specific offences committed by prisoners released on the scheme who committed a further offence while on the scheme that was similar in character to that for which they were originally convicted, including all offences committed by prisoners who committed more than one offence; and if he will make a statement. [126536]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 19 June 2000]: As of 31 May 2000, a total of 21,798 prisoners had been released on Home Detention Curfew since the scheme commenced on 28 January 1999.

The original offences committed by prisoners released under the scheme during the period, the number of prisoners convicted of each specific offence, the average sentence received and served for those offences, and the average period spent on the scheme in respect of the prisoners convicted of each specific offence are shown in Table 1. The data are taken from the Prison Service's inmate information system based on the data recorded by each prison. The table provides as detailed a breakdown of offences as is possible from central records.

A total of 764 prisoners released on the scheme during the period breached the conditions of their curfew. A breakdown of this number showing the original offences committed in shown in Table 2.

Information on curfewees whose licences are revoked and who disappear before being recaptured is included within the information held on the number of curfewees unlawfully at large at any one time. On 31 May there were 36 curfewees who remained unlawfully at large. This represents fewer than four per cent. of the total number of revocations. In the vast majority of cases, when a curfewee's licence is revoked, he or she can expect to be apprehended quickly and returned to custody. While the priority to be given to pursuing individual cases will be an operational matter for local police forces, Home Office Circular 1/1999 made clear that Home Detention Curfew recalls should be regarded as "urgent" cases. In addition, the National Identification Service at New Scotland Yard issues "The Police Gazette" weekly to all police forces, including details of curfewees who are unlawfully at large. When curfewees are apprehended following a period unlawfully at large, they are required to serve the period of time outstanding at the point their licence was revoked.

Details of the offences originally committed by those 36 curfewees who remained unlawfully at large on 31 May 2000 can be found in Table 3.

As of 31 May 2000, 1,028 curfewees had their licences revoked, using the powers available to the Secretary of State under Sections 38A(1) and 39 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. The reasons for revocation were as follows:

for breach of the curfew (Section 38A(1)a of the Criminal Justice Act 1991);

because the curfewee's whereabouts could no longer be electronically monitored (Section 38A(1)b of the Criminal Justice Act 1991);

because it was necessary to protect the public from serious harm (Section 38A(1)c of the Criminal Justice Act 1991); and because the curfewee had committed an offence or breached any requirement of probation supervision (Section 39 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991). Curfewees who are charged with new offences may also be recalled on any preceding grounds depending on the circumstances of the case.

A breakdown of the original offences the 1,028 recalled curfewees committed together with a breakdown of the reasons for recall is at Table 4.

Table 5 gives a breakdown of all offences committed by prisoners placed on Home Detention Curfew while on the scheme. Where a curfewee has been charged with more than one offence, these have been shown separately.

Table 6 gives a breakdown of the specific offences committed by prisoners placed on the scheme who committed a further offence while on the scheme which was similar in character to the most serious offence for which they were originally convicted.

The scheme is designed to ensure a better transition for short-term offenders between custody and the community. Prisoners are only placed on Home Detention Curfew after a careful risk assessment, and the safety of the public is paramount at all times.

Tables 1–6 have been placed in the Library.

Communities Act 2000

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those (a) businesses, (b) individuals and (c) organisations he (i) has consulted and (ii) plans to consult over Communities Act 2000/c124/01, of OJ C124, vol. 43, 3 May 2000. [128104]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Prior to the adoption by the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 23 March 2000 of the document, "The Prevention and Control of Organised Crime: A European Strategy for the Beginning of the New Millennium", it was cleared by the European Communities Committee of the House of Lords on 14 March and the European Scrutiny Committee of the House of Commons on 15 March. Throughout negotiations on the document, we regularly consulted Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, the National Criminal Intelligence Service the National Crime Squad and the Association of Chief Police Officers. There are no plans for further consultations.

Europol

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy concerning the extension of the (a) competetencies and (b) resources of Europol; and if it is his policy that Europol should have the authority to ask member states to initiate investigations (i) singly and (ii) co-jointly on its behalf. [128107]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The European Council, in its special meeting at Tampere on 15–16 October 1999, invited the Council of the European Union to extend the competence of Europol to money laundering in general, regardless of the type of offence from which the laundered proceeds originate. A draft amendment to the Europol Convention which would give effect to the Tampere proposal is currently under consideration by member states. We support the purposes of the amendment which would enable Europol to provide member states with more effective support in fighting money laundering which is at the heart of much organised crime. We take the view, in negotiating the budget for Europol, that it must demonstrate that it is using its resources efficiently and cost effectively in discharging its mandate. Any proposed increase to Europol's budget is subjected to detailed scrutiny, including by the United Kingdom's representative on the Europol Management Board.

The European Council at Tampere also attached importance to allowing Europol to ask member states to initiate, conduct or co-ordinate investigations, each involving a single member state, or joint investigation teams involving two or more member states, while respecting national systems of judicial control. A draft recommendation reflecting this Tampere conclusion is also under consideration by the member states. We support the purposes of the recommendation on the basis that any participation by Europol in investigations or joint investigation teams would, as also envisaged at Tampere, be in a support capacity.

EU Court Judgments

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on discussions at EU level concerning the recognition of court judgments passed in one member state being automatically recognised in other member states. [128137]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Tampere European Council strongly endorsed the concept of mutual recognition of judicial decisions, and asked the Council and Commission to adopt a programme of measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition, by the end of this year.

The possible contents of the programme of measures have been discussed in the European Union's Article 36 Committee and in other European Union working groups in the third pillar, on the basis of the United Kingdom's proposals. The European Commission has also held consultations on enforcement of foreign sentences. The incoming French Presidency is preparing to table a draft of the programme very shortly. A copy of this document will be deposited for Scrutiny. The programme is likely to include mutual recognition of decisions concerning the freezing of assets, arrest for purposes of extradition and execution of fines, imprisonment and other sentences imposed in another member state.

The Government intend to support further work on this issue, based on the conclusions of the Tampere European Council.

European Police College

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the planned activities of the European Police College; how many and what types of police it will cater for; and what its overall purpose is. [128109]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government are committed to the establishment of a European Police College Network to encourage greater co-ordination and sharing of good practice between European States. We have contributed fully to discussions on the role and organisation of such a network. I refer the hon. Member to the draft Council decision which we have recently submitted for Parliamentary scrutiny. This provides details on the specific functions and responsibilities the Network is proposing to undertake.

Eurojust

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy towards Eurojust. [128257]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 23 March 2000, Official Report, columns 682–83W.

Global Cultural Diversity Congress

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the fee was for attendance at the proposed Global Cultural Diversity Congress; and if Ministers were exempted. [128116]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I understand from the Gurbux Singh Report that various categories of delegate attendance fees were set by Global Cultural Diversity Congress (GCDC) 2000 Ltd. and that the suggested standard delegate fee was £595. All decisions about who to exempt from fees were for GCDC 2000 Ltd.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which Ministers had planned (a) to attend and (b) to contribute to the Global Cultural Diversity Congress. [128115]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Invitations to attend and contribute to the congress were a matter for Global Cultural Diversity Congress 2000 Ltd.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was proposing to Chair a Think Tank at the Congress and I had agreed to chair a panel debate.

Defendants

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in respect of the last 12 months for which information is available, what proportion of persons appearing before (a) magistrates courts and (b) Crown courts had no previous convictions. [128023]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on previous convictions for persons appearing before magistrates courts or the Crown court is not available centrally. However, previous conviction data are available for persons who appeared and were subsequently convicted.

Based on a sample of over 38,000 persons convicted of a standard list offence during 1998, 40 per cent. of persons convicted at magistrates courts and 32 per cent. of persons convicted at the Crown court had no previous convictions.

Police Recruitment

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will extend the principle of London weighting to Hampshire to help police authorities recruit officers in areas of high property prices. [128160]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Police Act 1996 provides that the Police Negotiating Board (PNB) shall make recommendations to the Home Secretary on matters including the pay and allowances of police officers, which include London Allowance and London Weighting. The Home Secretary shall take into consideration any such recommendation before making regulations.

A Working Party of the PNB is meeting on 11 July to discuss the impact on other forces of the increase in London Allowance which will take effect from 1 July.

Police (Colchester)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the established strength was of the Colchester Division of the Essex police force; and what was the actual number in post at (a) May 1995, (b) May 1996, (c) May 1997, (d) May 1998, (e) May 1999 and (f) May 2000. [128141]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Chief Constable of Essex is only able to provide figures for 1997 onwards and these are set out in the table.

Colchester division budgeted strength and actual strength 1997–2000

As at 31 May	Budgeted strength[1]	Actual strength[1]
1997	190	188.2
1998	185	186.8
1999	180	180.6

[1] Full-time equivalents

The reduction in the budgeted strength of the Colchester Division since 1997 is a consequence of the force's civilianisation programme, the transfer of some posts from Divisional strength to Headquarters strength, although the officers concerned remained based in Colchester, and the formation on 1 April 2000 of Major Investigation Teams. The changes are intended to make Essex police more efficient, effective, responsive to demands and to enable better targeting of resources on crime reduction.

The Colchester Division receives additional policing support from centrally provided road policing, dogs section, air support and Crime Division officers. The number of specialist department officers deployed in Colchester will vary according to demands for their services in Colchester and elsewhere in the Essex police.

Prison Industries

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total (a) expenditure of and (b) income from prison industries involved in commercial contracts was in the last five years. [128300]

Mr. Boateng: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 302W.

It is not possible to break down expenditure between commercial contracts and that used for products for internal consumption.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the contracts held by the Prison Service for commercial work from prison industries; and if he will make a statement. [128299]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service has commercial contracts to supply goods and services to the organisations listed. Contracts with commercial companies to supply work for prisoners may be sourced centrally by the Prison Service's Enterprise and Supply Services, but many are entered into locally by individual establishments. Information on contracts for commercial work is not collected centrally and a comprehensive list could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prison Wages

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the level is of prison wages; under what circumstances higher wages can be paid; and if he will make a statement. [128301]

Mr. Boateng: A Prison Service national framework sets the minimum level of pay for employed prisoners at £4.00. The minimum for those in training is set at £2.50. Above the prescribed minimum rates, levels of pay are set at the discretion of the Governor, and will vary depending upon the regime in place, the type of work available and links with other relevant schemes, for example incentives and earned privileges.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average (a) number of remand prisoners and (b) proportion of the prison population consisting of remand prisoners in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [128168]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 29 June 2000]: The information requested is given in the table. This information (up to 1998) is also published in "Prison Statistics England and Wales", a copy of which is in the Library.

Average population of remand prisoners 1989–99

Prisons (Purposeful Activity)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total amount was of public expenditure on purposeful activity in prison in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [128298]

Mr. Boateng: It is not possible to isolate accurately and calculate the total cost of the wide range of disparate activities which comprise purposeful activity. Although the level of such activity is comprehensively monitored, many of the costs cannot be meaningfully separated from the overall budget of running an establishment, for example staff costs.

An indication of the investment in purposeful activity is provided by the following central allocation for specific elements of purposeful activity.

Expenditure on education[1]

1995–96	36,956,087
1996–97	34,507,378
1997–98	36,174,320
1998–99	39,049,875
1999–2000	47,445,945

[1] Covers payments to education providers, payments for libraries and for education materials

Expenditure on industries and farms[1]

1995–96	24,680,000
1996–97	27,080,000
1997–98	28,442,000
1998–99	28,889,000
1999–2000	26,695,000

[1] Covers expenditure on raw materials and small tools and maintenance, but not staff costs or overheads

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners committed suicide in 1998; and of these suicides how many were caused by hanging. [128517]

Mr. Boateng: There were 83 self-inflicted deaths in prison custody in 1998. Of these, 80 were caused by hanging.

Police Response Times

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if police response times are calculated on the same basis in each police force area in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [122284]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 15 May 2000]: No. Each police area has a different method for measuring response times. Details for 1998–99 are contained in the Audit Commission Report "Police and Fire Services Local Authority Performance Indicators 98/99".

Asylum Seekers (Sierra Leone)

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons from Sierra Leone have applied for asylum in the last 12 months; and how many of these applications have been granted. [128738]

Mrs. Roche: The available information is given in the table.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent on speed cameras per police force and in total in each of the last 10 years; and what the planned expenditure is in future years for which figures are available. [128388]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not available centrally. It is the responsibility of each police force to determine how much to spend on speed cameras and other road safety measures.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the use of speed cameras with special reference to the European Convention on Human Rights; and if he will make a statement. [128394]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government do not expect the use of speed cameras to alter after the Human Rights Act 1998 comes into force in England and Wales on 2 October.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many areas the fines from speed cameras are kept by (a) local authorities and (b) police services; and if he will make a statement. [128391]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In December 1998, Her Majesty's Treasury announced that, subject to certain criteria, some fine income might be reinvested in law enforcement activity. With Her Majesty's Treasury agreement, pilot schemes involving the use of speed cameras were launched on 1 April this year. The pilots are taking place in eight police force areas: Cleveland, Essex, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire, South Wales, Strathclyde and Thames Valley.

Local partnerships have been formed to run each of the pilots. These consist of the police, local authorities and the courts. Fine revenue from fixed penalties is being invested into the purchase of additional speed cameras and/or the increased use of existing cameras all to an agreed programme. Surplus fine income will be returned to Her Majesty's Treasury. The success of the pilots will be judged on their road safety benefits, particularly their ability to reduce deaths and injuries.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average cost was of a new speed camera in the last 12 months. [128390]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Home Office type approved speed cameras vary considerably in their technology and application. An average cost is not available.

Fines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average level of fine was (a) issued for each category of offence in each of the last five years and (b) where a fine was the only penalty; and if he will make a statement. [128392]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Available information for 1994 to 1998 taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database is given in the table.

Drug Testing and Treatment Orders

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the range of offenders who could be subject to a drug testing and treatment order; and if he will make a statement. [128397]

Mr. Boateng: None: all offenders aged 16 or over convicted of an offence for which a community sentence is appropriate may be made subject to a Drug Treatment and Testing Order provided that the court is satisfied that the offender is dependent on or has a propensity to misuse drugs, that treatment may be helpful and the offender has expressed his willingness to comply with the requirements of the order.

Neighbourhood Wardens

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total central Government expenditure is on neighbourhood wardens; and if he will make a statement. [128387]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government have allocated £13.5 million over the three years for a fund to pump-prime and evaluate new and existing neighbourhood warden schemes, starting in 2000–01 and jointly funded by the Home Office and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR). Additionally, the Home Office and DETR are jointly funding a new inter-departmental unit, the Neighbourhood Wardens Unit, to take forward work on neighbourhood wardens including administering the fund.

Casualties

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total number was of (a) injuries and (b) deaths (i) per police force area and (ii) in total arising from (A) traffic accidents and (B) assaults and other violent crimes; and if he will make a statement. [128395]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The requested details on injuries and deaths resulting from assaults and other violent crimes are not collected centrally. Recorded crime data in relation to certain offences of violence against the person are given in the table. Please note that the offences given as wounding and assault may represent attempts, conspiring, inciting, aiding, abetting, causing or permitting, and not result in an actual injury.

The British Crime Survey has estimated that, in 1997, there were 714,000 assaults with more than trivial injury ('wounding'), and 2,276,000 common assaults, ie physical assaults or attempted assault with at most slight bruising. These categories do not necessarily coincide with those from the recorded crime figures.

The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has recently published the transport statistical bulletin 'Road Casualties in Great Britain: Main Results 1999', which includes the requested details in table 6. This is available in the Library.

Road Fuels

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each (a) police authority and (b) fire authority, the amount of money spent on road fuels in the last financial year. [128380]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Women Prisoners

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) undertaken on the effect on children of the imposition of custodial sentences on their mothers. [128122]

Mr. Boateng: The most recently published study of imprisoned mothers was 'Imprisoned Women and Mothers' by Caddle and Crisp. It was commissioned by the Prison Service and published in 1997 (Home Office Research Study 162). The entire female prisoner population at the end of 1994, comprising 1,766 women, were surveyed. In-depth interviews were conducted with the 61 per cent. of that population who were either pregnant or mothers of children under 18.

In the report of a 'Review of Principles, Policies and Procedures on Mothers and Babies/Children in Prison' (Her Majesty's Prison Service July 1999) and the Prison Service's Response and Action Plan (December 1999), a number of areas of research concerning the children of women prisoners was recommended. The Prison Service is giving consideration to these recommendations. Copies of both documents were placed in the Library.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had on the establishment of family visiting areas in prisons; and if he will make a statement. [128124]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service places enormous importance on encouraging prisoners to maintain close family ties and to making family visits to prisoners as comfortable and productive as possible. This relates not only to the specific establishment of family visiting areas but also to a range of facilities such as the provision of visitors' centres and play areas. Moreover, there is increasing emphasis on delivering initiatives to fully maximise the potential for allowing prisoners to have extended contact with families through longer visits and temporary release; and facilitating the visits of families from long distances through the provision of financial support and assistance with accommodation.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to enable women who receive custodial sentences to make arrangements for the care of their dependent children prior to the start of their sentence. [128121]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government have no immediate plans to make new arrangements for women or men with parental responsibilities to arrange child care prior to starting a custodial sentence. There may be opportunities while pre-sentence reports are being prepared for child care arrangements to be considered.

However, the Government do take seriously the needs of women offenders in the criminal justice system, and a working group has been established to consider a strategy on women offenders, including the range of sentences available. Also, the team undertaking the Review of the Sentencing Framework, which was announced on 16 May, will bear the needs of women offenders in mind in formulating its recommendations.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of women prisoners who suffer from (a) drug and (b) alcohol addiction; and what proportion of these women are involved in detoxification programmes while in prison. [128123]

Mr. Boateng: The report of a study of Psychiatric Morbidity Amongst Prisoners in England and Wales, undertaken in 1997 for the Department of Health by the Office for National Statistics, indicated that in the year before entering prison, 36 per cent. of women on remand and 39 per cent. of sentenced women reported engaging in hazardous drinking. Fifty four per cent. of women on remand and 41 per cent. of sentenced women reported some degree of drug dependence.

The information sought in the second part of the question is not available in the form requested. Returns from Prison Service establishments show that in 1998–99, when almost 16,000 women were screened on reception into prison by healthcare staff, 3,091 completed drugs detoxification programmes and 413 completed alcohol detoxification programmes.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the working group established to develop a strategy for the treatment of women in prison to report. [128127]

Mr. Boateng: The report of the working group and the timing of any publication is under consideration.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the conclusions reached by the action group on Anti-social Behaviour Orders led by the Chair of the Youth Justice Board; and if he will make a statement. [128801]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Anti-social Behaviour Order Action Group concluded that, in order to give increased impetus to the take-up of applications for Anti-social Behaviour Orders (ASBOs), there was a need to spread the good practice that already existed in certain areas of the country. To achieve this, the Action Group drew up practical guidance on considering and applying for ASBOs, and also set up a series of seminars as a means of consulting on the draft guidance and of providing an opportunity to hear about, and discuss, the experiences of those who had successfully obtained such orders.

Ten seminars were held in all, in each of the Government Regions in England and Wales, between early March and Easter this year. Following the successful conclusion of the seminars, the Action Group held their final meeting in May to complete their work on the draft guidance. I launched the booklet, "Anti-social Behaviour Orders: Guidance on drawing up Local ASBO Protocols", on 28 June. A copy has been placed in the Library.

I am grateful to my noble Friend Lord Warner and the Action Group for all their work. I hope that the new guidance, which complements the guidance on ASBOs issued in March 1999, will enable the police and local authorities to make effective use of this important tool for dealing with anti-social behaviour.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Women's Unit Consultation

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the policy discussion on the No. 10 website on issues raised by the consultation conducted by the Women's Unit will be launched; how long it will run; and how the information will be treated once the consultation is over. [127249]

Ms Jowell: The No. 10 website will host a policy discussion, on the issues arising from the Listening to Women Consultation, which will open on 3 July and will last between four and five weeks. It will cover issues such as work-life balance; support from Government for women's life choices; business start-ups; access to Information and Communications Technology; and the forthcoming Parental Leave and Maternity Review. A summary of the comments will be posted on the No. 10 website, along with a response statement from the Ministers for Women when the discussion period is over. The website address is www.number-10.gov.uk.

Medical Schools

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many funded places were made available for the training of doctors at medical schools in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) the UK in each of the last five years; and what provision has been made for places in future years. [128319]

Mr. Wicks: The number of funded places made available for the training of doctors at medical schools in the past five years are:

	England	Scotland	Wales	Northern Ireland	UK total
1995–96	3,486	874	169	170	4,699
1996–97	3,594	888	185	166	4,833
1997–98	3,749	934	200	179	5,062
1998–99	3,735	956	200	178	5,069
1999–2000	3,980	923	226	177	5,306

The Government announced in July 1998 that the annual intake of medical students in the UK would be increased over the period to 2005 by about 1,000 places. In England the Higher Education Funding Council for England has announced the allocation of a total of 1,126 additional places. The funding to the Council takes these new places into account. A further increase in the number of medical students is being considered in recognition of the rapid development of services to underpin modernisation of the National Health Service. In Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland these matters are for the devolved Administrations.

Primary School Teachers

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what steps he has taken to increase the number of male primary school teachers; [128291]

(2) what steps he has taken to increase the recruitment of male undergraduates to primary school teacher training. [128292]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government recognise that men are currently under-represented in primary schools and would therefore like to see more qualifying as primary teachers. The trial introduction of £6,000 training salaries for postgraduate primary training may well encourage more applications from men for 2000–01. This will be evaluated. Under-represented groups, including men in the primary sector, will also be a priority target for the new £13,000 grants to schools who accept a trainee on the employment-based Graduate Teacher Programme.

The Teacher Training Agency has asked all providers of initial teacher training to set targets and draw up Action Plans for increasing the numbers of men entering undergraduate and postgraduate courses. Over 90 per cent. have now done so. In addition, more than a quarter of the taster courses funded by the Teacher Training Agency in the period June 2000-August 2001, which are designed to give prospective trainee teachers an insight into what teaching is like, are specifically focused on recruiting men.

School-based Learning Assistants

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding is available to supply the training needs of primary school-based learning assistants; and if he will make a statement. [128746]

Ms Estelle Morris: Between 1999–2002, we are making available to local education authorities in England a total of £350 million to meet the cost of recruiting and training the equivalent of 20,000 new teaching assistants and to support the training of more experienced teaching assistants, so that they may develop their skills and further their careers. Of the allocation which they devolve to schools, local education authorities should pass at least 80 per cent. to primary schools.

Class Sizes

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the average primary class size in Cumbria was in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement. [128285]

In the Cumbria local education authority area, the number of pupils in key stage 1 classes of 31 or more pupils was 854 in January 2000, compared with 2,572 a year earlier. This means that as few as 5.3 per cent. of these pupils remain in classes of over 30 pupils. Allocations of funding in Cumbria to support reductions in infant class sizes have so far amounted to £3.7 million. This funding has helped reduce the average size of key stage 1 classes in the Parliamentary constituency of Carlisle from 27.6 in January 1997, to 25 in January 2000. Over the same time period, the average size of key stage 2 classes in the constituency has fallen from 27.4 to 26.3; and the size of the average primary class from 27.4 to 25.7.

The Government are well on target to deliver their infant class size pledge in England with some £620 million made available to support the pledge. The number of pupils in infant classes of over 30 pupils has already fallen by 300,000.

[3] Not available (information not collected by specific key stages)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of classes of five, six and seven-year-olds in the Crosby constituency have been reduced since 1997. [127173]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information is not available in the form requested. The Department does not identify or monitor individual classes or registration groups.

The Government are well on target to deliver their pledge to limit infant classes to 30 pupils. In Crosby parliamentary constituency, the average size of key stage 1 classes taught by one teacher in maintained primary schools went down from 28.3 pupils per class in January 1997 to 26.2 pupils per class in January 2000. Since January 1997, there were 830 fewer pupils in Crosby schools being educated in key stage 1 classes of 31 or more, which represents a reduction by two-thirds of the number of pupils being educated in such classes.

Inner-city Schools

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent steps his Department has taken to improve standards in inner city schools. [128262]

Ms Estelle Morris: In order to improve standards in inner city schools, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has introduced Excellence in Cities (EiC). This is building on the measures already introduced to raise standards in all schools such as the literacy and numeracy strategies. The programme was launched in March 1999, and initially covered secondary schools in 25 authorities. It expanded in March this year to include a further 22 authorities and a primary pilot in the original EiC authority areas. Total spending for Excellence in Cities will be some £400 million over the first three years of the programme.

As a direct result of the first phase of the programme, there are already:

Some 800 learning mentors appointed and working in schools;

49 City Learning Centres identified—the first to open in the autumn;

Over 200 learning support units established;

Some 100 clusters of schools working together to enhance opportunities for gifted and talented pupils;

42 small Education Action Zones planned, with some already on stream; and 82 Beacon Schools and 25 specialist schools approved.

Phase 2 will see comparable developments in the new EiC partnership areas.

School Places (St. Albans)

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department has taken to help ensure that Hertfordshire Local Education Authority is able to increase the provision of school places in St. Albans to match (a) current needs and (b) future requirements generated by new housing developments; and if he will make a statement. [128143]

Ms Estelle Morris: It is the Local Education Authority's responsibility to ensure that there are sufficient school places within its area. It is under a duty to plan and keep under review the supply of school places, in the light of such issues as proposed housing development, so as to ensure that there is sufficient provision to meet demand.

The Department has supported bids for capital funding from Hertfordshire which met the published criteria for basic need. The Local Education Authority can make further bids for capital funding if need continues to grow. Such bids will be sought from Local Education Authorities in September through the Annual Capital Guideline process.

Teacher Training

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the schools which have been granted funding for teacher training, indicating in each case their (a) phase and (b) location. [128105]

Ms Estelle Morris: Schools that have received grant from the Teacher Training Agency through their involvement in School Centred Initial Teacher Training consortiums are set out in table A. Table B lists the additional schools that will receive grant from September 2000. Many other schools receive funding through various initial teacher training partnership arrangements. The allocation of funds in such cases is decided locally.

Early-years Education

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the additional costs of making early-years education freely available to all three-year-olds; and if he will make a statement. [127505]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 27 June 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 1 March 2000, Official Report, column 314W.

Disabled Access

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of SCOPE's report on disability access entitled "Left Out"; and what action he is taking to encourage employers (a) to comply with the requirements of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and (b) to accept the business case for disabled access. [127597]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The Government have seen a draft copy of the report on SCOPE's Left Out campaign and we will consider it after it is launched on 3 July.

The Government are taking a number of steps to encourage service providers to comply with the requirements of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA) and accept the business case for disabled access. On 29 June 1999, we published a Code of Practice which explains the duties under Part III and gives practical guidance on implementation. On 1 October last year, to coincide with further rights under Part III coming into force, we published an information booklet called "An Introduction for Small and Medium-sized Businesses". This explains the duties businesses and organisations have under Part III.

On 1 October 2004, the final stage of rights under Part III of the DDA will come into force. From then, in addition to their current duties, service providers will have to take reasonable steps to tackle physical features which make it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use a service. On 8 May 2000 the Government and the Disability Rights Commission (DRC) launched a joint consultation exercise on a revised version of the Part III Code, a Practical Guide for service providers and the Government's proposals for a small number of Regulations under the Act. The consultation documents have been sent to a wide range of businesses and organisations. The exercise will last for three months. The DRC will consider the views expressed in the consultation before preparing final versions of the Code and Guide.

The DRC also has a part in encouraging employers to accept the business case for disabled people. Part of the DRC's remit is to be a central source of information and advice on the DDA. Employers and service providers are a key target audience and the DRC's Helpline is currently being promoted to business via advertisements in the regional and trade press. An interactive service is available between 8.00 and 20.00, and a range of leaflets and factsheets on all parts of the DDA is available free of charge. An ordering facility is available 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

Standards Fund

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 22 June 2000, Official Report, column 269W, on the Standards Fund, if he will break down the way in which sums surrendered for the Standards Fund were used. [128065]

Ms Estelle Morris: The sums surrendered for the Standards Fund 2000–01 were mainly used to provide further support for LEAs and schools to achieve the objectives of the specific grants in the programme, in particular Special Educational Needs, National Grid for Learning, and Protecting and Expanding Music Services. In addition, £9 million of the surrendered amount is being used to fund the new Pupil Allowance Scheme, announced on 27 April, for secondary schools in Excellence in Cities areas who accept difficult pupils outside the normal school admission round.

Lone Parents

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many families (a) in Coventry, South, (b) in the West Midlands Region and (c) nationally will benefit from Government measures aimed at helping lone parents balance work and family life. [127245]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 26 June 2000]: We do not yet have information about how many families will benefit as a result of the Work-Life Balance Campaign. This is a general campaign from which everybody stands to benefit: the economy; businesses; society; families, including those headed by lone parents; and individuals.

The New Deal for Lone Parents is a specific measure designed to help those lone parents on Income Support into work. Between October 1998 when the programme was rolled out nationally and the end of March 2000, NDLP has helped 94 lone parents in the Coventry, South constituency into jobs. The figure for the West Midlands Employment Service Region is 4,021 and the figure nationally is 44,640. Taking into account the earlier phases of NDLP the figure is 50,911. The Government have recently announced an expansion to this programme to allow support to be given to more lone parents.

School Funding (Warrington, North)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the primary schools in Warrington, North constituency which have received additional money to reduce class sizes. [127319]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 26 June 2000]: The schools in Warrington, North which have received additional funding as part of the Government's initiative to limit infant classes to 30 pupils are as set out. £620 million is available to support the initiative, and allocations so far to Warrington LEA amount to £2.8 million. This has helped to reduce the size of the average Key Stage 1 class in Warrington, North to 25.9. The figure in January 1997 was 27.5. The number of children in infant classes of 31 or more pupils in the constituency has fallen from 1,450 in January 1997, to 710 in January 2000.

Special Schools (Closures)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many special schools were approved for closure in each year since 1992. [122229]

Jacqui Smith: This information is not held centrally. While the date on which a school actually closes is a matter of public record, the date on which approval to close it was given is much less easy to identify and it has not been possible to obtain consistent information, despite every effort having been made to do so over the past few weeks.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Energy Use

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what mechanisms he uses for monitoring energy use in different sectors of the economy. [127454]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 26 June 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

The Government collect information on energy use in different sectors from a variety of sources, including returns from energy companies themselves. Further information on energy use in different sectors of the economy, including data sources, may be found in the annual Digest of UK Energy Statistics. A copy of the 1999 edition has been placed in the Library. The 2000 edition will be published on 27 July.

Figures showing energy consumption by broad sectors of the economy, on a quarterly basis, are routinely published in the Department's monthly statistical bulletin, "Energy Trends".

Fuel Poverty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress made in partnership with Transco on implementing the affordable warmth programme in advance of next winter. [127573]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

There has been significant progress on Affordable Warmth since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry trailed the scheme in a speech last October. The Government have worked closely with Transco in developing the scheme, and, in particular, have amended the rules on capital allowances to encourage the use of lease financing for domestic central heating equipment which is central to the scheme's operation.

The scheme was formally launched to MPs, local authorities, and the fuel poverty lobby by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 8 June. Transco subsequently presented the scheme to Welsh housing providers in Cardiff on 26 June.

There are two separate aspects to the scheme—the installation of central heating and insulation in the homes of the fuel poor, and the development of training opportunities for those employed through the scheme. On the first of these, Transco have given 175 presentations about the scheme to social housing providers, and planned installations so far include Inverclyde Council (3,500 homes) and Derby City Council (600 homes). Discussions are proceeding with Leicester City Council (3,000 homes). Many more housing providers—including Blaenau Gwent—have expressed interest.

Transco estimate that at least 3,000 homes will be treated by the end of the calendar year 2000, and perhaps many more than that as the scheme gathers momentum. We expect a million homes to be improved under the scheme over the next five years. This will significantly reduce the incidence of fuel poverty.

On the training front, there are already three live projects:

in Leicester, the first Environ Energy Advocates Project course began at the end of May, with six people trained so far and 40 projected by the beginning of December:

the Fenland District Council Central Heating in Partnership Scheme (CHIPS) begins on 1 July, for completion by 1 December, with 50 people to be trained;

the Affordable Warmth team is working in conjunction with the Gas Industry Training Organisation (GINTO) on the competition to create a training framework for adults coming into the gas installation and maintenance business.

Other projects currently under discussion include:

a partnership being developed between Transco and Braunstone's New Deal Task Force, to train 200 members of the community in Affordable Warmth-related skills (10 per cent. through New Deal, 50 Gas Installation Engineers) over a three-year period;

a bid to establish a consortium capable of delivering demand-led gas industry training in the London area (as part of the GINTO adult framework competition), to which Affordable Warmth have been invited to provide some funding.

Further regeneration areas being targeted include Hull and Luton. Transco expect that the scheme will create 10,000 training opportunities, with 3,000 of those becoming fully-qualified gas fitters. It is also expected that 3,000 opportunities will be made available for people under the New Deal.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what work he is carrying out in collaboration with National Energy Action to relieve conditions of fuel poverty in the United Kingdom. [127576]

Mr. Meacher: The Department has supported the work of National Energy Action (NEA) for many years. This year it will be providing grant funding of £736,000 towards NEA's work in England, concentrating on: support to local authorities in developing affordable warmth strategies for their area; identifying how to reach fuel poor households in rural areas; and development of referral networks among ethnic minority communities.

Drink Driving

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of media campaigns in reducing the incidence of drink driving. [124053]

Mr. Hill: Our drink drive media campaigns have aimed to stimulate media and public awareness of the message not to drink and drive. They have also provided a focus for co-ordinated complementary activity by police forces, local authorities and many others in the public and private sectors. Effectiveness is measured on an ongoing basis by:

market research which tracks, each month, advertising recall and changes in attitudes across a range of road safety issues, behaviour change indicators such as proportions failing breath tests and, over the longer term, casualty statistics.

The tables show the reduction in casualties and in the percentage of positive breath tests over recent years.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has (a) been and (b) asked to be provided with information on whether any of the conventional rapeseed grown in the farm-scale evaluations contains genetically modified rapeseed; and if he will place copies of the written information in his possession in that regard in the Library. [126098]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 15 June 2000]: I have been advised that none of the Farm Scale Evaluation sites in England have been planted with the affected batches of Advanta Hyola rapeseeds, but I understand that the evaluation site in Scotland has been.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the statement on 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 475, when the seed purity checks were put in place; how many consignments of GM seeds have been checked to date; to what degree of purity the seeds were tested; and what were the results of the tests. [126855]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 19 June 2000]: My Department has asked the Central Science Laboratory (CSL) to check for GM contamination of imports of oilseed rape and maize, as part of CSL's wider responsibilities for inspection and enforcement relating to GM releases and marketing. CSL are currently compiling data from which an appropriate inspection programme is being developed.

The programme will be in place in good time for the sowing of winter oilseed rape, which CSL will consider as its first priority.

Departmental Cars

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the (a) make, (b) model and (c) number of each make and model of car (i) owned and (ii) leased by his Department; and what is the (1) purchase price and (2) annual cost of the lease on each car. [127396]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Information about the make and model of cars owned or leased by my Department has been placed in the Library of the House. Information about purchase price and lease costs is not held centrally.

Interactive Voice Response Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by interactive voice response systems. [127390]

Ms Beverley Hughes: None of the telephone lines of DETR(c) currently use an Interactive Voice Recognition (IVR) system.

Pursuant to my answer of 22 June 2000, Official Report, column 245W, I have been informed that two of the Department's Agencies—the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA) and the Driving Standards Agency (DSA)—make limited IVR facilities available to callers not using touch-tone telephones. DVLA has 345 telephone lines and DSA has up to 380 lines that have this facility.

I apologise for the error in my previous answer.

Regional Planning Guidance (South East)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much funding was allocated for distributing copies of the draft regional planning guidance for the South East. [127798]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The costs to date met by Government of distributing copies of draft regional planning guidance for the South East have been approximately £3,500 by my Department, and approximately £12,300 incurred by the Government Office for the South East.

Gas Safety Review

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many responses were received to the consultation on the "Gas Safety Review: Options for Change" document; [127972]

(2) if he will list (a) the organisations and (b) the individuals responding. [127982]

Mr. Meacher: In total 664 replies to the Options for Change discussion exercise were received by HSE. These comprise 290 responses to questions raised by the main discussion document, and the associated document Key Issues for Consumers; and 374 responses to questionnaires from consumers in Glasgow and Lambeth, arising from related consultative exercises arranged jointly with local authorities.

A list of the organisations and individuals who responded has been placed in the House of Commons Library, and in HSE's Information Centres in London, Sheffield and Bootle.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make an announcement concerning changes to be implemented following the "Gas Safety Review: Options for Change" document. [127983]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Commission plans to report to Ministers with findings and recommendations during the summer. In the light of that we will make an announcement.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the HSE to reach conclusions on the "Gas Safety Review: Options for Change" document. [127984]

Mr. Meacher: The review is being carried out on behalf of the Health and Safety Commission. HSC is likely to reach conclusions in the summer, before reporting to Ministers.

London Boroughs Central Support Protection Grant

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase the central support protection grant for London boroughs in order to implement the Government's priorities. [127850]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We announced during the debate on this year's Local Government Finance Settlement, on 3 February 2000, Official Report, column 1271, that we intend to use the same central support protection grant arrangements for 2001–02 that we used for this year. These arrangements ensure an increase of at least 1.5 per cent. in grant for London boroughs and other local authorities with education and social service responsibilities.

London Underground

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the performance of driverless trains on the London Underground in relation to attributable delays, with special reference to peak hour traffic; and for what reason not all new rolling stock is equipped for driverless operation. [128041]

Mr. Hill: All London Underground trains have drivers. However, it is true that Automatic Train Operation (ATO) gives improved consistency of performance. ATO is already used on the Victoria line and on parts of the Central line. The driver, however, can always override the system if necessary. There are plans to extend its use on the Central line later this year and ATO for other lines will be considered at times of major upgrade.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the performance of the London Underground Central Line in 1999 in relation to attributable delays, with special reference to the age of rolling stock involved. [128040]

Mr. Hill: New rolling stock was introduced on the Central Line in 1993 and 1994, which incorporated a number of revolutionary new train system developments from which passengers are already benefiting. London Underground are working to remedy particular problems with the final trainborne element of the Automatic Train Operation (ATO) signalling system.

Climate Change

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the Draft Programme on Climate Change on the additional costs which would fall on (a) air conditioning manufacturers and (b) consumers in the United Kingdom from a ban on the use of HFCs; and if he will make a statement on the draft programme's impact on the international competitiveness of UK air conditioning manufacturing. [128039]

Mr. Meacher: No assessment has been made of the additional costs that would fall on air conditioning manufacturers and consumers from a ban on the use of HFCs because the Government have not proposed such a ban.

The draft climate change programme includes a policy statement on HFCs that sends a clear signal to industry and users not to use HFCs where more environmentally acceptable, safe, technically feasible and cost-effective alternatives exist. At the same time we recognise that HFCs are necessary to replace ozone-depleting substances in some applications, and that HFC emissions reduction strategies should not undermine commitments to phase out ozone-depleting substances under the Montreal Protocol.

The Government have made it clear that they aim to put in place a climate change programme that safeguards and enhances UK competitiveness. We recognise the concern business has expressed about the implications of action on climate change for the UK's international competitiveness, but believe that the measures in the draft programme are consistent with that aim.

West Coast Mainline Upgrade

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action his Department is taking to ensure that Railtrack provide the signalling infrastructure, as part of the West Coast Mainline Upgrade, to give the train operating company holding the franchise for the St. Albans Abbey to Watford Junction line the ability to operate through services to London from St. Albans Abbey station. [128142]

Mr. Hill: Trains from St. Albans Abbey can operate at present onto the main line at Watford Junction with special permission, although not for regular services. As part of the current plans for the West Coast Main Line Upgrade a new island platform, which can take eight car trains, will be constructed at Watford Junction to replace platform 11 currently used by St. Albans Abbey trains. The associated new signalling will allow trains to pass to and from the London Euston lines on a regular basis. It would then be a matter for the franchise operator to discuss with interested local stakeholders the need for and viability of through services between London Euston and St. Albans Abbey via Watford Junction.

Seat Belts

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, columns 3–4W, on seat belts, if he will list the Scottish local authorities participating in the public consultation exercise on draft regulations regarding the fitting of seat belts; and if he will make a statement. [127912]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 29 June 2000]: As the proposals concerned the national implementation of European Directive vehicle construction provisions, only those local authorities which had previously expressed a specific interest in the issue were consulted, which included no Scottish authorities.

Housing

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he intends to take to increase housing supply on (a) brownfield and (b) urban sites. [128314]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Planning Policy Guidance note 3: Housing, issued in March, provides guidance on planning for housing. One of its main objectives is to ensure that better use is made of previously developed land and buildings for additional housing, particularly within urban areas. PPG3 has introduced a sequential approach which requires previously developed land and buildings in urban areas to be considered for development in preference to greenfield sites.

Incinerators

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what account he takes of local objections when deciding on planning applications for building incinerators. [128811]

Ms Beverley Hughes: When my right hon. Friend decides any planning application he does so after having looked carefully at all the relevant considerations, including all representations made to him, whether in favour of the proposed development or against it.

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he gives on the desirability of siting waste incinerators near to principal sources of waste where the proposed site is (a) rural and (b) urban; and if he will make a statement. [128810]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Guidance to local authorities is given in Planning Policy Guidance Note 10 (Planning and Waste Management), published in September 1999. This states that the "proximity principle" is one of the key principles on which waste management decisions should be based, namely that waste should generally be managed as near as possible to its place of production, because transporting waste itself has an environmental impact. This holds good equally for rural and urban locations.

The other key principles to be followed in decisions on the siting of waste incinerators are:

consideration of the Best Practicable Environmental Option (BPEO)—the option that provides the most benefits or the least damage to the environment as a whole, at acceptable cost, in the long term as well as the short term; regional self-sufficiency—that most waste should be treated or disposed of in the region in which it is produced; the waste hierarchy—a theoretical framework which acts as a guide to assessing the BPEO in selecting waste management options.

A130

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to integrate the A130 into a second London orbital road; and if he will make a statement. [128617]

Mr. Hill: The A130 forms a major North-South route through Essex linking the towns of Great Dunmow and Chelmsford with South East Essex and Basildon. It carries a substantial volume of traffic, passing through communities with consequent environmental and safety problems for the residents.

The A130 Improvement, South of Chelmsford, is being constructed as a local bypass for some of these communities and to relieve them of the effects of the traffic. It is not intended that this or any length of the A130 should become part of a second London orbital road.

Montreal Convention

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has made in relation to the Montreal Convention to ensure UK passengers will be able to claim compensation for psychiatric injury caused by air accidents; and if he will make a statement. [128317]

Mr. Hill: Damages for mental injury caused by air accidents are already recoverable in the UK when associated with physical injury. In preparation for the Diplomatic Conference held in Montreal in May 1999, at which the Convention was signed, the UK supported a proposal by Sweden for a separate head of claim for mental injury. Prior to the Conference, however, that proposal was withdrawn from the draft text of the Convention. Our position was that a separate claim for mental injury could be advocated only if there was sufficient support to gain global agreement. There was not sufficient support so, in the interest of securing the best deal for the UK, it was decided to support the text of the Convention without a separate reference to mental injury. The Conference "travaux préparatoires", nevertheless, indicate that damages for mental injury can be recovered in certain states and that jurisprudence in this area is developing.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress towards ratification of the Montreal Convention. [128316]

Mr. Hill: Primary legislation in the form of a new Carriage by Air Act is required before the UK can ratify the Montreal Convention. We aim to introduce that legislation as soon as parliamentary time allows. The Convention requires ratification by 30 states before it can come into force. To date, three states have deposited instruments of ratification.

Stations (Crime)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) property and (b) violent crimes were recorded by the British Transport Police at (i) railway stations and (ii) coach and bus stations in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [128303]

Mr. Hill: The British Transport Police (BTP) are responsible for policing the national railway, London Underground and a number of light rail systems. They do not police coach or bus facilities.

The BTP's crime database does not allow the figures for crime locations to be extracted easily and providing the figures for railway stations alone could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The tables include figures for property and violent crime over the last five years on the whole railway network.

Property and violent crime on whole railway network 1994–99

Total	4,159	4,605	4,495	4,231	4,305

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many and what proportion of railway stations have become accredited as secure stations; what standards have to be met to achieve the accreditation; what measures he is taking to ensure more stations are so accredited; and if he will make a statement. [128302]

Mr. Hill: There are currently 61 stations accredited under the Secure Stations Scheme (out of approximately 2,800 stations in Great Britain). The Secure Stations Scheme, which was launched in April 1998, is designed to improve and standardise good security practices at all overground and underground stations. To become an accredited Secure Station, each station operator needs to work with their local British Transport Police Crime Prevention Operator to ensure that their station meets the national standards on design and management to cut down crime. The standards relate to such measures as staff training, Help Points, CCTV, lighting and information. Operators also have to conduct an independent passenger survey to see whether passengers feel safe at the station and provide evidence that crime rates are low.

We are aware that a number of stations are currently working towards accreditation and we are hopeful of having around 100 stations accredited by the end of the year. We will continue to work with the rail industry to encourage further accreditations.

Powershift Programme

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce a decision about Safeway's application for grant funding from the Powershift programme for assistance towards the acquisition of 40 gas powered trucks; and if he will make a statement. [128374]

Mr. Meacher: Safeway's application for grant funding exceeds the £250,000 discretionary cap that may generally be offered by the Powershift programme to a single company. This cap was introduced to ensure that many organisations could benefit from Powershift grants rather than all of the programme's budget being used to support a large order for vehicles from a single company. The cap is discretionary, however, and there will be cases where larger grants can be justified because they will make a significant impact on the market for alternative fuels.

Powershift's advisory panel, comprising officials from my Department, DTI and the Energy Saving Trust, is meeting today to agree the level of grant funding to be offered to Safeway's. The Trust will announce the decision of the panel immediately following this meeting.

Rail Freight Competition

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment was made by the consultants for the sSRA's recent rail freight competition of the viability of the mechanical engineering performance claims and their costs for the three projects that made the final of the competition; and if the consultants highlighted any limitations of use or cost-effectiveness of the winning products; [128373]

(2) which consultancy firm was retained by the shadow Strategic Rail Authority for its recent rail freight competition; and what were the headings of its remit. [128381]

Mr. Hill: The consultants appointed to review the proposals for the sSRA's railfreight competition were Ove Arup and Partners. Their remit was to review the five shortlisted proposals submitted by applicants for the competition and to provide an independent assessment of each proposal using the criteria published by the sSRA.

The consultant's remit did not include any requirement to make an assessment of the viability of the mechanical engineering performance claims for the five shortlisted entries. There was a requirement to review the costs proposed and whether they were realistic and robust for each project. There was also a requirement to examine the applicability of the proposed project to other supply chains. The sSRA subsequently made its own assessment and judged the proposals on value for money criteria.

Cycling

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the funding made available in each year since 1984–85 to each local authority for spending on schemes to encourage cycling; [128378]

(2) how much the Government spent in each year since 1984–85 on schemes to encourage cycling. [128379]

Mr. Hill: This information is not available in the form requested.

As far as local authority schemes are concerned no separate funding is made available to encourage cycling. It is for individual authorities to decide the amount spent on cycling from their overall total allocation of funding.

Between 1991–92 and 1999–2000, local highway authorities received funding for integrated transport packages and minor works, including cycling, as part of the annual local transport capital settlement. From 2000–01 onwards, authorities will receive an integrated capital block allocation each year for all local transport and maintenance purposes except schemes costing more than £5 million, which are funded separately.

The following table gives details of allocations from 1991–92 to 2000–01, from which spending on schemes to encourage cycling could be made.

£ million

Year	Amount available
1991–92	120
1992–93	109
1993–94	125
1994–95	70
1995–96	128
1996–97	118
1997–98	79
1998–99	85
2000–01	250

As to other expenditure the Department funds research into promoting cycling and making it safer. We issue guidance based on the results of research through our Local Transport Notes and Traffic Advisory Leaflets. In addition we are funding the marketing of the National Cycling Strategy and in 1996–97 around £2 million were provided by the Department to fund schemes in the Cycle Challenge project.

M4 Bus Lane

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total cost of producing the video of the M4 bus lane entitled, "The First Three Months"; how many copies of the video were made; and how many have been distributed. [128377]

Mr. Hill: The only publication entitled "The First Three Months" was a leaflet. 10,000 were printed at a cost of £1,419.40 (including VAT). About 9,600 have been distributed since it was first made available at the Earls Court Motor Show held in October 1999.

Air Traffic Control (Software Failure)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the flight data software that failed at West Drayton on Saturday 17 June is no longer in use; and if he will make a statement. [128376]

Mr. Hill: The software version that was withdrawn on 17 June was subjected to analysis and the fault identified. A suitable software remedy was devised and, following thorough testing, the version was restored to the Flight Data Processing System during the quiet hours overnight on 26 to 27 June.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the software failure at West Drayton air traffic control centre on 26 June. [128372]

Mr. Hill: The software failure that occurred at 14.49 hours GMT at the London Area and Terminal Control Centre at West Drayton on 26 June was caused by a flight plan that could not be processed. The system was out of service for only three minutes. NATS has identified the software fault and is in the process of identifying and testing a suitable software remedy. This fault is totally unrelated to the failure on 17 June which was caused by a latent design fault in the flight strip printing system.

Signals Passed at Danger

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on recent incidents of signals passed at danger by trains on lines on the approaches to Paddington Station. [128375]

Mr. Hill: The Health and Safety Executive independently investigates all serious incidents of signals passed at danger (SPADs). They are investigating a number of recent incidents in the Paddington area, and in particular an incident on 16 June when a Thames Trains Turbo passed a signal at danger at Royal Oak. HSE has ensured that the computer tapes from the signal box and from the train's on-board data recorders have been secured as evidence. HSE has also been seeking further assurances from Railtrack regarding the safe working of trains between Slough and Paddington. Following the completion of HSE's inquiries, the results of their investigations will be included in HSE's monthly "signals passed at danger" report to Ministers, copies of which are placed in the House of Commons Library.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans London Underground has developed to cope with the increase in traffic at King's Cross-St. Pancras underground station once Phase II of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link is completed with King's Cross-St. Pancras as its terminus; and if he will place a copy of these plans in the Library. [128371]

Mr. Hill: Improvements to King's Cross-St. Pancras underground station have always been envisaged as part of the works for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link. In January 1999 my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), announced that these improvements were to go ahead and be financed by Government as part of their contribution to the link.

The improvements include two new ticket halls and new passageways at the station which will double its existing capacity and allow it to cope with the expected influx of passengers using Eurostar when the high speed link to the Channel Tunnel opens. They will also meet the requirements of the Fennel report into the King's Cross underground station fire. Construction is due to start later this year and be completed in time for the opening of the full link (currently expected in 2007).

I will arrange for a copy of an outline plan for the new ticket halls to placed in the Library of the House.

Coulsdon Inner Relief Road

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when construction of the A23 Coulsdon Inner Relief Road will commence; [128382]

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's powers in respect of the construction of the Coulsdon Inner Relief Road in 2001. [128295]

Mr. Hill: As from today (3 July), Transport for London is the highway and traffic authority for the A23 which is part of the GLA Road Network. The question of progressing schemes related to GLA roads is a matter for the Mayor and Transport for London.

Rail Safety

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will call for a report from Railtrack on the near head-on crash on the London-Liverpool Street line to Colchester on Sunday 25 June; and if he will make a statement. [128523]

Mr. Hill: Both Railtrack and the Health and Safety Executive's (HSE)'s Railway Inspectorate are carrying out investigations. The results of HSE's investigation will be included in the monthly "signals passed at danger" report to Ministers, copies of which are placed in the House of Commons Library.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

House of Lords Reform

Ann Keen: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on her plans for a joint committee of both Houses to consider the parliamentary aspects of reform of the House of Lords, as set out in the White Paper "Modernising Parliament: Reforming the House of Lords" (Cm 4183). [129008]

Mrs. Beckett: As I confirmed on 19 June, we aim to establish a Joint Committee of both Houses to consider the Parliamentary implications of the Royal Commission on Reform of the House of Lords' proposals for the composition of the second chamber, which the Government have broadly accepted. We intend that it should begin work as soon as possible after the summer recess. We are opening discussions through the usual channels in both Houses on the membership and precise terms of reference.

CABINET OFFICE

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to "The Government's Measures of Success: Output and Performance Analyses", published by HM Treasury on 31 March 1999, pages 116 and 117, if she will state the targets she has set (a) for the percentage of all named day parliamentary questions to be answered substantially by the date specified by the hon. Member and (b) for answering ordinary written parliamentary questions within five days of the date specified by the hon. Member. [127664]

Marjorie Mowlam: We aim to answer all parliamentary questions on time and we will continue to look at ways to improve our performance.

Interactive Voice Response Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many agencies of her Department use interactive voice response systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [127115]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government Car and Despatch Agency, which is the only agency of the Cabinet Office, does not normally deal with members of the general public and does not use interactive voice response systems.

The Central Office of Information is a department and executive agency that reports to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office. It does not itself use interactive voice response systems when dealing with inquires that it receives directly from the general public. However, as part of its Direct Marketing services it employs agents, on behalf of Government clients, who use interactive voice response systems as a backup to live handling of calls.

TREASURY

Internet Purchasing

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he is making to accommodate the increased quantities of letters and parcels containing goods from overseas likely to result from internet purchasing while such letters and parcels are being assessed for VAT and import duties. [126095]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

These are matters for the Post Office and other companies handling such packets to determine in liaison with HM Customs and Excise.

British Telecom

Barbara Follett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Treasury's residual holding of British Telecom plc shares. [129190]

Mr. Andrew Smith: On 27 June 2000, the Treasury sold 11,096,309 ordinary shares in British Telecom plc which it had held following earlier share sales. The shares were sold, via a competitive auction conducted by ABN AMRO Rothschild on the Treasury's behalf, to Schroder Salomon Smith Barney at a price of £9.25¼ per share, generating total proceeds of £102.7 million. The Treasury now retains only a very small number of shares to meet any future appeals for bonus shares arising from the BT2 and BT3 flotations.

Foreign Taxation

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assistance the UK authorities give to (a) French and (b) Belgian tax authorities in the recovery of tax owed by UK citizens to those authorities. [128606]

Dawn Primarolo: There are arrangements for the UK to assist the recovery of tax claims of other countries' tax authorities under EC Directive 76/308 on mutual assistance.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many advisers, dealing with the working families tax credit system, have been trained specifically to deal with employees who as part of their contract receive bonuses in the course of their employment; in what circumstances such bonuses are included for assessment purposes; and how this applies to military personnel. [128520]

Dawn Primarolo: Staff on processing sections and on helplines in the Tax Credits Offices in Great Britain and Northern Ireland are all trained to deal with questions about the income relevant to an application for the Working Families Tax Credit, or to refer such questions to the relevant specialists for advice. Bonuses which are paid as part of normal remuneration, and bonuses which are paid separately from normal remuneration, for example, for periods longer than the normal pay period are included for assessment purposes. This applies equally to bonuses paid to military personnel.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families have benefited from the working families tax credit and by how much (a) nationally, (b) in Teesside and (c) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128510]

Dawn Primarolo: The number of families in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) at the end of April 2000 is provisionally estimated at 1,053,000. 17,100 of these were in Darlington, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Redar and Cleveland and Stockton-on-Tees unitary authorities. I refer my hon. Friend to my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on 28 June 2000, Official Report, column 537W, for the number of WFTC awards in the Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East constituency.

The national average value of awards current at April 2000 is estimated at £73 per week. For the North East region it is estimated at £71 per week. There are too few cases in the 5 per cent. sample of awards used for these analyses to provide reliable estimates of average awards at the local authority or constituency level.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish the Comprehensive Spending Review. [128556]

Mr. Andrew Smith: A date for the 2000 Spending Review is not yet fixed, but it will be in July.

Road Fuel

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the revenue lost in each of the last five years due to road vehicles registered and kept in Northern Ireland purchasing their fuel in the Irish Republic. [128612]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 20 March 2000, Official Report, column 442W.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129059]

Mr. Andrew Smith: There is one Treasury PFI contract for the refurbishment of its main building. The answer to the specific questions are:

(a) Financial close was on 5 May 2000.

(b) Estimated capital spending by the private sector partner is £118 million.

(c) No.

(d) Yes.

Climate Change Levy

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those industry sectors and businesses given (a) full and (b) partial exemption from the climate change levy. [128631]

Mr. Timms: The Government's aim in designing the climate change levy has been to maximise its environmental effectiveness while safeguarding the competitiveness of UK business.

The Government have recognised the case for giving special treatment to energy intensive sectors because of their high energy costs and their exposure to international competition. Those eligible energy intensive sectors which enter into agreements to implement all cost-effective energy saving measures and achieve carbon or emissions targets which meet the Government's criteria will qualify for an 80 per cent. discount from the levy rates.

Sectors which have already agreed indicative energy efficiency targets are Cement; Food and Drink (as represented by the Food and Drink Federation); Glass; Non-ferrous metals; Aluminium; Paper; Chemicals; Foundries; Steel and Ceramics. A number of smaller energy intensive sectors are also involved in negotiations for a sector agreement. Details of the final agreements will be published later in the year.

The Government have also recognised the unique position of horticulture as an energy intensive sector, exposed to international competition but not eligible for a negotiated agreement and benefiting from special treatment in other EU states. Budget 2000 announced a special package of measures for the horticulture sector: targeted support from the climate change levy energy efficiency fund; extending the list of investments qualifying for enhanced capital allowances to include thermal screens; and a temporary 50 per cent. discount on the levy for a period of up to five years while energy efficiency measures take effect.

The Government believe, in line with the view expressed by Lord Marshall, that all businesses should have the incentive to save energy at the margin. For this reason there are no total sectoral exemptions from the levy.

National Insurance

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to inform women who have retained the right to pay the reduced rate of National Insurance contributions of the effect this will have on their future benefit entitlement. [128598]

Dawn Primarolo: A publicity exercise will be undertaken later this year. It will be aimed at all women who hold a valid election to pay National Insurance contributions at the reduced rate.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if women who have not revoked their right to pay reduced rate National Insurance contributions (a) are entitled to receive credits on submission of medical certificates if they are too ill to work and (b) can pay voluntary Class 3 contributions for retirement pension for recent gaps in their national contribution record. [128600]

Dawn Primarolo: Women with a valid election to pay National Insurance contributions at the married womens' reduced rate are not entitled to receive National Insurance credits and they cannot pay voluntary Class 3 contributions.

Married Couple's Allowance

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of administering the married couple's allowance per recipient married couple in financial year 1999–2000; what estimate he has made of administering the married couple's allowance per recipient married couple for those born before 6 April 1935 in financial year 2000–01; what estimate he has made of administering the married couple's allowance per recipient married couple for those aged over 75 in financial year 2000–01; and if he will make a statement. [128601]

Dawn Primarolo: The administration of the married couple's allowance is part of the Inland Revenue's routine work and is not separately identified in running costs.

Children's Tax Credit

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers he estimates will receive less than the full amount of Children's Tax Credit due to having a taxable income less than the maximum amount of Children's Tax Credit in the next three years; and if he will make a statement. [128602]

Dawn Primarolo: The Children's Tax Credit (CTC) will benefit about 5 million families and will take out about half a million of them out of tax altogether. CTC is one of a range of measures to focus resources on families with children and reduce child poverty. We have also increased child benefit to record levels and have introduced the Working Families Tax Credit, which has already benefited over 1 million low income families.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of taxpayers who will receive Children's Tax Credit at less than the full rate in the next three years; and if he will make a statement. [128603]

Dawn Primarolo: The Children's Tax Credit (CTC) will benefit about 5 million families. So that it is focused on low to middle income families, if there is higher rate taxpayer in the family, the credit (£442) is gradually withdrawn at the rate of £1 of credit for each £15 of income. CTC is one of a range of measures to focus resources on families with children and reduce child poverty. We have also increased child benefit to record levels and have introduced the Working Families Tax Credit, which has already benefited over 1 million low income families.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost of administering the taper element to the Children's Tax Credit in the financial year 2000–01; and if he will make a statement. [128604]

Dawn Primarolo: The administration of the taper element of the Children's Tax Credit is part of the Inland Revenue's routine work and is not separately identified in running costs.

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff in the Inland Revenue were employed in administering the (a) married couple's allowance and (b) additional personal allowance in each of the last five years; and how many he expects will be employed in administering the Children's Tax Credit in (i) the current year and (ii) each of the following three years. [128610]

Dawn Primarolo: The administration of the married couple's allowance, additional personal allowance and Children's Tax Credit is part of the Inland Revenue's routine work and is not separately identified in running costs. Staff are not exclusively employed on administering any of these allowances.

Pensioners

Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what level of income (a) single pensioners and (b) pensioner couples started paying income tax in financial years (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98, (iii) 1998–99 and (iv) 1999–2000. [128359]

Dawn Primarolo: An individual's income tax liability depends on the levels of income of different types that he or she receives and the tax reliefs due. A husband and wife are each taxed on their individual income.

The personal and married couple's allowances available to individuals aged 65 and over in each of those years are set out in the table:

	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
For those aged 65–74
Personal allowance	4,910	5,220	5,410	5,720
Married couple's allowance[3]	[1]3,115	[1]3,185	[1]3,305	[2]5,125
For those aged 75 and over
Personal allowance	5,090	5,400	5,600	5,980
Married couple's allowance[4]	[1]3,155	[1]3,225	[1]3,345	[2]5,195
Income limit	15,200	15,600	16,200	16,800

[2] Relief available at 10 per cent.

[3] This allowance is given if one of the spouses is aged 65–74 for the year in question.

Note:

The age-related element of the personal allowance is reduced by £1 for every £2 of income over the income limit until the personal allowance for someone under 65 is reached. The age-related element of the married couple's allowance is reduced in the same way until the allowance for those aged under 65 is reached.

Sanitary Protection Products

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with retailers on the rates of VAT charged on (a) sanitary protection products and (b) incontinence pads. [128492]

Dawn Primarolo: The VAT rate on sanitary protection products is being reduced to 5 per cent. from 1 January 2001. Customs are consulting a number of retailers, manufacturers, wholesalers and their representatives, many of which sell both products, about the implementation of this change. There is also open consultation via the internet.

Tobacco

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total revenue to the Exchequer was from all tobacco products for the last five year period for which figures are available; and what estimate he has made of the tax take from these sources over the next three years. [R] [128496]

Dawn Primarolo: The receipts from all tobacco products for the last five years are published in the National Statistics publication "Financial Statistics".

A forecast of receipts from all tobacco products was published in "The Financial Statement and Budget Report" in March 2000.

Savings (Taxation)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects an agreement to be reached by the Council of Ministers on the substantive content of the Directive on the taxation of savings. [128445]

Dawn Primarolo: The European Council has endorsed the report on the tax package by the ECOFIN Council and agreed on its principles and guidelines. This is an excellent agreement for Britain and for Europe; and it shows once again how the strategy of positive engagement in Europe both protects and indeed enhances the country's national interest. ECOFIN's report of 20 June on the Tax Package has been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

Environment

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the annual amount of public subsidies which encourage the use of environmentally damaging goods and services, as defined by the 3 report of the British Government Panel on Sustainable Development 1997. [128097]

Mr. Andrew Smith: At present there is too much uncertainty as to the values appropriate in many specific instances for any meaningful calculation of the total of such implicit subsidies to be possible.

Single Currency

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money has been spent by the European Union on the changeover to the euro to date; and what has been the cost of the information campaign. [128112]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information on changeover planning in the first wave is contained in the Second Outline National Changeover Plan, published on 9 March 2000.

Public Service Agreements

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if public service agreement targets will be set for each indicator in the publication "Quality of Life Counts". [128099]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The indicators in "Quality of Life Counts" will be an important benchmark against which progress in key areas of sustainable development can be assessed. The Government will publish new Public Service Agreements as part of the outcome of the 2000 Spending Review in July. These PSAs will include targets for improvement in many of the areas contributing to progress against the indicators in "Quality of Life Counts". Some of the wider indicators may be more appropriately related to departmental aims and objectives.

Pensioners (Taxation)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) the pre-tax income and (b) the taxable income needed by a married couple aged 65 with full basic state retirement pension and extra pension paid to one person (i) with and (ii) without an individual's tax allowance of dividend income, which would be required to incur an income tax liability of £5,000 in (A) this financial year, (B) 2001–02 and (C) in each of the last four financial years. [128114]

Dawn Primarolo: An individual's income tax liability depends on the levels of income of different types that he or she receives and the tax reliefs due. A husband and wife are each taxed on their individual income.

Dividends paid on or after 6 April 1999 are taxed at 10 per cent. below the basic rate limit and carry a tax credit of 10 per cent. which meets that liability. From 1996–97 to that date, they were taxed at the lower rate of 20 per cent., with a 20 per cent. tax credit.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

"The Judge Over Your Shoulder"

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Solicitor-General what the date was of publication of the last edition of "The Judge Over Your Shoulder"; what plans he has to update it; if he will place a copy of the most up to date edition in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [128929]

The Solicitor-General: A third edition of "The Judge Over Your Shoulder" was published in March 2000. There are two versions: one essentially for administrators, and the other for lawyers.

I am arranging for a copy of each version to be placed in the Library. They are also on the Treasury Solicitor's internet website.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Solicitor-General which companies or partnerships have seconded staff to the Law Officers' Departments since May 1997; how many staff have been seconded; and who pays for seconded staff. [128470]

The Solicitor-General: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the civil service and other organisations. Before an Interchange can occur, all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

Since May 1997, there have been no secondments of staff from outside the civil service to either the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers or the Treasury Solicitor's Department.

Since May 1997, there have been four staff on secondment to the Serious Fraud Office. Two of the secondments had begun before May 1997. KPMG, Hacker Young, Pannell Kerr Foster (all accountancy firms) and Allen and Overy (a firm of solicitors) each sent one of their staff on secondment. The Serious Fraud Office bore all the cost of the staff member seconded from Allen and Overy and in the other cases made a major contribution to the cost.

One person has been seconded to the Crown Prosecution Service from the Royal Bank of Scotland for a period of three weeks. The Royal Bank of Scotland bore the cost of this secondment.

PRIME MINISTER

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Field: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to appoint persons with earnings below half average earnings as (a) members and (b) advisers to the Social Exclusion Unit. [128050]

The Prime Minister: The Social Exclusion Unit is staffed by a mixture of civil servants and external secondees. They come from a number of Government Departments and organisations with experience of tackling social exclusion. The members of the Unit range from New Dealers to an assistant Director of a local authority. Their previous earnings are not a factor in their appointment.

Advisers to the Unit are on secondment, and are not paid for by the Unit. They are appointed for their expertise and experience.

Bilderberg Conference

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister which Ministers attended the session of the Bilderberg Conference in Sintra entitled, How Durable is the Current Rosy Complexion of European Politics; and what (a) written and (b) oral report of the Bilderberg Conference was submitted to him. [128134]

The Prime Minister: So far as I am aware, no Minister attended this conference.

Kosovo

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what recent estimate he has made of the number of war crime murders committed in Kosovo, broken down by ethnic origin of victims (a) before NATO intervention, (b) after NATO air strikes commenced and (c) after the insertion of KFOR. [128108]

The Prime Minister: The Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and the International Criminal Tribunal for Former-Yugoslavia estimate that 10,000 Kosovar Albanians were killed in Kosovo between June 1998 and 12 June 1999. We broadly share this assessment. Of these we estimate 500 were killed before 20 March 1999. KFOR states 430 murders were committed in Kosovo between 12 June and 31 December 1999 across all ethnic communities. There are no official figures for this year, but estimates suggest six murders per week are committed in Kosovo.

Voluntary Sector (Islington)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Prime Minister what representations the Social Exclusion Unit has received on the effects of local authority cuts on the voluntary sector in Islington; and if he will make a statement. [127893]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 June 2000]: The Social Exclusion Unit has to date received no direct representations about the effects of local authority cuts on the voluntary sector in Islington.

Vladimir Gusinsky

Mr. Maude: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he made to President Putin over the arrest of Vladimir Gusinsky. [128289]

The Prime Minister: We are following Mr. Gusinsky's case closely and have raised it with the Russian authorities on a number of occasions, to establish more details and to make them aware of the concerns the case has raised in the UK over media freedoms. We have also made it clear that if there is a case to answer it is important the due legal process is observed and that the judicial process is seen to be wholly independent.

Intelligence and Security Services

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the Commissioner appointed under the Intelligence Services Act 1994 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement. [129290]

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith's annual report for 1999 has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 8(6) of the Intelligence Services Act 1994. The confidential annex to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 8(7) of the 1994 Act.

Lord Justice Stuart-Smith has served as Commissioner under the Intelligence Services Act since the role was created in 1994. This is his last report. I am very grateful to him for all his work as Commissioner.

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the Commissioner appointed under the Security Service Act 1989 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement. [129291]

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith's annual report for 1999 has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 4(6) of the Security Service Act 1989. The confidential annex to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 4(7) of the 1989 Act and in line with the Commissioner's recommendation.

Lord Justice Stuart-Smith has served as Commissioner under the Security Service Act since the role was created in 1989. This is his last report. I am very grateful to him for all his work as Commissioner.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the Commissioner appointed under section 8(1) of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement. [129292]

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Nolan's report for 1999 has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 8(7) of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. The confidential annex to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 8(8) of the 1985 Act and in accordance with the Commissioner's recommendations.

Lord Nolan has served as Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act since April 1994. This is his last report. I am very grateful to him for all his work as Commissioner.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Hatching Eggs

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the decision by the European Commission to decrease the export refunds for hatching eggs. [126821]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 19 June 2000]: The small change to the export refund for hatching eggs introduced in May was in response to a reduction in the euro/dollar exchange rate. To ignore such currency movements when considering export subsidies would be a breach of WTO requirements and would not represent effective use of EU funds.

GM Seed

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has received on the lowest percentage of GM contamination that can be practically tested for in ostensibly GM-free seed supplies. [126861]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 19 June 2000]: I am aware of possible analytical techniques which could be employed for detecting the presence of GM material in non-GM seeds, but have not received specific advice on the lowest level of GM contamination which can be reliably identified in non-GM seed. This question is being considered in the context of the on-going discussions taking place within the EC and the OECD on the methods of detection of GM seeds in non-GM seed.

Beef on the Bone

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice his Department gave on the prosecution of Christopher Bowman for selling beef on the bone. [126909]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 20 June 2000]: The prosecution of Mr. Bowman was conducted by North Yorkshire County Council. The role of my Department in the case, therefore, was simply to supply evidence not advice.

Meat Marketing

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of EU funds provided for the promotion and marketing of high-quality beef and veal was spent in Scotland in 1999–2000. [127696]

Ms Quin: In 1999–2000, the UK's allocation of EU funds for the promotion of quality beef and veal was £968,000. Of this, £168,000 (17 per cent.) was spent on promoting and marketing quality beef and veal in Scotland.

Factortame Case

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how he intends to meet expenditure relating to payments of claims following judgment against the UK in the Factortame case. [129296]

Mr. Nick Brown: Parliamentary approval to expenditure arising from the Factortame case is being sought in the Main Estimate for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Class X, Vote 2). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £9.735 million is being met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Day-old Chicks

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 3 February 2000, Official Report, column 721W, on day-old chicks, if he will list each of the countries within and outside the EU from which day-old chicks were imported in 1999, and the numbers imported from each country. [113186]

Ms Quin [pursuant to her reply, 8 March 2000, c. 721–22W]: The figures for the number of day-old chicks imported into the United Kingdom from the European Union (EU) in 1999, contained several inaccuracies. The table should read as follows:

Thousand

1999	Number of chicks imported

Austria	9
Belgium	45
Germany	100
Denmark	411
France	3,103
Republic of Ireland	1,464

JC2000

Mr. Rowe: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what plans the Church of England has for monitoring the schools that participated in JC2000. [128076]

Mr. Stuart Bell: There is no formal church mechanism for monitoring schools which have taken part in JC2000, but I am very glad that thousands of schools did join in.

The hon. Member is to be congratulated on the success of JC2000 which, as a member of the Committee, I am delighted to be associated with. JC2000 has been one of the most significant pieces of Christian input into the Millennium celebrations across the country. The pupils and teachers involved clearly enjoyed the project and I have no doubt that taking part has affected many young people's understanding of the Christian nature of this Millennium year.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Index of Local Deprivation

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will release the full underlying data set to be used in compiling the new Index of Local Deprivation. [127560]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The current review of the Index of Local Deprivation is on-going. This final index will include local authority district level scores and ranks. The scores and ranks at the ward level will be published at the same time and will be available for each domain of deprivation. The summary report will contain details about where to obtain, sometimes at a charge, the underlying data used to construct the 33 indicators.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he plans to make an announcement about the new Index of Local Deprivation before 30 July. [127562]

Ms Beverley Hughes: An announcement will be made to the House about the new Index of Deprivation as soon as the Government have completed their consideration of the responses to the consultation.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department will establish a comprehensive academic peer review of the new Index of Local Deprivation specifically to consider the methodological basis of the proposals. [127561]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The 1999 Review of the Index of Local Deprivation is being carried out by the University of Oxford. In addition to the review being overseen by an inter-department steering committee, the University of Oxford has consulted an advisory panel (with over 40 members) throughout the review. The advisory panel has consisted of a large number of peer academics both inside and outside of the University of Oxford, as well as local authority officials, research professionals and others.

The University of Oxford has also facilitated extensive consultation throughout the 1999 Review. Respondents to the consultation have included other government departments, local authorities, research organisations, academics and other organisations.

London Underground

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent assessment he has made of the accuracy of London Underground's statistics on attributable delays; and if he will make a statement. [128042]

Mr. Hill: I am assured that the methodology and data used by London Underground Ltd. (LUL) to measure attributable delays are reliable. Attribution is undertaken by experienced operating representatives with the corroboration of their engineering counterparts. LUL have a vested interest in getting attribution right since analysis of such information is a vital tool in identifying causes of delays and monitoring the success of remedial action taken to prevent them.

Motorcycles

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many motorcycles are registered in each (a) constituency and (b) local authority area. [128031]

Mr. Hill: The DETR receives data on the number of licensed vehicles from the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency every quarter. The data are comprehensive enough to enable detailed geographical breakdowns, and data for each local authority area are attached. Sufficient information is not available to produce the data for constituencies.

All vehicles with a motor cycle, scooter or moped body type classification are included. The most recent published data are for end of December 1998. Data for 1999 will be published in Vehicle Licensing Statistics on July 20.

Environment Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the outcome of the Environment Council held in Luxembourg on 22 and 23 June; and if he will make a statement. [128030]

Mr. Meacher: I represented the UK at the Environment Council in Luxembourg on 22 June 2000, accompanied by Sarah Boyack, Scottish Executive Minister for Environment and Transport. Political agreement was reached on two proposals, along with one set of Council Conclusions.

Agreement was reached on two important air quality measures which will deliver significant reductions in transboundary pollutants contributing to problems of acidification and ground level ozone (summer-time smog) throughout the European Union. The first, the National Emissions Ceilings Directive, sets national emission ceilings for 2010 on four air pollutants (sulphur dioxide, oxides of nitrogen, volatile organic compounds and ammonia). I agreed to ceilings of 585, 1,167, 1,200 and 297 thousand tonnes respectively for each of the pollutants. A second common position, on an amendment of the 1988 Large Combustion Plants Directive, sets stricter limit values for emissions of oxides of nitrogen, sulphur dioxide and dust from new plant. For existing (pre-1988) plant, limit values will need to be applied from 2008, or equivalent overall reductions achieved through a National Emissions Plan. However, plant with less than 20,000 hours operating life remaining on 1 January 2008 may be exempted. This agreement will see a reduction in acidifying emissions, while flexibility for industry, particularly the power sector, is safeguarded.

In advance of the Sixth Conference of Parties to the Framework Convention on Climate Change, due to take place at The Hague in November, Council Conclusions were agreed setting out the EU position on some of the key issues. Ministers agreed that eligibility for the Clean Development Mechanism should be on the basis of a positive list of safe environmentally sound projects, which excluded nuclear, and that the use of carbon sinks such as forests should not be extended, unless concerns about their scale, scientific and other uncertainties were addressed. The Conclusions also welcomed a Commission communication on a proposed European Climate Change Programme, and its Green Paper on Emissions Trading.

The Presidency gave brief progress reports on proposals to promote sustainable urban development and to establish a priority list of dangerous substances of European significance whose release to the aquatic environment should be controlled. The Presidency also summarised the environmental legislation adopted under the co-decision procedure during the last six months, and highlighted the increasing importance of this procedure in the Presidency' work. Final outcomes were agreed on six dossiers: a Decision to monitor the CO_2 emissions from new passenger cars; a Regulation controlling substances that deplete the ozone layer; a Directive amending Directive 74/150/EEC limiting gaseous and particulate pollutants by agricultural tractors; a Directive limiting noise emission by equipment used outdoors; a Directive on end of life vehicles; and the third EU LIFE Regulation.

The Commission reported on the progress of a new Community strategy for chemicals, expected by the end of 2000 and a draft new framework for environmental state aids, on which there was a brief exchange of views between Member States. The Commission also gave a report on the progress towards completing risk assessments for brominated flame retardants, based on work carried out by the UK.

The Commission presented two recently published proposals: one for a Directive on renewable energy, the other for a Directive ensuring proper treatment and disposal of waste from electrical and electronic equipment. Presentations were also given to Council on forthcoming proposals to integrate environmental consideration into public procurement rules and to update the 1991 Directive on batteries and accumulators containing dangerous substances.

On a Danish point under Any Other Business, the Commission noted that it would be meeting an umbrella grouping of NGOs on 12 July to discuss their participation in the EU standardisation process. The Council also noted an Austrian intervention calling for a ban of tributyltin (TBT) in products with which human beings come into contact, following traces of TBT and other organotin compounds being found in nappies in Germany.

SERPLAN

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions took place between his Department's (a) Ministers and (b) officials and members of SERPLAN prior to the vote by SERPLAN on house-building in the South-East on 12 June; and if he will list the members of SERPLAN involved in each case. [128163]

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and I held a meeting with members of SERPLAN on 24 May 2000. 22 planning authorities from across the region attended. Throughout the consultation there have been a number of meetings with a wide range of interest groups including economic partnerships and environmental groups, some of which would have included members of SERPLAN.

Abandoned Vehicles

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he will be taking to monitor the (a) number of abandoned vehicles on public highways and private property and (b) cost to individual local authorities of removing abandoned vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [128465]

Mr. Hill: There are no plans at present to maintain official records of such cases. The existing arrangements with local authorities will be reviewed as we develop proposals for implementing the proposed European End-of-Life Vehicles Directive in the UK.

Tenant Compacts

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made on the establishment of tenant compacts; and if he will make a statement. [128340]

Mr. Raynsford: Local housing authorities are expected to introduce tenant participation compacts from 1 April 2000. I have myself witnessed the signing of these compacts in recent months. We have recently commissioned a major policy evaluation programme of research to look at how best value in housing and compacts are being introduced and developed across the country. The project is expected to run for three to five years; the initial findings will feed into policy development on these issues and will be available next year.

SSA (Lincoln)

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) by what date he requires the population data for Lincoln, in order to calculate the standard spending assessment for the coming three financial years; and if he will make a statement; [128366]

(2) what progress the Office for National Statistics has made in assessing the impact of internal migration on the population in Lincoln, with special reference to the requirements of the standard spending assessment for the coming three years. [128338]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The method of revenue grant distribution in future years depends on the outcome of the review of revenue grant distribution now taking place. A Green Paper will be published later this summer setting out options for revenue grant distribution. This follows open and lengthy discussions between representatives of local and central government.

Grants for 2001–02 will be based on the existing standard spending assessment (SSA) system. We announced in the White Paper "Modern Local Government—In Touch With The People", that during the review we intended to keep up to date the data on which grants are based. This would mean that grants for 2001–02 would use the Registrar General's estimates of population at 30 June 1999. These data should be available by 3 October 2000, the deadline for most data for use in the 2000–01 SSA calculations.

The Registrar General continually looks for ways of improving his population estimates. I understand that his estimates for 30 June 1999, due to be published in August, will incorporate improvements to the internal migration component of the estimates that have been discussed with local government and other experts. The estimates will include new migration estimates for the previous year based on the new data source. This increases the population estimate for Lincoln for mid-1998 by over 200. I am aware that this matter and others have been the subject of recent correspondence between the council and the Office for National Statistics. The council had been concerned that the improvements would not be made until information from the 2001 census was available. The Registrar General does not intend to wait until then.

Houses in Multiple Occupation

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received from Lancaster City Council about amending the compulsory licensing scheme for houses in multiple occupation operating in Morecambe. [128355]

Mr. Raynsford: None, though we are aware that the City Council have been considering various aspects of their current registration scheme.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many houses in multiple occupation there are in Morecambe and Lunesdale. [128356]

Mr. Raynsford: Based on the information given to my Department by Lancaster City Council in July 1999, there are 1,800 houses in multiple occupation in the local authority area.

Social Housing

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much additional funding has been allocated by the Government to Lancaster City Council for improving the quality of social housing since 1 May 1997. [128354]

Mr. Raynsford: The capital allocations for housing investment made to Lancaster City Council since 1997–98 are given in the table. The additional resources we have made available for housing investment were mainly distributed through the Capital Receipts Initiative in the years up to 1999–2000. In 2000–01 the extra resources were included in the Housing Investment Programme (HIP) allocation following the introduction of the single housing capital pot.

Climate Change

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in consultation with industry to implement the three proposals to reduce or minimise HFC use, as set out at paragraph 67, page 79, of the draft UK climate change programme. [128450]

Mr. Meacher: The consultation on the draft climate change programme ended on 2 June and we are currently analysing the responses made. Once this exercise has been completed we will begin to develop these proposals further in consultation with industry.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from industry in respect of the new policy on reduced dependence on HFC use, as set out in paragraphs 17 to 20 in the draft UK Climate Change Programme. [128449]

Mr. Meacher: The Government have received over 100 responses to the consultation on the draft climate change programme on HFCs. These responses are currently being analysed and the final climate change programme, which will be published later this year, will take account of the issues raised during the consultation.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will increase the Housing Corporation's approved development spending for rural areas. [128894]

Mr. Raynsford: Decisions on the future level of the Housing Corporation's approved development programme spending will depend on the outcome of this year's spending review. The Government's future policy on rural housing will be set out in the forthcoming Rural White Paper.

Raptors

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his estimate is of the number of raptors of each species (a) breeding and (b) resident in England. [128825]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 3 July 2000]: A Raptor Working Group was set up in 1995 to consider issues arising from perceived conflicts between the recovery of some bird of prey populations and their impact on game birds and moorland management and on racing pigeons. Earlier this year, the group submitted its final report, which includes estimates of raptor population sizes. The figures are taken from the report and show the best estimates of sizes of breeding population for birds of prey in England using data and information, where possible, from published sources. The total number of birds of prey will be greater than these estimates in the post-breeding season owing to the number of fledged young and other non-breeding individuals.

Copies of the report have been deposited in the House Library.

South Downs National Park

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the provisional timetable for the establishment of a South Downs National Park. [129115]

Mr. Meacher: The Countryside Agency is responsible for designating National Parks, subject to the confirmation of a designation order in each case by the Secretary of State. The agency currently estimates that a designation order for a National Park in the South Downs might be submitted to the Secretary of State in spring 2002. This timetable reflects the significant tasks to be addressed, including the identification of a boundary and making recommendations on the most effective administrative arrangements. The agency will be consulting local interests extensively on these matters.

Advantage West Midlands

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Chief Executive of Advantage West Midlands. [129037]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I understand that, with effect from Friday 30 June, the contract of Advantage West Midlands' Chief Executive, Tony Cassidy, was ended by mutual consent.

Advantage West Midlands will now seek to recruit a replacement. I am informed that in the meantime, the post will be filled on a temporary basis by John Edwards, regeneration director of Advantage West Midlands, and previously Chief Executive of the Rural Development Commission.

Correspondence

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the hon. Member for Broxbourne will receive a reply to her letters of (a) 8 March, (b) 6 April, (c) 5 May, (d) 1 June and (e) 29 June relating to her constituent Miss Haley Cresswell. [128918]

Mr. Raynsford: My reply was sent on 29 June. I am sorry the hon. Member had to wait so long for this reply. The correspondence raised issues of wider concern.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what monitoring his Department undertakes of Private Finance Initiative contracts undertaken by local government; and if he will make a statement. [129205]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Following endorsement by the inter-departmental Project Review Group, progress on prospective schemes is monitored to ensure that the final contract conforms with the approved business case. Following contract signature, the Department will be notified of when service payments commence. Payments and grant paid to the local authority are then monitored and subsequently audited by the Audit Commission. It is important that lessons are learnt from existing contracts. All authorities are required to share non-commercial documentation with other local authorities procuring similar projects, and lessons are used in the production of standardised contract documentation and other best-practice guidance.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the Government's response to the consultation on proposals for a Quality Assurance programme for combined heat and power. [129295]

Mr. Meacher: I announced the key decisions on the proposals following consultation in my statement to the House on 17 May. I have today placed the Government's full response to the consultation in the Library of the House. It will also be available on the DETR and CHPQA websites, and printed copies of the response are being sent to all those who commented on the CHPQA proposals.

I am grateful to those who responded to the consultation, and for the valuable contribution from CHP users and suppliers and other interested parties. CHPQA has been designed to assure and improve the quality of CHP and stimulate CHP growth.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Arms Dealing

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on actions taken following the finding of a cache of arms in Antwerp in February 1999, in respect of the UK companies involved; what prosecutions have occurred; and what measures have been enforced to prevent repetition of similar arms dealing. [128111]

Mr. Hain: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set out in answer to a similar question from the hon. Gentleman on 14 July 1999, Official Report, columns 239–40W, we have no information on the seizure of an arms consignment in February 1999 in Antwerp. But we are aware that a shipment of goods originating in Germany, destined for Eritrea, was seized by Belgian Customs authorities in Antwerp in August 1998. The matter remains with the Belgian courts. No charges have been brought as yet.

A resumption of fighting between Ethiopia and Eritrea on 12 May led to the adoption of UN Resolution 1298 on 18 May, co-sponsored by the UK, imposing on both countries a mandatory arms embargo and a ban on the provision of related technical assistance or training.

Step Change Project

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to [illegible] answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 308W, on the Step Change Project, if he will list the membership of the Ministerial Group for European Co-ordination and make a statement on MINECOR's activities. [128779]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The Ministerial Group for European Co-ordination works to achieve greater co-ordination of the presentation of Her Majesty's Government's European policies in the UK and overseas, and monitors the Government's efforts to develop closer co-operation with the EU partners/applicants.

A list of current members of MINECOR has been deposited in the Library. The devolved administrations are also represented at MINECOR.

North Moluccas

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning attacks by Jihad warriors on the village of Duma, North Moluccas and on the number of casualties which resulted. [128856]

Mr. Battle: We understand that between 100 and 158 people were killed and over 200 injured in the raid on the village of Duma on 19 June. The media reported that large numbers of armed extremists attacked the village, shooting at random and burning over 300 homes. The Regional Military Commander subsequently ordered the security forces to secure the area. On 26 June, President Wahid declared a state of civil emergency in Maluku; since then the situation appears to be calmer.

Qualified Majority Voting

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 43W, on QMV, if he will place the UK Government's written contribution to the meeting on 2 May in the Library. [128169]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 3 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 12 June 2000, Official Report, column 441W.

EU Co-operation

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of reinforced co-operation on EU matters; [128120]

(2) what position the United Kingdom has taken in the IGC discussions on the issue of extending qualified majority voting to EU participation in the work of the WTO as set out in document CONFER 4780/00. [128129]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The Government's position is clearly set out in the White Paper "IGC: Reform for Enlargement".

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what position the United Kingdom has taken in the IGC discussions on the issue of creating new specific legal bases for the areas covered by Article 308, as set out in the document CONFER 4780/00. [128130]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 3 July 2000]: As the Government have made clear, this IGC is about reform for enlargement of the EU. In this context, we are sceptical about the need to look at specific legal bases for areas covered under Article 308.

Kosovo

Miss Begg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the supply of demining equipment to non-Governmental organisations in Kosovo. [129387]

Mr. Vaz: We have approved the export to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) of protective body armour to Danish Church Aid and European Landmine Solutions, organisations engaged in humanitarian demining activities on behalf of the United Nations Interim Administration in Kosovo (UNMIK).

These goods are on the Military List. UN Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 1160 (1998) prohibits the supply of arms and related material to the FRY. However UNSCR 1244 (1999), provides for the sale or supply or arms or related material for use by the international civil and security presence in Kosovo. We have notified the UN FRY Sanctions Committee of this export and they have raised no objection. The export of this equipment underlines UK support both for the peaceful reconstruction of Kosovo and the work of the UN Mines Action Programme.

WALES

Dairy Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning difficulties in the dairy industry; and if he will make a statement. [126971]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary on a weekly basis and we discuss a wide range of issues including the dairy industry. Recently we have welcomed the removal of dairy hygiene charges in England and Wales, and at the Prime Minister's Agriculture Summit at the end of March some £2.3 million extra agri-monetary compensation was awarded to Welsh dairy farmers.

Interactive Voice Response Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many departmental telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by interactive voice response systems. [127403]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department does not use interactive voice response systems on any of its telephone lines.

Nuclear Submarines (Berths)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent consultations he has had with the Ministry of Defence over the use of Welsh ports as emergency Z-berths for nuclear submarines. [127577]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Ministry of Defence does not have, nor does it plan to have, any emergency Z-berths in Welsh ports.

Fisheries

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of angler-caught (a) salmon, (b) grilse and (c) sea trout caught in Wales in each of the last five years; and what his estimate is of the number of each of these categories of fish taken by seals in Welsh waters in each of these years. [128855]

Mr. Paul Murphy: [holding answer 3 July 2000]: In Wales in the last five years the number of angler-caught (a) salmon, (b) grilse and (c) sea trout were:

Declared rod catch of sea trout from Welsh rivers, 1995–99

	Number
1995	10,754
1996	13,123
1997	13,914
1998	24,401
1999	24,629

Estimated number of grilse and MSW (multi sea wintering) salmon (corrected for under-reporting at a 10 per cent. increase) in Welsh rod catch, 1995–99

	Salmon (MSW)	Grilse
1995	1,491	3,070
1996	2,287	3,728
1997	1,119	2,865
1999	1,065	2,339

An estimated 40 per cent. of salmon and 50 per cent. of sea trout are returned (1999 figures) by Welsh anglers. Official statistics and estimates of fish taken by seals are not maintained.

Responsibility for fisheries was transferred to the National Assembly for Wales from 1 July 1999 within the 12 nautical miles of fishing water surrounding the coast, as defined by the Government of Wales Act 1998.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129094]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department has 42 full-time staff and one part-timer. One member of staff has been recruited from the New Deal, representing 2.35 per cent. of total staff.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Early Years Education

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for (a) England and (b) each local education authority the number of additional free early years education places that would be required to meet the Government's target of free places being available for 66 per cent. of three-year-olds by 2002. [126810]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 21 June 2000]: 190,000 additional new free early years education places for three-year-olds will be made available using the £390 million allocated by the Government. This will allow us to meet the national target of providing 66 per cent. of all three-year-olds in England with a free place.

We are currently seeking to target those children in most social need. To this end different targets have been set with local authorities to reflect their position on the Government's Index of Local Deprivation.

Based upon 1998 participation levels, the table shows the estimated number of new places which would be required in each local education authority area to take the number of free places available in that authority to the national target level of 66 per cent. It also shows our estimate of the percentage of three-year-olds in each area who will have a free place by April 2001.

European Schools (Dyslexic Pupils)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his policy towards European schools following UK teaching practices in respect of dyslexic pupils; which body is responsible for the establishment of curricula and teaching practice in European schools; and to which EU institution that body is responsible. [128110]

Jacqui Smith: The European schools have their own policy and procedures for the integration of pupils with special educational needs, including dyslexic pupils. Decisions on policy and curricular matters are for the European Schools Board of Governors, a body established by international treaty, on which the Governments of all 15 EU member states are represented.

Child Care Schemes

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many child care schemes have been started up using New Opportunities Funds; how many of these schemes continued to operate after the first 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [128081]

Ms Hodge: By June 2000, awards totalling some £32 million were made to 1,017 individual schemes and to 172 consortia. Each consortium covers from three to more than 40 individual schemes.

The first schemes received their grant in July 1999, and did not begin to function for at least a further month. No scheme has therefore been running for 12 months. NOF has reserved funds for projects that need additional funding, provided they meet certain criteria.

Sustaining schemes in the long term is of paramount importance. Drawing on the experience of the early stages of the programme, I am soon to meet NOF's Chairman Baroness Pitkeathly to consider how the programme can be developed to ensure that schemes can be sustained over time.

School Security

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what financial support is available for measures to improve school security. [128268]

Jacqui Smith: My Department currently provides an annual grant, through the Standards Fund programme, to all local education authorities in England specifically to support measures to improve security in maintained schools in their areas. The Government grant available is £16.5 million, with local education authorities contributing an additional £5.5 million, making a total of £22 million per year.

For 2000–01, Staffordshire local education authority received £290,050 from central Government to support school security measures.

New Deal

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact of the New Deal for Young People on levels of long-term unemployment among young people in Morecambe and Lunesdale. [128342]

Ms Jowell: The New Deal for Young people is aimed at people aged 18 to 24 who have been claiming unemployment benefits for six months or more.

Claimant unemployment among this group has fallen by 70 per cent. in the three years since April 1997 and by 56 per cent. since April 1998 when the New Deal was introduced. Part of this fall is due to the delivery of a strong and stable economy, but the New Deal for Young People has helped unemployment to fall even faster. The fall of 56 per cent. since the New Deal was introduced compares with a fall of 18 per cent. in total unemployment, 23 per cent. in total youth (18–24) unemployment and 26 per cent. in the total number unemployed for six months or more. The effect of the New Deal is confirmed by independent research from the National Institute of Economic and Social Research.

In Morecambe and Lunesdale the falls in unemployment among the New Deal client group have also been substantially faster than for other groups. In the Morecambe and Lunesdale constituency in the two years since April 1998, claimant unemployment among those aged 18–24 unemployed for six months or more has fallen by 59 per cent. from 220 to 91. This compares with a fall of 16 per cent. in total unemployment, 25 per cent. in total youth (18–24) unemployment, and 32 per cent. in the total number unemployed for six months or more.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people who have been participants in (a) the New Deal for 18 to 24 year olds, (b) the New Deal for those aged 25 and over and (c) the New Deal for older workers have subsequently enrolled on the New Deal for a second time. [128818]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 3 July 2000]: Latest figures to the end of April 2000 show that 45,930 starts on the New Deal for Young People and 61,720 starts on the New Deal for long-term unemployed adults aged 25 or over were made by people who had previously been on the New Deal. The New Deal 50+ started nationally in April this year and therefore it is too soon for anyone to have re-entered the New Deal. We do not see New Deal as a short term investment and we welcome back those who need the further help that the New Deal offers.

Behaviour Support

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to provide financial support for primary schools with children in need of behaviour support. [128290]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 3 July 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced in April that nearly £8 million will be spent this financial year on extending the Learning Support Unit initiative to cover the primary sector. The intention is that, by the end of the year, 60 pilot units will be running in first phase Excellence In Cities areas. The units will be school-based centres for pupils at risk of exclusion due to behavioural problems, providing them with separate teaching and support programmes tailored to their particular needs.

Additionally, £140 million is available from the Social Inclusion: Pupil Support Standards Fund Grant to help schools and local education authorities tackle poor behaviour and truancy; and a further £6 million has been allocated from the SEN Standards Fund to support projects in 46 local education authorities focusing on early identification and action for primary-age children with behavioural difficulties.

Learning and Skills Councils

Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what further progress has been made in appointing the chairmen of the local Learning and Skills Councils. [129007]

Mr. Wicks: Following the appointment last week of the chairs of 21 local Learning and Skills Councils, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has today appointed a further 11 chairs. They are as follows:

	Newly appointed Chairs
West Midlands
Birmingham and Solihull	John Towers
The Black Country	Luke Borwick
Shropshire	Andrew Pinder
Staffordshire	Anne Williams
Coventry and Warwickshire	Ursula Russell
Hereford and Worcestershire	Chris Swan
North West
Lancashire	Alan Dick
Greater Manchester	Anthony Goldstone OBE
Cheshire/Warrington	Brian Fleet
Cumbria	Robert Cairns
Merseyside/Halton	Jim Michie

A list of all the successful candidates has been placed in the Libraries of the House. A list of the remaining appointments will be placed in the Libraries in due course.

The local chairs bring with them a wealth of experience, not least from business, which will be a positive force for success in shaping the work of the Learning and Skills Council.

Sport in Schools

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions his Department has held with the Department of Culture, Media and Sport on extending the number of hours spent on sport in schools. [128823]

Jacqui Smith: We have set a very clear aspiration that all schools should provide two hours of physical activity a week, both within and outside lesson time. We are now working consistently with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to inspire schools and partners in the sport sector to deliver this through the Sports Strategy. The Implementation Group, which my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and I have established to drive forward the strategy, is meeting regularly and will report in December 2000.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate the cost of advisers to the public sector for private finance initiative projects in schools, as a proportion of the value of the contracts. [128588]

Jacqui Smith: The Department is not directly responsible for the procurement of schools PFI contracts, and therefore does not hold comprehensive information about the costs of external advice. The Department provides financial assistance towards such costs, which is supplemented by project sponsors from their own resources. Experience to date shows that the cost of external advisers for schools PFI projects varies according to the size of scheme and the internal expertise available to project sponsors. External fee costs for large projects involving many schools are typically 1 per cent. or less of total contract costs.

Astra Training Services

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many former Astra Training Services employees have obtained employment following the implementation of the preferential training arrangements. [128871]

Mr. Wicks: No preferential training arrangements have been introduced for former Astra Training Services Ltd. employees. There is an ongoing commitment that former Astra staff will have a guaranteed interview for any externally advertised vacancies that arise within the Department for Education and Employment, including the Employment Service, for which they have the minimum competences being sought. In that regard, individuals who want to be considered for such vacancies have access to my Department's Learning and Development Centres to update their knowledge of the Department and its competence-based recruitment arrangements. However, no central record is kept of their success in gaining employment either in the Department, the wider civil service, or elsewhere.

Deaf Children

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what appraisal he has made of the implications of universal hearing screening for neonates for the delivery of services by local education authorities to deaf children under the age of two years. [128325]

Jacqui Smith: Following advice from the National Screening Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health agreed that a pilot programme of neonatal hearing screening should be launched later this year. An announcement was made at the annual conference of the National Deaf Children's Society on Friday 23 June.

Pilot programmes will be set up in 20 areas around the country to assess the full implications of introducing a universal neonatal hearing screening programme, including any consequential requirements for education services. This Department will work closely with the Department of Health to ensure that the impact on education services is fully assessed.

DEFENCE

SIFF Programme

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence against what criteria proposals for his Department's forthcoming Successor Identification Friend or Foe programme will be assessed; and when he expects to make a decision on this project. [128256]

Mr. Spellar: Successor Identification Friend or Foe (SIFF) is a complex programme, involving some 40 sea, land and air platform types with total equipment requirements likely to number in the order of 1,000 transponders and 600 interrogators; each set of equipment has to be functionally and physically integrated with the host platform.

Owing to the number and diversity of the platform types, it is not practical to adopt a single prime contractor strategy for management of the whole SIFF programme. As part of the deliverables from the Assessment Phase, "Demonstration and Manufacture" tenders have been submitted by two competing potential suppliers, BAE SYSTEMS and Raytheon Systems Ltd. for supply of equipment and integration with many of the platform types, and by individual platform design authorities for integration with the remainder of the platforms. Evaluation of these tenders is an extensive task, aimed at ensuring that the decision on the choice of equipment supplier and the phasing of the work to be undertaken by the platform design authorities is made on the best overall balance of operational and value-for-money grounds. All relevant assessment criteria, including commercial, technical, logistics, cost and programme management aspects, will be taken into account in this process and I hope that we will be in a position to announce a decision on the programme during the summer.

HMS Tireless

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason and for what period the crew of HMS Tireless was accommodated in hotels overseas; what has been the cost per night per person; and if he will make a statement. [128267]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Tireless arrived in Gibraltar on 19 May with a propulsion defect. 58 members of the 130-man crew were returned to the UK; the remaining crew are the minimum required for safe upkeep of the vessel. As facilities on board are extremely limited and not conducive to prolonged use alongside, it is normal practice to accommodate submarine personnel ashore if a submarine is alongside for more than three days. Hotel accommodation is being used on a short-term basis as there is currently no suitable service accommodation available. The cost per night including allowances is as follows: Officers £117.60, Senior Rates £92.60 and Junior Rates £75.10/80.10. RFA Fort Rosalie will arrive in Gibraltar by 6 July and she will provide accommodation for all personnel from Tireless for the duration of the repair work.

War Widows

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to publish the review of pensions for war widows. [128472]

Mr. Spellar: My Department is carrying out a major review of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme. This review is looking at all aspects of pensions for members of the armed forces and their dependants, including widows' pensions, and the question of paying widows' pension for life. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State continues to hope to make an announcement about the review during the summer. War widows' pensions are the responsibility of the DSS War Pensions Agency.

MOD Assets

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last agreed guidelines with HM Treasury for greater commercial utilisation of MOD property and assets; and what proportion of its commercial returns may be retained by the MOD under such guidelines. [128270]

Mr. Spellar: The commercial exploitation of Ministry of Defence assets is conducted in accordance with Treasury guidelines, which are circulated to Departments from time to time, most recently in a Policy and Guidance Note, "Selling Government Services Into Wider Markets", issued in July 1998. As a general rule, the guidelines give each Department generating receipts the right to retain these commercial returns in their entirety.

Anti-submarine Exercises

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what anti-submarine warfare exercises involving more than two vessels have been carried out by the Royal Navy in the past year; which ships and submarines took part; and where the exercises were held. [128766]

Mr. Spellar: Ships regularly conduct anti-submarine warfare training on an opportunity basis and it is not possible to detail every exercise or training opportunity. The following pre-planned exercises were undertaken where one of the principal objectives was Anti-Submarine Warfare (ASW) operational capability.

Sea Eagle Missile

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the Sea Eagle has been withdrawn from service. [128767]

Mr. Spellar: Work undertaken in the Strategic Defence Review showed that we needed less capability in the field of open ocean anti-surface ship warfare. To this end, it was decided to withdraw the Sea Eagle missile from both the Tornado GRIB and the Sea Harrier, as part of a coherent programme of reduced investment in this area of our maritime capability. Instead, our future investment will be in heavier weapons with larger ranges, such as Harpoon.

Royal Artillery Day, Larkhill

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations were made to his Department and to the Royal Artillery by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds about Royal Artillery Day at Larkhill; and if he will make a statement. [128474]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 3 July 2000]: No representations have been received from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. There have, however, been detailed negotiations with English Nature over the firing arrangements for the Royal Artillery Day at Larkhill in order to minimise disturbance to nesting sites for stone curlews. English Nature consider that the arrangements in place do not present a significant risk of disturbance, especially as the nesting plots in question have been vacated with no sign of return. English Nature have expressed their thanks for the Ministry of Defence's efforts on this issue.

Parliamentary Questions

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the hon. Member for Beckenham will receive an answer to her question tabled for answer on 17 May on the Love Bug computer virus. [128545]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 3 July 2000]: I have replied today.

Chinook Crash

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the statement by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence in Westminster Hall on 27 June 2000, on the Chinook crash, that the pilots could and should have either turned away immediately or slowed down and climbed to a safe altitude, on what evidence he relied to establish, to the standard of proof required by the RAF, that at the relevant time (a) Flight Lieutenant Cook and (b) Flight Lieutenant Tapper could have turned away or slowed down and climbed to a safe altitude. [128555]

Mr. Spellar: The RAF Board of Inquiry found nothing that would have prevented the pilots from maintaining safe flight in accordance with Visual Flight Rules or Instrument Flight Rules.

Bosnia

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the local Bosnian police report on the fatal accident on Monday 7 July involving Foden Thompson Carmichael FWD EW79AA, near Mrkonjic Grad. [127474]

Mr. Spellar: A brief report by the local Bosnian police was completed on 7 July 1997. It consists of a summary of the accident and notification that the Military Police took control of the investigation. It has been translated from the original Serbo-Croat; however, permission is required from the originator of the report for its release. My officials are now in consultation with the appropriate Bosnian authorities seeking release of the documents to a third party. I will write to the hon. Member when a decision has been reached.

Lemming UGV

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evaluation his Department has made of the Lemming UGV; what plans it has to purchase this surveillance system; and if he will make a statement. [127179]

Mr. Spellar: My Department is aware of the Lemming Unmanned Ground Vehicle through its information exchange links with the US. No UK evaluation of the Lemming has been made and there are no present plans to purchase this system.

Robotic Surveillance System

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has to acquire an updated robotic surveillance system; and if he will make a statement. [127178]

Mr. Spellar: There are no current plans to acquire a land-based robotic surveillance system. Research is, however, being conducted into the potential of robotics to meet possible future requirements.

Queen's Birthday Parade

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to issue lightweight summer uniforms to the service personnel taking part in the Queen's birthday parade in circumstances where the temperature is forecast to be well in excess of the seasonal norm. [127229]

Mr. Spellar: The Army ceremonial Full Dress uniform which is worn by all troops on the Queen's Birthday Parade, and by the Royal Colonels, is designed for a temperate climate. Army Bands do, however, wear their Full Dress uniform in hot climates abroad, such as Cyprus. A lightweight version could not be justified financially for the very few occasions when such a uniform might be deemed appropriate.

Farnborough Airshow

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what support his Department is giving to the organisers of this year's Farnborough Airshow; and what assistance his Department is providing to enable overseas visitors to attend the show. [127876]

Mr. Spellar: In support of the Government's commitment to a strong UK defence industry, my Department undertakes a broad range of activities in support of The Society of British Aerospace Companies' organisation of this prestigious show to help ensure its continued position as one of the world's premier aerospace exhibitions. Normal marketing support to UK exhibitors is provided by the Defence Export Services Organisation, and other assistance ranges from providing the exhibition site, airfield support services and facilities, through to helping the organisers ensure the maximum exposure of UK products to potential customers by supporting official inward missions.

Radiation Detectors

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the IPM-7 type radiation detectors at Faslane base meet the standard required for the function they are put to; what standard his Department requires of BRDL at Rosyth; and what differences there are between the operations at Rosyth and Faslane. [128027]

Mr. Spellar: The IPM-7 type radiation detectors are calibrated at least once a year in accordance with legislative requirements. The monitoring arrangements used at Rosyth are legally the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the dockyard company and are not under the control of the MOD.

It is not possible to make comparisons between Faslane and Rosyth as all nuclear safety matters relating to Rosyth Royal Dockyard are a matter for Babcock Rosyth Defence Ltd., the owners of the dockyard. It is a condition of their contract with the MOD that they must comply with all nuclear safety regulations.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how often the Electra ratemeter and BP7 probes are given a functional response check; and how often they are calibrated at each site where they are in use. [128032]

Mr. Spellar: At Her Majesty's Naval Bases Devonport and Clyde, the Electra ratemeter and BP7 probes undergo various daily function checks and are calibrated at least once a year in accordance with legislative requirements.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what differences exist in the checks for radioactive contamination between personnel working (a) on reactor compartments and (b) in an active processing facility and nuclear repair workshops. [128033]

Mr. Spellar: All service and civilian staff working in reactor compartments at Her Majesty's Naval Base Faslane are checked fully for contamination on completion of their work using an Electra ratemeter with BP7 probe. This supplements routine contamination monitoring of work areas. Additionally, those working in the Active Processing Facility and Nuclear Repair Workshop are monitored using IPM-7 type portal radiation detectors.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Mk10 probe came into service; how many are in use and at what locations; and what plans he has to replace them. [128028]

Mr. Spellar: The Mk10 ratemeter came into service in 1976. There are approximately 65 Mk10 ratemeters currently available for use at the naval bases and on board submarines. The Mk10 ratemeters are programmed for replacement in the financial year 2002–03.

Computer Viruses

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what precise time his Department became aware of the computer virus known as the Love Bug. [122589]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence first became aware of the computer virus known as the Love Bug at approximately 9.30 am on 4 May 2000.

NORTHERN IRELAND

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129089]

Mr. Mandelson: The NIO currently has 11 New Deal employees, representing 0.8 per cent. of total staff. NIO's target under the scheme is to appoint 15 New Deal employees, representing 1 per cent. of total staff. To meet its target the Department has an on-going recruitment competition from which it will appoint a further four New Deal employees.

Diplock Courts

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in the review of the Diplock court arrangements. [129297]

Mr. Ingram: The review of the Diplock arrangements has now been completed and a report presented to the Secretary of State. I have today placed copies of the Review Group's report in the Library of the House.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Respiratory Diseases

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many posthumous claims have been received from the dependants of former miners suffering from chronic bronchitis and emphysema; how many of these claims have so far been processed; and what estimate he has made of when all such claims will have been dealt with. [124949]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 19 June 2000]: To date we have received 36,889 claims for respiratory diseases from the widows and families of deceased former miners.

Where the condition caused or materially contributed to the miner's death, we have been paying bereavement awards to widows on the production of the death certificate since last year. To date we have paid some £30 million in over 2,700 cases. In addition, we are processing claims from widows and dependants through the full medical assessment process as we receive the necessary claims forms from solicitors. This process has been agreed with the solicitors representing the miners and is designed to calculate the compensation that would have been due to the deceased miner, but is now due to the widow and dependants. So far we have completed nearly 300 such assessments for deceased claims, but we expect this number to increase significantly over the coming weeks as the relevant medical records are obtained.

We anticipate that all existing claims will be completed in two to three years' time. This compares with 15 to 20 years if individual cases were dealt with the conventional way through the Courts.

Energy Policy

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what increase in non-fossil fuel resources and/or reduction in energy demand would be needed to compensate for the expected closure of almost all existing UK nuclear plant by 2020. [127480]

Mrs. Liddell: Nuclear output in 1999 is estimated to have been about 88TWh, forming some 28 per cent. of the total net supply from major power producers. In the DTI's recent Working Paper on energy projections, nuclear output was projected to fall to around 27TWh in 2020, representing a reduction of 61TWh from the 1999 level. If non-fossil sources were to substitute for the 61TWh of output entirely, this would require an increase in output from non-fossil sources of 500 per cent. from current levels or an increase of 67 per cent. from the projected level in 2020. To compensate for the 61TWh of output through reductions in electricity use, including losses, would require electricity demand in 2020 to be some 17 per cent. less than projected.

Internet

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what regulatory procedures are in place to ensure the competitive balance of the internet. [128498]

Ms Hewitt: Many activities in the internet sector can be subject to regulation by OFTEL under telecoms regulations. One of OFTEL's key objectives in the area of internet markets is to ensure that the UK regulatory framework is appropriate to encourage the development of the internet so that the UK can be a world leader in e-commerce. Further, qualifying mergers are considered under the EC Merger Regulation, or the Fair Trading Act 1973, as appropriate, taking into account the impact of the merger on all relevant markets.

999 Calls

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how he ensures that OFTEL meets its responsibilities to ensure that 999 calls receive priority over other telephone calls and are correctly routed; and if he will publish OFTEL data on the performance of the three companies which handle 999 calls in their call centres. [128499]

Ms Hewitt: OFTEL actively participates in the Home Office's 999 Liaison Committee which provides a forum for the emergency authorities and telecommunications companies to identify and resolve issues regarding the emergency calls service.

All Public Telecommunications Operators are required under their licences to provide a free 999/112 emergency calls service. Each Operator makes arrangements with BT, Cable & Wireless or Kingston Communications for the answering of such calls and their onward connection to the individual emergency services. The Operators licences also require that they take all reasonably practicable steps to maintain, to the greatest extent possible, the availability and integrity of their networks and the services that run over them, with particular regard to the needs of the Emergency Services. 999 calls receive absolute priority over all other calls and there are several in-built safeguards to ensure that these calls are routed and answered with the highest reliability.

OFTEL monitors the performance of the emergency calls service and receives reports from BT and other operators of all occasions when access to the 999 service is temporarily lost. Major incidents are investigated by OFTEL, which may recommend remedial actions.

The performance of the emergency calls service is published by OFTEL each year. The results for 1999 were as follows:

British Telecom took 22.3 million 999 calls of which it answered 95.7 per cent. within 5 seconds and 99.5 per cent. within 15 seconds;

Cable and Wireless took 4.4 million 999 calls of which it answered 92.1 per cent. within 5 seconds and 95.9 per cent. within 15 seconds;

Kingston Communications handled 0.23 million 999 calls of which it answered 99.97 per cent. within 15 seconds.

OFTEL intend to publish this year's information on their website.

Electricity Pylons

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how much compensation the National Grid Company will pay to landowners on whose land trees must be felled or lopped along the proposed route of pylons from Lackenby to Shipton; [128369]

(2) what discussions he has had with the National Grid Company on the felling and lopping of trees along the route of the proposed pylons from Lackenby via Picton to Shipton by Bellingborough; and if he will make a statement; [128368]

(3) what (a) notification and (b) information he has received from the National Grid Company of the specific location of trees to be felled or lopped along the proposed route of pylons from Lackenby to Shipton; [128370]

(4) what consultations the National Grid Company has held with the affected landowners who will be subject to trees being felled or lopped along the proposed pylons route from Lackenby to Shipton. [128367]

Mrs. Liddell: On 7 December 1999, the National Grid Company applied to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for determination under a planning condition requiring a replacement tree planting scheme to be agreed before the North Yorks power line could be implemented. The Department is currently considering the matter in the light of the views of the Company, the relevant local planning authority and the affected landowners who have responded to the Department's consultation. My right hon. Friend's responsibility is to approve or not approve a tree planting scheme. The purpose of the scheme is to mitigate the impact of the consented development. The question of compensation is not a matter for my right hon. Friend.

Gas and Electricity Industries

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in developing the future regulatory and consumer representation arrangements for the gas and electricity industries; and if he will make a statement. [129299]

Mrs. Liddell: The Utilities Bill currently before Parliament will result in substantial benefits to consumers. In order to provide a sound basis for the implementation of those aspects of the new legislation for which it will have responsibility, the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets plans to undertake preparatory work right away. My Department also needs to undertake some preparatory work on appointments to the new Gas and Electricity Markets Authority and Gas and Electricity Consumer Council, which will be established once the Utilities Bill get Royal Assent. However, while candidates designate will be identified by the recruitment process, no appointments will be made until the Utilities Bill has received Royal Assent.

Parliamentary approval to these activities will be sought in Estimates for the OFGEM Vote (Class IX, Vote 10) and DTI Vote (Class IX, Vote 1). Pending that approval, urgent preparatory expenditure estimated at £1 million for OFGEM and £0.3 million for DTI will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his oral answer of 15 June 2000, Official Report, column 1102, on electricity trading arrangements, if he will publish the names and qualifications of the Embedded Generation Working Group, its terms of reference and work programming; and if he will make a statement. [128848]

Mrs. Liddell: The names, positions and contact details for the joint industry-government working group on embedded generation network access are published on the DTI website at: www.dti.gov.uk/energy/egwg/ along with its terms of reference, work programming, and minutes of past plenary meetings. This group focuses on network access issues. The position of such generators in respect of the new electricity trading arrangements (NETA) is handled separately.

Within the NETA process, a number of expert groups have been established, including the Specials Expert Group, the work of which includes the position of licence exempt generators under NETA. The terms of reference of the expert groups was published in paper DISG 21/04 which is available on the Ofgem website. They are > "to assist the Business Requirements and Review Team in reviewing Programme products assessing Change Requests and providing guidance and advice to the Programme. In all these instances, the basis of the activity will be to seek to ensure that the deliverables from the Programme are compliant with stakeholder requirements".

The Specials Expert Group has developed a range of proposals to assist licence exempt generators to manage their commercial position in the NETA market, and that work continues. The membership of the Group is: Tony Bramley (Tanaris Energy); Graham Meeks (ETSU); David Smol (ILEX); Louise Elder (NGC); Robert Hockland (Scottish and Southern); Peter Clubb (ALEC); Stephen Andrews (ILEX); Andrew Wood (NFPA); Afrose Miah (PowerGen); Wyn Jones (Alcan); Liz Aveyard (Corus); Bob Brown (Norweb); Andrew MacDonald (Concert Energy); Steve Garrett (Slough Heat and Power); and Maurice Smith (Campbell Carr).

Post Offices

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many post offices have closed in (a) Derbyshire and (b) each Derbyshire parliamentary constituency since 1979; [129010]

(2) how many post offices were closed in (a) Derbyshire and (b) each Derbyshire parliamentary constituency between 1979 and 1997. [129009]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that it does not hold historical data by county or parliamentary constituency for the numbers of post offices which have closed or opened.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices there are in (a) Derbyshire and (b) Amber Valley constituency. [129003]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that as at October 1999, the latest date for which such information is available, there were 37 post offices in the Amber Valley constituency and 337 in the county of Derbyshire.

Export Licence Application No. 9764

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decision on export licence application No. 9764 to Turkey. [128927]

Dr. Howells: The application is currently under consideration in conjunction with other Government departments. A decision on the licence application will be reached as quickly as possible consistent with the need to give full consideration to the issue involved.

Cannabis

Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of tests currently being carried out to assess the medical benefits of cannabis. [127540]

Ms Hewitt: The Medical Research Council is supporting a clinical trial to look at the efficacy of cannabis extracts in the treatment of spasticity in multiple sclerosis patients. The trial was announced in December 1999 and is being run by Dr. John Zajicek (Derriford Hospital, Plymouth) and the MRC Clinical Trials Unit.

The trial is making good progress; local ethical committee approval has been obtained in principle and an application has been made to the Medicines Control Agency for the appropriate licence. The cannabinoids will be given exclusively in capsule form. Recruitment of patients is planned to start later in the summer. The results will be available in about 2.5 years, after formal scientific assessment of the results has taken place.

Energy (Office Buildings)

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the increase in energy consumption in commercial buildings, including the office sector, in the last 15 years for which figures are available. [127452]

Mrs. Liddell [pursuant to the reply, 26 June 2000, c. 375W]: The original reply was incorrect, and should have been as follows.

Energy consumption by commercial and other services (including agriculture and public administration) increased by 22 per cent. between 1984 and 1999.

HEALTH

Smoking

15. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the protection of young people from the dangers of tobacco smoking. [127524]

Mr. Hutton: As part of its comprehensive programme of action to tackle smoking, the Government are taking a number of measures which will protect children against the dangers of tobacco. We will shortly announce measures to strengthen enforcement of legislation on under-age sales of cigarettes, encouragement of proof-of-age cards and a targeted education campaign aimed at young people.

Surgical Procedures

16. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what change there has been in the number of surgical procedures carried out by independent healthcare providers on behalf of the NHS in the last three years. [127525]

Ms Stuart: This information is not collected centrally. However, in the last three years the total spent outside the National Health Service on all in-patient and day cases (surgical and medical) has risen from £86 million to £103 million, an increase of around £17 million. This remains around 1 per cent. of the total NHS spend on the same cases in the same period.

Children (Faltering Growth)

17. Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce new guidelines to help young children with faltering growth, taking account of recent research published by the Children's Society. [127526]

Yvette Cooper: The research undertaken by the Children's Society provides an overview of current practices and the effectiveness of interventions. It gives useful information for professionals working with children. The Department, in providing grant aid, has supported the society in establishing the Feeding Matters programme. Sharing the successful outcomes of these programmes and projects such as Sure Start will enable more families to receive this support.

Primary Care Groups and Trusts

18. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received on the delivery of patient care through primary care trusts; and if he will make a statement. [127527]

Mr. Denham: I and my officials have regular meetings with a range of national and local stakeholders to discuss such issues.

35. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received regarding the operation of primary care groups. [127545]

Mr. Denham: My officials and I have regular meetings with a range of national and local stakeholders to discuss such issues.

NHS Doctors

19. Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the number of doctors working in the NHS (a) currently and (b) between 1992 and 1997. [127528]

Mr. Denham: There are currently over 90,000 doctors working in the National Health Service; 4,000 more than there were in 1997. Money we made available from the first Comprehensive Spending Review will enable the NHS to take on up to 7,000 more doctors by March 2002.

Census Forms (Trent)

20. Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what conclusions he has drawn from interim analysis of the national health service census forms returned by residents of the Trent region. [127529]

Mr. Denham: Of almost 29,000 suggestions made by members of the public within the Trent region, it can be concluded that their main concerns are the need for more capacity (27 per cent.), "doing things differently" (18 per cent.) and waiting (16 per cent.). These are consistent with the top three concerns expressed by the public nationally.

Intermediate Care (Worcestershire)

21. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent assessment he has made of the adequacy of intermediate care in Worcestershire. [127530]

Yvette Cooper: Worcestershire Health Authority has substantially increased its spending on intermediate care in the current financial year. During the last 12 months a number of services have been developed and implemented within Worcestershire which have enabled patients to be cared for in clinically appropriate environments which meet their individual needs.

MRSA

22. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to reduce deaths from methicillin resistant staphylococcus aureus. [127531]

Mr. Denham: Tackling hospital-acquired infection, including MRSA, underpins the priorities identified in the National Priorities Guidance. We have developed and issued national standards for infection control that place responsibility on Chief Executives of National Health Service trusts to deliver locally. Progress on compliance with these standards will be independently reviewed and monitored by both the Audit Commission and the Commission for Health Improvement.

Scientific Staff

23. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to increase recruitment and retention of scientific staff in the NHS. [127532]

Mr. Denham: The National Advisory Group for Scientists and Technicians has been charged with developing plans to improve work force planning, education, training and career development among that group of staff. The Department of Health is also developing a specific strategy for improving recruitment and retention, liaising closely with employers, professional bodies and trade unions to raise the profile of the work of scientists.

Cottage Hospitals

24. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of cottage hospitals in South Staffordshire. [127533]

Yvette Cooper: South Staffordshire Health Authority has undertaken a wide ranging strategic review of services. Following this period of informal consultation, specific proposals will be presented for formal public consultation. It would therefore not be possible for me to comment at this time on the future provision of services at specific sites in South Staffordshire.

Multiple Sclerosis

25. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that, following diagnosis, persons with MS have access to a named consultant neurologist to help them manage their condition. [127534]

Mr. Hutton: Multiple sclerosis can be very difficult to diagnose. The usual treatment path is for a patient to be referred to a consultant neurologist by their general practitioner. Once the relationship is established between the patient and the consultant, it would be normal for the patient, whenever it is clinically necessary, to continue seeing that consultant for the management of their condition.

Cataract Services

26. Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on cataract services in the NHS. [127535]

Mr. Denham: We intend to improve access to treatment for people who need cataract surgery. We are investing £20 million over two years to modernise cataract services. This will ensure quicker and more efficient services for patients and increase the number of cataract operations performed to 250,000 by the year 2003.

Telecommunications Masts

27. Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent assessment he has made of the risk to health of people living near telecommunications masts. [127536]

Yvette Cooper: The recently published report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones (the Stewart Group) concluded that the balance of evidence indicates that there is no general risk to health to people living near base stations, but that gaps in knowledge are sufficient to justify a precautionary approach.

NHS Funding

28. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the planned level of capital investment in the NHS over the next two years; and if he will make a statement. [127537]

Mr. Denham: The planned level of Capital Investment in the National Health Service, including the Private Finance Initiative, is £1.942 billion in 1999–2000 and £2.736 billion in 2000–01.

34. Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the ability of the health authority funding formula to reflect health service needs in each area. [127544]

Mr. Denham: The current formula includes a wide range of health and socio-economic indicators associated with the need for healthcare.

There have, however, been growing concerns about how well the formula matches cash to health need. The healthcare needs of populations must be the driving force in determining where cash goes. We have therefore asked the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation to oversee a wide-ranging review of the formula.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the sums required and (b) the percentage increase in funding required to achieve financial balance in each NHS health authority area by 2000–01; and what percentage of the additional NHS funding recently announced is required to achieve financial balance in each case. [128554]

Mr. Denham: Health authorities do not spend money on achieving financial balance. In consultation with local stakeholders they use their allocations to commission services for their local populations. In planning their spending they are required to live within the resources available.

Dental Services

29. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the provision of NHS dental services. [127538]

Mr. Hutton: We are aware of the problems in accessing National Health Service dentistry in some parts of the country and have taken steps to address them. Improving access to services will be an integral part of the Government's plans to modernise NHS dentistry, which will be published in conjunction with the National Plan for the New NHS.

Walk-in Centres

30. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards establishing the planned new NHS walk-in centres. [127539]

Mr. Denham: 36 National Health Service Walk-in Centre pilots were approved last year. 21 have opened to date, with the remaining sites to open by December 2000. NHS walk-in centres will improve access to and convenience of services for patients.

Patient Choice

31. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about patient choice in the NHS. [127541]

Mr. Denham: The rights of patients are one of the issues being considered in the preparation of the National Plan.

Consultants

32. Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to monitor the performance levels of NHS consultants. [127542]

Mr. Denham: We are currently negotiating a new contract for National Health Service consultants and have agreed with the British Medical Association the key areas to be negotiated over the next few months. That will include the introduction of employer-based appraisal for all consultants which, coupled with tighter job planning mechanisms, will provide NHS managers with a more effective framework to manage the performance and time of their consultants.

Alcohol Strategy

36. Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the consultation paper on a national alcohol strategy; and if he will make a statement. [127546]

Yvette Cooper: We plan to publish a consultation paper later this year, which will allow a period for comment prior to the publication of the strategy.

Health Inequalities (London)

37. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to reduce health inequalities in London. [127547]

Yvette Cooper: Action to reduce inequalities in health is a major priority, as are addressing black and minority ethnic health, regenerating deprived areas and improving transport. The reduction in health inequalities is a shared priority for local health and social services.

A London health strategy has been developed over the last year by a partnership with representatives from business, local government, environment, leisure and housing organisations, the National Health Service, academic institutions and voluntary and community groups.

The London health strategy will reduce inequalities in health and this work will complement the implementation of major government initiatives to tackle inequalities and focus them on the particular problems being faced in London.

National Plan (Beds)

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress he is making on providing for additional beds under the national plan; and if he will make a statement. [127543]

Mr. Denham: We will be publishing the national plan in July.

Freeman Hospital, Newcastle

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the maximum waiting times are for a consultant appointment at the Freeman Hospital in Newcastle; and if he will make a statement. [127804]

Mr. Denham: Latest published data for the quarter ending 31 March 2000 show that 75 per cent. of patients referred by their general practitioner to the Newcastle upon Tyne Hospitals National Health Service Trust are seen within 13 weeks for first out-patient appointments and 95 per cent. are seen within 26 weeks. Lengthy waits being experienced for orthopaedic surgery are being addressed by the appointment of a new consultant.

Prescription Drugs

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the 10 most expensive drugs, in terms of treatment per patient per year, prescribed by the NHS and the number of patients involved in each case in the last year for which figures are available. [127862]

Ms Stuart: It is not possible to provide information in the form requested because individual patients require different treatment regimes, nor is information collected on the numbers of patients receiving medicines.

However, as a general rule the most expensive treatments per patient per year are those used to treat very rare diseases or rare complications of diseases, e.g. Gaucher's Disease or complication of haemophilia.

Nursing Vacancies (Advertising)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on advertising for nursing vacancies in newspapers and journals by each hospital trust in England and Wales in 1998–99. [128083]

Ms Stuart: Information on how much is spent on advertising in newspapers and journals by each hospital trust in England and Wales for nursing vacancies is not held centrally.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce legislation to secure a greater supply of organs for transplant; and if he will make a statement. [128113]

Mr. Denham: We have no plans at this time to introduce legislation to change the way in which organs are donated for transplant.

Our current publicity campaign, which was launched in 1998, is on-going and encourages people to join the National Health Service Organ Donor Register, carry the donor card and, most importantly, discuss their wishes with their friends and family.

Medical Services (Cleveland)

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many doctors have joined the NHS in each year since 1990 and how many have joined in total since May 1997 (a) nationally, (b) in Teesside and (c) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement; [128511]

(2) how many nurses have joined the NHS in each year since 1990; how many joined in total since May 1997 (a) nationally, (b) in Teesside and (c) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128514]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is shown in the table. Information is not collected for the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East.

Junior Doctors

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the impact of the European Working Time Directive on junior doctors; and how many junior doctors are working in excess of the directive-recommended hours. [128802]

Mr. Denham: We welcome the agreement reached between the Council and the European Parliament to extend the Working Time Directive to junior doctors. The transition period of up to twelve years for implementing the Directive will allow junior doctors' working hours to be reduced in a planned and sustained way while, at the same time, protecting patient services and safeguarding our ambitious and much-needed programme of modernisation for the National Health Service.

The transition period requires, in its initial phase, that no junior doctor should work more than 56 hours a week by 2007. NHS trusts' figures for March 2000 show that 64 per cent. of junior doctors in England meet the full range of hours and rest period targets set out in the juniors' New Deal, including the requirement that they do not work more than 56 hours a week. The 56 hour limit will be incorporated into all junior doctor contracts from August 2003.

Appointments

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he has taken to end the practice of seeking references from hon. Members on shortlisted applicants for appointment to (a) NHS trusts, (b) health authorities and (c) primary care trusts, since the publication of the Fritchie report. [129030]

Ms Stuart: A response to Dame Rennie Fritchie's report on appointments to National Health Service boards will be made shortly. This will address the recommendation that comments should no longer be sought from hon. Members on shortlisted candidates for chair appointments.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) shortlisted applicants for and (b) appointments as (i) chairman and (ii) non-executive director of primary care trusts have declared political activity for (A) the Labour Party, (B) the Conservative Party and (C) the Liberal Democrat Party. [129029]

Ms Stuart: The information requested as at 3 July 2000 is given in the table.

Access to Health Care

Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to reduce regional variations in access to health care. [127517]

Mr. Denham: We are setting standards through the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the National Service Frameworks. We are ensuring local delivery through clinical governance and monitoring delivery through the performance assessment framework and the Commission for Health Improvement. We are working with relevant parties, utilising the record increases in National Health Service funding announced in the Budget to improve NHS performance.

Community Care Services

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost for (a) Scotland and (b) the UK of abolishing charging for essential non-residential community care services. [128132]

Mr. Hutton: In 1998–99, councils in England raised £295 million in sales, fees and charges from all clients of all ages for non-residential services. The responsibility for information relating to Scotland is a matter for the devolved Administration.

Prescription Fraud

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the level of accuracy of his Department's most recent measurement of prescription fraud. [128913]

Ms Stuart: The measurement exercise was designed so as to ensure that the variation in the results due to sampling should be no more than 1 per cent. (So that for an estimate of x per cent. the true value would have a 95 per cent. confidence interval of x plus 1 per cent. and x minus 1 per cent. or better). In fact the final estimate of the fraud/in error rate had 95 per cent. confidence limits of plus or minus 0.6 per cent.

A sample of forms dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors to people claiming exemption from payment for prescription charges was selected using robust statistical techniques. The selected prescription forms were then subjected to a stringent investigative process to establish whether the patient who had made the claim had done so correctly, in error or fraudulently. Each case was investigated and examined individually and, where necessary, patients were contacted to establish the reasons for inconsistencies in the information given by them. The National Audit Office have examined the methodology used to arrive at the estimates and found that it was sound.

Buddying Schemes

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the buddying schemes for people with disabilities in England which are run by (a) community health trusts, (b) social services departments and (c) voluntary organisations; and if he will make a statement. [128836]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected centrally. It is for health authority and local authority commissioners to decide whether to commission buddying services locally.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding is available from his Department to finance buddying schemes for people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement. [128835]

Mr. Hutton: The Department provides grants to voluntary organisations through the scheme administered under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. Some of these grants may, from time to time, be used to fund buddying schemes.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the total funding available from (a) central Government and (b) voluntary organisations for the running of buddying schemes for people with disabilities in England; and if he will make a statement. [128837]

Mr. Hutton: No Section 64 grants are currently provided specifically to fund buddying schemes. Information about funding from voluntary organisations is not available centrally.

NICE

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will ask the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to hear oral evidence from multiple sclerosis patients; [129116]

(2) what guidance he has given to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence about taking evidence from patients. [129117]

Mr. Denham: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) determines its own processes, within broad guidance from Ministers set out in a "Memorandum of Understanding" of August 1999. We have asked NICE to follow a transparent and well-structured process for its appraisals, giving appropriate interested parties the opportunity to submit evidence, to comment on draft conclusions, and to appeal to a panel independent of those involved in the original judgment. For their appraisal of beta interferon NICE have sought evidence from patient representative organisations and we anticipate that NICE will be well aware from this of the views of individual multiple sclerosis patients.

Correspondence

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Broxbourne will receive a reply to her letters of (a) 3 March, (b) 6 April, (c) 5 May, (d) 1 June and (e) 29 June relating to her constituent Mrs. K. Costas. [128917]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member on 3 July.

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Broxbourne will receive a reply to her letters of (a) 6 April, (b) 5 May, (c) 1 June and (d) 29 June relating to her constituent, Mr. John Huggett. [128915]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member on 3 July.

Single Currency

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what costs the NHS has incurred as a consequence of the National Changeover Plan. [128914]

Mr. Denham: The National Health Service is carrying out a measure of pre-planning for the possible introduction of the euro as set out in the second Outline National Changeover Plan published on 9 March 2000. The costs of this on-going exercise are contained within normal running costs and cannot be separately identified.

Healthy Living Centres

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the role of healthy living centres in the Government's public health strategy. [127513]

Yvette Cooper: The New Opportunities Fund is responsible for funding the healthy living centre initiative. Healthy living centre applicants need to demonstrate that their projects will support national and local health strategies. Healthy living centres will have a key role to play in reducing inequalities and supporting the work of other statutory and voluntary agencies locally. Healthy living centres funded through this initiative will promote good health in its broadest sense.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what cost savings are planned for the rest of the year at the Dome. [123984]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 5 June 2000]: NMEC is achieving £20 million cost savings over the project's remaining lifetime which will bring the project back to its original cash ceiling budget of £758 million. In addition, NMEC is continuing to focus on cost efficiency and cost savings and aims to deliver more.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the basis on which the estimated closure costs of the Dome have been calculated. [126872]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 19 June 2000]: The closure costs of the Millennium Dome will be subject to the nature of the proposal from the winning bidder in the Legacy competition. Any non-planned closure costs would be determined by the nature and quantum of contractual liabilities at that point in time, including staff termination payments, supplier and contractor payments and legal bills.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proportion of sponsorship payments due to the new Millennium Experience Company in respect of the Dome had been received on time by 31 May. [126649]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 19 June 2000]: All sponsor contracts are individually tailored for each sponsorship, including phasing of sponsorship payments. At 31 May, all contractual sponsorship payments had been made. At that stage the contract with Boots was nearing finalisation and the company had paid amounts in advance of signature. The Boots contract has now been signed and all due payments have been made.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will estimate the cost of making admission to the Dome free from 1 July to the end of the year. [127485]

Janet Anderson: On the basis of ticket income foregone against the planned visitor volume, the cost of free entry from 1 July would be about £40 million.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what type of information on ticket sales to the Millennium Dome has been released to the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport on a commercial-in-confidence basis which has not been made publicly available. [125529]

Mr. Chris Smith: No information on ticket sales has been made available to the Select Committee on a commercial-in-confidence basis which has not been made publicly available. Information on visitor figures is regularly posted on the Dome's website (www.Dome2000.co.uk).

New Millennium Experience Company

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment the New Millennium Experience Company has made of its ability to meet its published commercial income target. [125027]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 8 June 2000]: NMEC has already made it clear that the original business plan assumptions were over-optimistic and its revised business plan, on the basis of 6 million revenue-generating visitors, forecasts commercial income (tickets, merchandise, food, corporate hospitality and events) of £86.1 million. Part of the difference between the original and current forecasts is mitigated by the revenue contingency factored into the original budget. The remaining difference formed part of the NMEC's applications for additional Lottery grant in January 2000 and May 2000. Despite the revision of the business assumptions the Dome is the most successful paying visitor attraction in the UK, achieving 3 million visitors in six months, and is the second most successful in Europe.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will answer the questions from the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central on the NMEC, tabled for answer on 9 June. [128620]

Janet Anderson: I answered my hon. Friend's questions (125528, 125530 and 125531) on the NMEC on 29 June 2000, Official Report, columns 618–19W. I am answering question No. 125529 today.

Flaxmill Project

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for how long the English Heritage grant will be available for the Flaxmill project in Shrewsbury; and if he will make a statement. [125945]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The English Heritage grant will be available as long as it is needed to get this important project off the ground. English Heritage grants are normally time limited and conditional on works starting within six months, and being completed within two years, of the date of offer. However, in this case English Heritage have agreed to hold their grants offer open in the hope that their funding partners will be able to find their share of the funds needed to secure the future of this Grade I listed building at risk.

Listed Churches

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much Lottery money, and how many grants, have been allocated to restoration of listed churches in each year since 1995; and what plans he has to increase the resources available for the restoration and maintenance of listed churches. [128515]

Mr. Chris Smith: We have contacted the Heritage Lottery Fund and English Heritage to request the information required, and I will write to the right hon. Member as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library of the House.

National Lottery

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps is he taking to ensure that small community-based projects have increased access to Lottery funding. [128351]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has encouraged the distributing bodies to continue and enhance the cross-distributor small grants programme, Awards for All, which distributes grants of £500-£5,000 to community-based groups for arts, sports, heritage, charitable and other community activities. The average size of a Lottery grant today is £40,000, down from a peak of more than £250,000 in 1995–96, which means that many more groups are able to benefit from Lottery funds.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money the National Lottery raised in the last 12 months for which figures are available; and what was the average weekly figure for that period. [128358]

Kate Hoey: In the 12 months to the end of May 2000, the National Lottery raised a total of £1.789 billion for good causes (including money earned on the balance of the National Lottery distribution fund). This equates to an average of £34 million per week.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps his Department is taking to ensure equitable distribution of Lottery funding throughout the United Kingdom. [128347]

Kate Hoey: The Government are committed to ensuring that Lottery funding is distributed fairly both geographically and across all groups of society. This is reflected in the changes made to Lottery distribution through the National Lottery Act, 1998, and through the revised Policy Directions which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued in summer 1998. My Department and the Lottery distributors have set up an action team to help ensure that areas of low take-up fare better from the Lottery in future.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he takes to monitor the extent to which Lottery funds are equitably distributed throughout the United Kingdom. [128349]

Kate Hoey: My Department monitors the Lottery awards given to each constituency. The policy directions issued to each distributor require them to take account of the need to ensure that all parts of the country have access to funding.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the projects for which Lottery funding has been applied for to date. [128345]

Kate Hoey: Applications for Lottery funds are made in confidence and therefore no complete list of projects that have applied for Lottery funds is available. A list of successful applications is available on my Department's website at www.lottery.culture.gov.uk.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to ensure that seaside towns receive Lottery funding for regeneration projects. [128344]

Kate Hoey: The National Lottery funds numerous projects which bring widespread benefits to seaside towns. Research jointly commissioned by my Department and the Lottery distributors into Lottery funding in the coalfields and other areas does however suggest that resort and retirement towns have made relatively fewer applications and have received less per capita than the national average. We have set up an action team to take forward recommendations in this research and will explore ways of ensuring that all areas, including seaside towns, receive their fair share in future.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is the maximum percentage of funding a project can attract in Lottery funding. [128444]

Kate Hoey: Each National Lottery distributor sets its own levels of expected partnership funding. In doing so they seek an element of partnership funding commensurate with the ability of different kinds of applicants, or applicants in particular areas, to obtain such support. In some instances this may result in 100 per cent. National Lottery funding. Volunteer time and other contributions in kind may be considered as providing partnership support.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he takes to advertise funding opportunities through the Lottery to voluntary and community groups. [128350]

Kate Hoey: My Department has published and distributed leaflets drawing attention to the Lottery funding available. Similar information is available on the DCMS website www.culture.gov.uk. My Department is also working with the distributing bodies, local authorities and others to improve the flow of information to voluntary and community groups.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the total value of Lottery ticket sales is in the Morecambe and Lunesdale constituency since the Lottery began. [128357]

Kate Hoey: In the first five years of the Lottery's operation (that is, up to 13 November 1999), ticket sales in the Morecambe and Lunesdale constituency were £31,646,302. No more recent breakdown of Lottery ticket sales by constituency is available.

World Cup 2006

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions he has had with the FA, the Premier League and Sport England regarding his continued support for the bid to host the World Cup in 2006; and if he will make a statement. [128799]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 3 July 2000]: I have discussed the bid for the 2006 World Cup with the Football Association and with the Prime Minister's Special Envoy over the last week. Despite recent events at the European Football Championships, the bid will not be withdrawn. The Government agree with the FA that the England bid is of the highest technical quality, and will continue to offer its full support.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects accounts of England 2006 to be published; and if he will make a statement. [128800]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The 2006 World Cup bid is a bid by the Football Association. Reference to the costs of the bid are made in the FA's accounts for the years ended 31 December 1998 and 1999, and are expected to appear in the accounts for the year ended 31 December 2000. Any decision to publish full accounts for the bid is for the FA to make.

Sport England allocated £3 million towards the cost of the bid, which is expected to total an estimated £9 million by the time that the FIFA Executive Council announces its decision on 7 July. Although it is not a Lottery condition to require published accounts, Sport England closely monitors how the Lottery grant is spent.

Housing Benefit Fraud

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent steps his Department has taken to tackle Housing Benefit fraud. [128458]

Angela Eagle: "Safeguarding Social Security" published in March 1999 makes it clear that we want a benefit system which is secure from start to finish. We are committed to taking tough action against Housing Benefit fraud. We have already reformed the anti-fraud financial incentive scheme for local authorities to ensure they continue to be rewarded for detecting cases of genuine benefit fraud and non-residency, but also have the opportunity to earn rewards for successfully prosecuting fraud cases and for adopting the Department's Verification Framework. The Verification Framework helps to secure the administration of Housing Benefit through a series of additional checks, carried out throughout the life of a benefit claim, and [illegible] local authorities have been paid or accepted funds to implement the Verification Framework.

The Benefit Fraud Inspectorate is conducting inspections of local authorities; to date 58 reports have been published. Last month the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate issued new good practice guidance to improve service delivery and help tackle fraud and error. We have made it abundantly clear to all authorities that when inspections show persistent failings we will use our powers to direct authorities on the standards they are to meet and the timescales for achieving them.

272 local authorities are currently using the Royal Mail "do not redirect" scheme which prevents benefit claimants from using postal redirection arrangements to make false claims to benefit from multiple addresses. To reduce the scope for fraud and error and to streamline the administration of Housing Benefit we have installed Remote Access Terminals to give authorities direct 'on line' access to a range of relevant information on other DSS benefit systems. 388 authorities currently operate at least one terminal and we plan to install terminals in a further 16 authorities by the end of September 2000.

We are also introducing electronic transfer of data to speed up the transfer of information from the Benefits Agency to local authorities and further reduce the scope for fraud and error. So far 191 local authorities have the equipment installed; by this Autumn we expect nearly all local authorities to be using this technology.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the estimated cost of Housing Benefit fraud was in 1999–2000 in (a) England and (b) Morecambe and Lunesdale. [128443]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is as follows. The latest estimates are derived from the National Housing Benefit Accuracy Review 1997–98 which estimated losses of £490 million in England with a margin of error of approximately ±35 per cent. (£330 million–£670 million).

Note:

It is not possible to provide estimates at individual constituency level.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to measure Housing Benefit fraud in those local authorities not included in the revised area benefit reviews; how many local authorities will be covered by such actions; when such actions will be completed; and to what level of accuracy he estimates such measurements will be made. [128912]

Angela Eagle: Fraud measurement is being extended to all local authorities for Standard Housing Benefit from 2001. The first results will be available from March 2002.

On the basis of the size and structure of the sample of Housing Benefit cases currently being examined in the Area Benefit Reviews programme, it is predicted that the margin of error around the estimate of the value of losses due to fraud and error will be between ±10 per cent. and ±20 per cent.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases of suspected Housing Benefit fraud there were in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; how many of these cases went to court; and how many of them resulted in a successful prosecution. [128910]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

The table shows the number of cases where Housing Benefit (HB) fraud has been established on the balance of probabilities by local authorities, the number of cases which were referred by local authorities to lawyers for prosecution action and the total number of successful prosecutions. It does not include cases involving benefit fraud where Housing Benefit is one among several benefits being claimed and the Benefits Agency have investigated the case.

Number of cases suspected of HB/CTB fraud and prosecutions in 1997–98 to 1998–99: Great Britain

Thousand

	Total number of cases
	1997–98	1998–99
Cases where fraud established and weekly benefit savings claimed	220	160
Total number of cases referred for prosecution	1.3	1.9
Total number of successful prosecutions	0.7	0.8

Notes:

1. Includes all cases where fraud is suspected including those that are not live, or involve a landlord, or organised fraud
2. Figures are rounded to two significant figures
3. The Department also tackles HB/CTB fraud as a by-product of investigating Income Support (IS) fraud. The above table contains all cases where fraud was established and weekly benefit savings were claimed by Local Authorities. All cases discovered by the Department are not included. Therefore, the total number of cases where HB/CTB fraud was established is much higher than stated above.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), of 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 213W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded to his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128247]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 29 June 2000]: Of the four people listed, the staff member from the Guardian Media Group plc was seconded to the Department as a Grade 7 policy adviser on the Welfare Reform Unit where he helped in the development of thinking on welfare reform and its subsequent presentation.

The secondee from Sacker and Partners was a trainee solicitor who worked in the Office of the Solicitor providing advice on legal aspects of pensions and also the European Community.

The secondee from CSL Management Services came into the Department as an administrative officer in the Chatham Local Benefits Office where he worked on the Area Benefit Review Team co-ordinating activity on housing benefit.

The Business Development Manager from Oracle was seconded into the Department as a senior manager in the Modern Service Team advising on electronic Government issues and project approval.

For reasons of confidentiality names of individuals have not been given.

Pensions

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he (a) received and (b) will publish the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries' report on the minimum funding requirement; [128471]

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has received the report from the Institute of Actuaries on the Minimum Funding Requirement; and when it will be published. [128529]

Mr. Rooker: We received the report from the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries on the review of the minimum funding requirement at the end of May. We are considering it and we will be issuing a consultation paper on any proposals for change. We plan to publish the actuaries' report alongside the consultation document.

Mothers (Income)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the average weekly income is of mothers with children aged three. [129002]

Angela Eagle: The majority of mothers live in families with a partner, and the latest estimate for the gross income of families with children aged three is £521 a week.

Notes:

1. Figures quoted are derived from the Family Resources Survey and are therefore subject to sampling error.

2. The individual income refers to the income accruing to women in their own right and includes earnings, income from self-employment, investments and occupational pensions/annuities, benefit income and income from miscellaneous other sources. This estimate is from the Women's Individual Income 1996–97 dataset and is at 1996–7 survey prices.

3. Family income has been provided because the majority of mothers live with a partner and it is generally assumed that there is a certain amount of sharing of income within families. This estimate is based on 1997–8 data and is set at April 1999 prices.

4. The net cost of council tax is deducted from family income but not from women's individual income.

Child Poverty

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the figures for the (a) GDP per head and (b) highest family income for those children termed as living in poverty in the UK according to the recent UNICEF report in each of the last 21 years. [129026]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Over the period 1979 to 1997 GDP per head grew by 40 per cent. whereas the highest equivalised household income of a child in poverty grew by only 30 per cent.

[1] Constant 1995 prices

[2] April 1999 prices

Notes:

1. GDP per head is for the UK, taken from ONS series YBGS—Gross domestic product at market prices, shown in 1995 prices.
2. The highest household income for those children living in poverty (as defined by UNICEF) is 50 per cent. of median equivalised household income before housing costs shown for Great Britain, using data from the Households Below Average Income (HBAI) Series. These figures are based on the Family Expenditure Survey (FES) from 1979 to 1993, and on the Family Resources Survey (FRS) from 1994–95 onwards. These are not consistent with the UK estimates contained in the UNICEF Innocent Report Card "A League Table of Child Poverty in Rich Nations", which are based on different data and methods of estimation.
3. Estimates from the FES relate to the UK while those from the FRS relate to GB. In addition, the estimates derived from the two surveys use slightly different definitions of income: FRS results therefore are not precisely comparable with those from the FES but are considered to be broadly comparable. Self-employed households have been excluded from the analysis.
4. Estimates from the Family Expenditure Survey from 1987 to 1993 are based on a two year rolling average method, and refer to combined years—for example, in the table 1987 is 1987 + 1998.
5. Estimates from the Family Resources Survey are based on data for financial years from 1994–95 onwards. For example, 1994 refers to the financial year 1994–95.
6. Estimates of 50 per cent. of median income before housing costs are based on survey data, and so will be subject to the normal problems associated with survey data including sampling variation and measurement error.
7. Figures for GDP per head and median equivalised household income are not directly comparable, as GDP per head is not equivalised, and they are shown in different price bases.
8. Figures are rounded to the nearest £1.

Wrongful Imprisonment

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will protect the benefit position of individuals who were wrongly imprisoned as a result of a conviction that was subsequently overturned. [129385]

Mr. Rooker: In future individuals who have been wrongly convicted will be able to receive National Insurance credits covering the period of wrongful imprisonment. This will protect their entitlement to the State Pension and Incapacity Benefit for that period and ensure that they are not disadvantaged.

Benefit Fraud Inspectorate

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the reports of the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate in respect of Hart district council and Lancaster city council. [129386]

Mr. Rooker: Benefit Fraud Inspectorate reports have been published today in respect of Hart district council and Lancaster city council and copies of these reports have been placed in the Library.

Both reports contain recommendations to address weaknesses and help the councils to improve their administration and counter fraud activity for Housing and Council Tax Benefits.

Inspectors report a commitment by Lancaster city council to tackling fraud but considered there was a need to support this commitment in operational terms. The BFI raises a number of concerns including a need for Lancaster city council to address urgently its inadequate management information systems and limited management checking regime.

In their report on Hart district council inspectors found some good working practices, but weaknesses were identified in a number of key areas. There were several areas where the council had failed to make sure benefit payments were free from fraud and error and where they failed to comply with the law.

The report on Hart district council notes a need for the council to tighten verification procedures so, as a minimum, they match the standards outlined in the Verification Framework. Inspectors found the council's counter-fraud activity to be ineffective and although high level counter-fraud policies had been developed, these had not been underpinned with detailed operational measures. The BFI also reports that these policies did not have the commitment of staff or management to implement them.

The Secretary of State is now considering both these reports and will be asking both councils for their proposals in response to the findings and recommendations of the BFI.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what estimate he has made of the total cost of administering the extended Winter Fuel Payment scheme for men; [128526]

(2) how many men have been sent letters relating to the extended Winter Fuel Payment scheme; [128527]

(3) how many completed forms relating to the extended Winter Fuel Payment scheme for men have been received by his Department; [128528]

(4) how many phone calls relating to the extended Winter Fuel Payment scheme for men have been dealt with by the Winter Fuel Payments Helpline. [128530]

Angela Eagle: The estimated cost of administering the extended Winter Fuel Payment scheme is in the order of £25 million; this includes additional costs associated with handling this years retrospective payments.

During April we wrote to around 20,000 people, who had already registered their details. From 5 May, over a five-week period, a mailshot took place to all those identified as being eligible under the new arrangements. Over this period we wrote to around 1.7 million people.

The number of completed claim forms received to date is 1,067,119, which include 6,119 that have been downloaded from the internet. As well as the men aged between 60–64 who may now be eligible, this figure includes claim forms from women aged 60 or over who have not previously received a winter fuel payment as they were not in receipt of the State Retirement Pension or one of the other qualifying benefits.

To date a total of 217,615 calls have been made to the Winter Fuel Helpline.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of extending Winter Fuel Payments to all disabled people in (a) Scotland and (b) the UK who receive Income Support. [128170]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

The annual cost of extending Winter Fuel Payments to people in Scotland who are in receipt of Income Support with a disability premium, is estimated to be £20 million in 2000–01. The equivalent cost for the whole of Great Britain is estimated to be £140 million.

Notes:

1. Information for Northern Ireland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

2. Estimates exclude those in receipt of a disability premium who are in residential care or nursing homes.

3. Estimates include those in receipt of income-based Jobseeker's Allowance with a disability premium.

4. Figures include an adjustment to take into account reduced payments to people aged 60 or over not in receipt of Income Support who live in the same household as a claimant of Income Support with a disability premium.

5. Figures have been rounded to the nearest £10 million.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much it would cost in Scotland and the UK (a) to allow carers over the age of 65 years to claim Invalid Care Allowance and (b) to introduce a (i) five per cent. and (ii) 10 per cent. increase for Invalid Care Allowance after two years of caring in (A) Scotland and (B) the UK. [128175]

Mr. Bayley: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

Estimated cost of extending new claims entitlement to Invalid Care Allowance (ICA) for those aged 65 or over, 2001–02

Great Britain	30

Notes:

1. Costs rounded to nearest five million, cash prices.
2. Estimates are based on Family Resources Survey 1997–98 and 1998–99, and caseload forecasts.
3. As estimates based on survey data the above will be subject to sampling error. The limitations of modelling entitlement from available survey data on the number of hours that individuals spend providing care mean that the above estimates should be treated with caution—there is evidence of under-reporting of hours spent providing care.
4. It is assumed that all normal ICA entitlement rules remain in place after any abolition of the upper age limit for new claims. Costs include the effects on Income Support (IS) carer premium and consequent effects on Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit.
5. Costing does not include any behavioural effects that might arise as consequence of change or IS floaters on.
6. Proportion of extra expenditure in Scotland assumed to be in line with proportion of those with disability benefits potentially qualifying for ICA in Scotland.
7. Costs are provided for GB and Scotland only. Information on benefits in Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) individual documents, (b) immigration case files and (c) passports were lost by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate in each year since 1992. [127974]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is not available.

Since its expansion last October, the Integrated Casework Directorate's (ICD's) Return of Passport Unit has received 11,687 requests for the return of documents and, of those, a total of 147 lost passport letters have been issued. Lost passport letters are issued in respect of items which cannot be traced at the time a request for them is made, but which may subsequently be found.

The number of principal files recorded as lost on the Immigration and Nationality Directorate's file tracking system each year since 1993 (when the system was introduced) is as follows: 1993—97; 1994—368; 1995—534; 1996—1,160; 1997—1,599; 1998—2,095; 1999—2,567; and 2000—2,054. There are currently 8,440 files still recorded as lost.

A number of measures have been taken to prevent the loss of passports and other documents, including the introduction last autumn of new document handling processes and an expanded Return of Passport Unit in the ICD. Work is in progress on clearing the backlog of general and settlement casework and returning applicants' documents to them.

All valuable documents are now returned to applicants by recorded delivery post and new processes are being developed for dealing with packages which are returned undelivered.

Written Questions

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many written parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April; and how many have not received substantive answers, citing disproportionate cost as the reason. [128018]

Mr. Straw: My Department answered a total of 2,751 written parliamentary questions between 19 October 1999–20 April 2000, of which 23 were not given a substantive answer because to do so would have incurred disproportionate cost.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current cost of maintaining an asylum seeker, whose court case is under review, for one month; what is the current average time for reviewing asylum claims from the moment of first claim to final resolution; and if he will make a statement. [128237]

Mrs. Roche: The available information is that in 1999–2000 the total cost of supporting asylum seekers was £590 million.

Information on the average decision time from initial claim to final resolution and on the cost of supporting an asylum seeker for one month is not currently available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average length of the decision process was for each category of asylum seeker in the last 12 months. [128565]

Mrs. Roche: Information on the average decision time from initial claim to final resolution for each category of asylum seeker is not currently available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what restrictions apply to asylum seekers undertaking voluntary activity; what plans he has to review these restrictions; and if he will make a statement. [128567]

Mrs. Roche: There are no restrictions on asylum seekers participating in genuine voluntary work. Difficulties may arise however where a person seeks to perform voluntary work but where there is some form of remuneration such as "expenses" or remuneration in kind. It is then much more difficult to determine whether the work is genuinely voluntary or whether there is an element of employment involved.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of his Department's staff have been involved in asylum casework in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [128566]

Mrs. Roche: The Department does not hold records prior to 1996 and for later years the information does not exist in the form requested. The only readily available information, set out in the table, is for the numbers of staff employed in the Asylum Directorate between 1996 and 1998.

As at 1 April	Number of staff
1996	[1]782.4
1997	[1]689.0
1998	[1]524.4
1999	Not readily available
2000	702

[1] Full-time equivalents

The numbers for 1996 to 1998 include those who support and manage the staff who make the decisions, as well as the decision makers. Comparisons between 1996 to 1998 figures and those for 1999 and 2000 are difficult because of the reorganisation of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate in December 1998. Asylum applications were previously handled in a dedicated asylum directorate. In 1999 they were dealt with in integrated teams which also dealt with a variety of other immigration issues, and thus a separate figure is not available. Currently, asylum applications are dealt with in dedicated teams.

Schengen Agreement

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes will be required to domestic legislation to permit partial UK participation in the Schengen Agreement. [128138]

Mrs. Roche: We are currently examining what changes will be needed to United Kingdom primary legislation in order to implement the United Kingdom's partial participation in the Schengen acquis. We anticipate a need for primary legislation relating to police co-operation in connection with cross-border surveillance and to areas of judicial co-operation. The latter aspect is linked to the legislative requirements for ratification of the European Union's Conventions on Mutual Legal Assistance and Extradition. Further discussion is taking place with our Schengen partners to clarify whether the application of certain provisions on data protection will require amendment to current data protection legislation.

Metropolitan Police Authority

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who is the representative on the Metropolitan Police Authority whose responsibilities cover the area of Leyton and Wanstead. [128103]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that the Metropolitan Police Authority is currently considering whether each of their members should be given responsibility for particular areas within the Metropolitan Police District and, if so, how.

Immigration

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account the Immigration Service takes of ticketless airline travel in reaching immigration decisions; and if he will make a statement. [128106]

Mrs. Roche: The lack of a ticket is not in itself conclusive when an Immigration Officer reaches a decision about the admissibility of a passenger under the Immigration Rules. Immigration Officers often ask passengers to show their onward or return tickets as evidence of their intention to leave the United Kingdom, but where a passenger has booked a ticket using modern Information Technology methods—so called "ticketless travel"—he/she will normally be in possession of a printed itinerary giving full details of his/her travel plans. In the absence of such evidence Immigration Officers have the option of contacting the airline concerned to verify that a booking exists. A passenger will not be unduly delayed for this purpose unless it is considered essential to the resolution of the case to verify that he/she has an onward or return booking, and this cannot be done easily.

Public Entertainment Licences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many public entertainment licences have been (a) revoked and (b) not renewed by local authorities under the terms of the Public Entertainments Licences (Drug Misuse) Act 1997 since 1 May 1998. [128272]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not collected centrally. Contacts with the police and the club trade suggest, however, that the powers of the Act have not yet been used by a local authority to revoke or refuse the renewal of a public entertainments licence.

The provisions of the Act are to be used as a last resort and the Home Office guidance on the implementation of the Act encourages close liaison between the police, club owners and local authorities.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department upon how many public entertainment licences new conditions have been imposed by local authorities under the terms of the Public Entertainment Licences (Drug Misuse) Act 1997 since 1 May 1998. [128273]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not collected centrally. Contacts with the police and the club trade suggest, however, that the powers in the Act have not yet been used by a local authority to impose new conditions on a public entertainments licence.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were reported to the Metropolitan police on Monday 26 June; and if he will make a statement. [128274]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is not yet available for Monday 26 June, but on the latest Monday for which the information is currently available, which was Monday 22 May 2000, 3,542 crimes were reported to the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by division of the Metropolitan Police Service the ratio of (a) reported crimes, (b) burglaries and (c) calls from computer-aided despatch per officer in each of the last five years. [128312]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from the Metropolitan police that the information could not be made available in the form requested for each of the last five years except at disproportionate cost. It should, however, be possible to provide the information for the last two years shortly, and I will write to the hon. Member when it is available.

Modes of Trial

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the defendants included in the pre-Narey pilot data who elected to be tried at

Crown court, (a) pleaded guilty to the same or to more serious offences than those they were charged with at the time of their election, (b) pleaded guilty to fewer or to less serious offences than those with which they were charged at the time of their election and (c) pleaded not guilty and went to trial at Crown court. [128549]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Home Office Research Development and Statistical Directorate is currently conducting an analysis of the alteration to charges in the sample and the results will be available later this year.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many defendants in the pre-Narey pilot data were charged with either-way offences; and of these how many (a) were directed by magistrates to be tried at Crown court, (b) elected to be tried at Crown court and (c) consented to be tried, or otherwise had their cases disposed of, by the magistrates courts. [128548]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The sample covered a total of 2,948 defendants charged with triable-either-way offences. This included 1,969 cases dealt with in the magistrates courts or in the Youth Court and 979 cases committed to the Crown court. Of the 979 defendants, 155 elected Crown court trial and 747 were directed to the Crown court. However, the number of Crown court cases in the sample was boosted in order to provide adequate numbers for analysis. This means that the committal rate is higher than the national rate. We took account of this difference when analysing the data.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the defendants included in the pre-Narey pilot data charged with either-way offences were from ethnic minority backgrounds; and how many such defendants (a) elected to be tried at Crown court and pleaded guilty to the same, or more serious offences, than those they were charged with at the time of their election, (b) elected to be tried at Crown court and pleaded guilty to fewer, or to less serious offences than those with which they were charged at the time of their election and (c) pleaded not guilty and went to trial at Crown court. [128550]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information is not available on the ethnic origin of defendants in the sample.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the guilty plea rate among defendants included in the pre-Narey pilot data was representative of the guilty plea rate nationally. [128551]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The guilty plea rates in the sample were broadly in line with national rates.

Fire and Rescue Service

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) women and (b) men are in each Fire and Rescue Service, broken down by (i) rank and (ii) retained and other status. [128337]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: All fire brigades in England and Wales are required to provide annually to Her Majesty's Fire Service Inspectorate statistical information about personnel employed, analysed by gender and ethnic origin. The tables—which provide a breakdown by gender for uniformed and non-uniformed personnel and by rank (for the whole-time and retained services), based on statistical returns from the fire services for England and Wales at 31 March 1999—have been placed in the Library.

Fines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he has taken to improve the enforcement of fines. [128393]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 3 July 2000]: I am working closely with my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor to improve the enforcement of fines.

Research is being carried out under the Government's Crime Reduction Programme to identify best practice in fine enforcement, to introduce a range of enforcement strategies in a number of pilot courts, and to evaluate the relative cost and effectiveness of those strategies. The project is due to be completed in autumn 2001.

In April 2001, responsibility for the execution of fines warrants will be transferred from the police to Magistrates Courts Committees. The fact that responsibility will rest with the courts will provide a sharper and clearer focus than the present arrangements, while the application and monitoring of administrative targets will ensure that the work receives a high priority within individual courts. As a result, more money—including compensation for the victims of crime—should be collected.

Measures in the Access to Justice Act 1999, which are also due to be implemented in April 2001, will allow the courts to check whether other Government agencies hold an up-to-date address for a 'missing' fine defaulter. This should prove helpful in reducing the currently high levels of financial penalties that have to be 'written off' because the offender cannot be traced.

A report on the pilot studies conducted on alternative means of dealing with fine defaulters introduced in the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 was published in February this year. A decision on the future of these measures will be made in due course.

Finally, following a relaxation in Treasury rules governing receipts, we are exploring the feasibility of developing a scheme which will allow a proportion of the income from fines to be retained ('netted-off') by the courts and used to make further improvements in enforcement rates.

Crime Reduction

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the timetable is for assessment of each of the category of projects under the crime reduction programme; and if he will make a statement. [128524]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The provisional timetable is shown in the table.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the targets set by his Department for the reduction of crime, the date the targets were set and the timescale of the targets; what further targets he plans to introduce; and if he will make a statement. [128525]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In September 1998, the Government set a target for a 30 per cent. reduction in thefts of and from motor vehicles. This target covers the period 1 April 1999 to 31 March 2004.

In addition, by 31 March 2000, all police authorities in England and Wales were required to set for themselves five-year targets for reductions in domestic burglary and vehicle crime. The police authorities in Greater Manchester, Merseyside, the West Midlands and West Yorkshire and the Metropolitan Police Service were also required to set five-year targets for reductions in robbery. These targets cover the period 1 April 2000 to 31 March 2005 and have been published in each police authority's Best Value Performance Plan for 2000–01. The full list of these targets, as they appear in Best Value Performance Plans, is available on the website of the Association of Police Authorities—www.apa.police.uk.

In their Best Value Performance Plans, police authorities have also set a number of other crime reduction targets which reflect local priorities.

Local Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships will set targets for April 2001.

The Home Office Public Service Agreement, which will be published to coincide with the outcome of the Spending Review 2000, is also likely to contain targets reflecting key aspects of the Department's business.

National Crime Squad

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library copies of the evidence which he has disclosed to the Court in the judicial review application by Williams Jeffery Barber on behalf of the National Crime Squad and others. [128923]

Mr. Charles Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary did not submit evidence in this case, in which the Service Authority for the National Crime Squad and National Criminal Intelligence Service, which is an independent body, sought judicial review of a decision by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

NDPBs

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the net revenue cost was in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000; and what the planned revenue cost is for 2000–01 of each of the executive and advisory non-Departmental public bodies listed on pages 88 to 96 of his Annual report for 1999–2000. [128926]

Mr. Straw: The net revenue cost and planned costs for the Home Office Executive and Advisory Non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs) are set out in the following table. I have taken "net revenue costs" to mean the Grant in Aid for Executive NDPBs minus any receipts payable to the Exchequer offsetting costs.

Neither the Tote nor the Horserace Betting Levy Board (HBLB) have any revenue cost, as they are self-financing. The expenses payable to the Alcohol Education and Research Council are within the travel and subsistence budget of the Liquor Gambling and Data Protection Unit.

It is not possible to estimate the planned costs for some Advisory Bodies, as the members of those bodies only receive expenses when necessary.

Visas

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in 1999 applied for permission to switch their visa category; how many such applications were approved; what the net cost was to public funds of handling these applications; and if he will make a statement. [128925]

Mrs. Roche: The available information relates to decisions taken on all applications to switch category after entering the country. In 1999, 40,900 principal applicants switched into a non-asylum category and 2,700 were refused. This excludes 41,700 (provisional) applications for asylum made by principal applicants after entry. I regret that the costs incurred dealing with applications to switch category cannot be separated from the overall costs of the Integrated Casework Directorate.

Porton Down

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will call for a report on progress made with the police investigation into events at Porton Down; and if he will make a statement. [127379]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Investigations are continuing. I refer to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 19 June 2000, Official Report, column 98W.

Prison Incidents

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by (a) prison and (b) categories of prisoners the number of incidents of (i) self-harm, (ii) indiscipline, (iii) assaults by prisoners on staff, (iv) assaults by prisoners on prisoners, (v) assaults by staff on prisoners, (vi) drug seizures, (vii) positive drug tests, indicating the type of drug involved and (viii) failure to complete mandatory drug tests, in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [127918]

Mr. Boateng: I have placed the information requested in the Library.

Complete records are only available centrally for periods since 1996–97. Only prisons that were operational for the years 1996–97 to 1999–2000 have been included.

The Prison Service does not collect incident data by category of prisoner. Instead the category of prison is shown. Prisons are categorised by their main function only.

Freemasons

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many forms were sent to police officers of all ranks asking if they are freemasons; how many replies stated they (a) were and (b) were not freemasons; and how many declined to answer. [129109]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Some 151,091 forms were sent to police officers and civilian support staff in 32 police forces in England and Wales. Of those, 610 who responded declared that they were freemasons, 49,431 declared that they were not freemasons, and 101,042 did not respond or responded by declining to say whether or not they were freemasons. A breakdown of figures between officers and support staff is not available.

TREASURY

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families have been in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit in each month since March. [126911]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 21 June 2000]: Provisional estimates of the number of families in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit at each end-month are as follows:

	Thousand
March 2000	1,052
April 2000	1,053

Estimated figures for the corresponding months last year are as follows:

	Thousand
March 1999	822
April 1999	823

Free Television Licences

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 June 2000, Official Report, column 274W, how many pensioner households there are in the Christchurch constituency comprising one or more people aged 75 years or over; and what was the basis for his calculation of the number of pensioners aged 75 years and over in that constituency. [125976]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 15 June 2000]: The latest available information comes from the 1991 Census New Parliamentary Constituency Monitor for the South West Government Office Region, published by the Office for National Statistics. It shows the population of the Christchurch constituency as 80,938, of which 5.3 per cent. were men aged 75 and over and 8.4 per cent. were women aged 75 and over. The Monitor does not give information on pensioner households broken down by age.

Land Value Taxation

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on land value taxation; and what taxation concessions are available for brownfield development. [127455]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 26 June 2000]: There is no specific tax on the value of land. Profits or gains from the sale of land and from development itself may be chargeable to income tax, corporation tax or capital gains tax. Sales of land are generally subject to stamp duty.

The Government will consult interested parties about a possible relief from stamp duty for new developments on brownfield sites.

Tobacco Taxation

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the revenue yield from increasing tobacco taxation by (a) 5p, (b) 10p and (c) 20p per packet of cigarettes. [127601]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 27 June 2000]: Indicative estimates of the revenue effects of changes in tobacco taxation were published in the Treasury's "Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs" in November 1999.

Single Currency

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what definition is used of socially disadvantaged individuals by the European Community in the context of requiring particular attention in the single currency information campaign. [128135]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Commission defines vulnerable groups as those people who do not have easy access to traditional information flows, for example, those who are visually impaired or hearing impaired.

Incontinence Pads

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many applications for the reimbursement of VAT paid on incontinence pads have been received in each of the last 12 months for which figures are available. [128491]

Dawn Primarolo: No VAT is charged on incontinence products supplied to an incontinent person living in their own home or to charitable providers of care.

MOD Assets

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the use made by the Ministry of Defence of Treasury Guidelines for greater commercial utilisation of Ministry of Defence property and assets. [128269]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Ministry of Defence's progress in making best use of its asset base, including commercial opportunities, is assessed in the Departmental Investment Strategy, which will be published in the autumn.

Taxpayers (Prosecutions)

Mr. Green: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent guidance he has given to the Inland Revenue about prosecuting those who are late in paying taxes. [129005]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue's prosecution policy was published on 29 November 1999 and remains in force. It can be read on the Inland Revenue's website, www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk.

National Insurance

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many married women who have retained the right to reduced liability for National Insurance contributions would qualify for (a) the minimum 25 per cent. State Retirement Pension and (b) an increased percentage of retirement pension, if they revoked the reduced liability option from the April 2000–01 tax year; and what the estimated amount of pension foregone would be in each case. [128599]

Dawn Primarolo: It is not possible to provide a reliable estimate of the numbers of married women with a valid election to pay reduced rate National Insurance contributions who would qualify for a minimum State Retirement Pension if they revoked their elections.

Foreign Taxation

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the (a) French and (b) Belgian authorities have recently requested help in recovering tax from UK citizens. [128636]

Dawn Primarolo: Assistance in recovering tax for the French or Belgian authorities is available only in relation to indirect taxes under EC Directive 76–308.

In the last three months there have been no requests from the French authorities for assistance, and in the same period the Belgian authorities requested help on two VAT cases amounting to £3,348.48 and six Excise duty cases amounting to £61,708.03.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on his Department's progress in meeting its targets for answering parliamentary questions; [129069]

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's progress on its targets for answering parliamentary questions. [129220]

Mr. Timms: The Treasury is on track to meet its targets for answering parliamentary questions in the present session.

VAT

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to zero rate the VAT payable by disabled people on the repair of their cars; and if he will make a statement. [129034]

Dawn Primarolo: There is already VAT relief on the service of repair or maintenance of motor vehicles designed or substantially and permanently adapted to carry a disabled person in a wheelchair or on a stretcher. There is also relief for disabled people leasing vehicles through the Motability scheme: the leases for these vehicles cover servicing and repair.

Alternative Care

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of reducing VAT by (a) 5 per cent. and (b) 10 per cent. on privately purchased alternative care for people in (i) Scotland and (ii) the UK. [128174]

Dawn Primarolo: VAT is not charged on supplies of privately purchased care for people in residential and nursing homes in the UK.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Waste Recycling

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for (a) Great Britain and (b) each local authority the percentage of waste recycled in (i) 1997 (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [127207]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 June 2000]: Recycling levels in Scotland are a matter for the Secretary of State for Scotland. For England and Wales the national household recycling rates for 1996–97, 1997–98 and 1998–99 were 7.5, 8.2 and 9.4 per cent. respectively. I have placed a list in the House of Commons Library setting out ranges of household recycling rates for local authorities in England and Wales. All figures are based on data from the annual DETR Municipal Waste Survey.

Transport Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the outcome was of the Transport Council held in Luxembourg on 26 and 27 June; and if he will make a statement. [128333]

Mr. Hill: The Transport Council met in Luxembourg on 26 June. I represented the United Kingdom.

At the opening of the Council, the Netherlands made a statement expressing regret at the recent incident at Dover and stressed the need for EU action on traffic in human beings. I welcomed and endorsed the Dutch statement.

The Council debated a draft directive on interoperability of the conventional rail network. The only outstanding issue was the UK and Spain's request that derogations to allow the retention of existing track or loading gauges would be automatic rather than requiring Commission approval. I am pleased to say that, following the debate, a revised text was agreed which allows the automatic derogation we had been seeking and enabled the Council to agree a common position.

The Council debated proposals arising from the loss of the oil tanker "Erika" (the 'Erika 1' package). These are revised directives on ship inspection organisations and on port state control of shipping; and a new regulation on accelerating the introduction of double hulls in oil tankers. The Council reached political agreement on the first of these, which would give the Commission responsibility for recognising member states' appointed ship inspection organisations. The Commission gave a progress report on the port state control proposal. There was a debate on double-hulled tankers, during which I noted the need for a proper economic and regulatory impact assessment. I agreed with the Commission and a number of member states that IMO action at global level would be preferable, but that otherwise EU legislation would be acceptable. These issues will be debated again at the October Council. The Council agreed conclusions, stating that further progress should be made towards the "Erika 2" package, foreseen at the Feira European Council. France stated that Erika 2 would be a priority of its Presidency.

There was a further progress report from the Commission on the Galileo satellite navigation project. The Commission said it would submit a final report on the definition phase and an economic analysis in time for the December Council, at which a final decision would have to be made on whether to go ahead with the project. At the October Council, there would be an orientation debate on structure and funding. I joined other member states in stressing the need for full cost benefit analysis and for private sector funding to make the project viable. Conclusions were agreed, urging that the Council be provided with sufficient information early in the autumn to allow it to take a decision on Galileo's future.

The Commission gave a further presentation of its Communication on air passenger rights, underlining the need for progress with legislation or voluntary action in various areas of passenger protection, including the setting of minimum contract requirements for ticket purchase. Further work will be done to prepare for a discussion at the October Council.

The Commission gave its view of progress on work to create common EU structures for air traffic management (ATM). This might include the establishment of bodies to regulate European ATM. The Commission noted that separation of provision and regulation of ATM services was vital, to implement the conclusions of the European Councils at Lisbon and Feira.

The Council agreed that the Commission proposals on cabin crew qualifications in civil aviation should be re-examined in the light of the recent proposal to transpose standards drawn up by the Joint Aviation Authorities into Community law.

The Presidency presented a paper describing recent discussions on the establishment of a European aviation safety authority (EASA). The point at issue is whether the Commission should work up detailed proposals for an EU agency, rather than an international organisation. The Presidency presented a paper which analysed whether an EU agency could effectively promote air safety across Europe. I said that the UK was open to the idea of an EU agency, but that such an agency would have to have sufficient power to take safety decisions effectively, involve member states and national safety regulators fully in its work, and involve non-EU states as fully as possible. It should not initially cover safety of airports or air traffic management. The Council invited the Commission to make a formal proposal for an EU agency.

The Council also discussed the Transatlantic Common Aviation Area (TCAA). The Commission is seeking a mandate allowing it to negotiate a TCAA agreement with the US on behalf of the EU. The UK has on previous occasions made clear that it gives priority to its bilateral negotiations with the US, which are continuing. Technical work on the likely shape of a Commission mandate has been taking place, and the UK has been participating in that. The Presidency concluded that the Council was satisfied with the technical work, and asked for further work to be done by COREPER, to allow a decision on the mandate to be taken in December.

The Commission reported on developments in the area of aviation noise standards. They noted the good progress in defining new standards within the ICAO CAEP process.

The Council agreed a wide-ranging Resolution on road safety, following the Commission Communication presented to the March Council. Among areas identified for legislative action are: further development of the European new vehicles crash testing programme (EuroNCAP), use of speed limiters on larger vehicles, higher levels of seatbelt and child restraint usage, safer car fronts, and targeting of accident blackspots. The Resolution also refers to the Commission's intention to bring forward a recommendation for member states to introduce a maximum blood alcohol level of 0.5 milligrams per millilitre.

Two road transport issues were debated: a proposed Regulation on transit quotas ("ecopoints") for lorries passing through Austria; and a proposal on the allocation of Swiss transit permits for heavy lorries. The former concerns a proposal to reduce the ecopoint quotas of five member states, a legal requirement under the terms of Austria's Act of Accession. The member states affected (which do not include the UK) expressed their opposition to this measure and the Presidency instructed COREPER to re-examine the proposal. The Commission noted that unless an alternative proposal emerges, and is agreed upon, the Commission regulation will automatically come into effect on 20 September. The Commission also introduced its amended proposal for the distribution of permits for heavy goods vehicles travelling in Switzerland. The permit allocations for individual member states were in the process of being revised in the light of recently completed analyses of trade and traffic statistics in the Alpine region. The Presidency asked for further work to be done by COREPER to prepare for decision at the October Council.

Under other business the Commission presented its new "Communication on safer and more competitive quality road transport in the Community", covering such issues as working and driving time for lorry drivers, conditions for employment of non-EU hauliers, and driver training. This will be a priority issue for debate during the French presidency.

Vehicle Speeds

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the national transport plan and local transport plans will give priority to slower speeds for vehicular traffic on roads where the risk of injury to other road users is significant. [128547]

Mr. Hill: Our guidance on local transport plans makes clear that authorities should ensure that safety is a key element in all aspects of their plan. Authorities are required to prepare a road safety strategy, which must contain local casualty reduction targets for 2005 and annual milestone targets. While the precise package of measures used to achieve these targets is a matter for individual authorities, we would expect to see many making use of traffic management measures and lower speed limits.

PSV Provisional Licences

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the average processing time is for PSV provisional driver licences; and if he will make a statement. [128448]

Mr. Hill: Since April the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency has processed 95 per cent. of PSV provisional driving licences within five working days of receipt. Allowing three days for delivery of the licence by Royal Mail this means the overall turnaround is eight days from the date of receipt. This is an improvement on last year's turnaround, which was nine days overall.

Beacon Councils

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much money his Department has awarded to (a) Stockport MBC and (b) Tameside MBC to celebrate beacon status; and what guidance he has issued on how the money is to be spent. [128879]

Ms Armstrong: This year we are providing £700,000 for beacon councils. Subject to approval by the House of the Special Grant Report (number 64) which was laid on 27 June, this amount will be distributed as specified in the report among the 33 successful applicants for beacon status, including Stockport and Tameside, as a contribution to the costs they incur as beacons in disseminating their good practice.

Guidance on the special grant was contained in the Beacon Council Application Brochure published in May 1999, and in the draft Special Grant Report circulated to each of the beacon councils earlier this year.

Brownfield Development

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of planning decisions made in the last year resulted in brownfield development. [128634]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Information on the number of planning decisions resulting in development on brownfield sites is not available centrally. However, the latest estimates show that, in 1994, 48 per cent. of land changing to urban uses (as defined for DETR's Land Use Change Statistics) was previously developed.

London Underground

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 19 June 2000, Official Report, column 6W, concerning the provisions of European Community treaties affecting the expenditure of London Underground, what communications he, or his predecessors, have received from the Commission of the European Communities, (a) based on Article 88 of the Treaty of European Union and (b) under any other title of that or any other Community or Union Treaty, relating to public borrowing or revenue support, or the manner of its subsequent expenditure; and what arrangements are made for any such communications to be inspected. [128850]

Mr. Hill: We have received no such communications concerning London Underground.

Transport Infrastructure (St. Albans)

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action his Department is taking to improve the transport infrastructure in the St. Albans constituency. [128893]

Mr. Hill: In last December's Local Transport Plan Financial Settlement Hertfordshire County Council received a total block allocation of £9,467,000. This consisted of £5,000,000 for integrated transport, an increase of 19 per cent. from the previous year, and £4,467,000 for maintenance and bridges, an increase of 83 per cent. from the previous year reflecting the poor condition of some of the County's roads.

It is of course for the County Council to decide how this funding should be used and which schemes to promote and we must leave these local projects to the responsible authorities to develop in conjunction with local partners and interests. The local transport plan process emphasises the need to work with the full range of transport providers, businesses, communities and interest groups.

Hertfordshire County Council will be submitting their full Local Transport Plan in July and I understand that they will be including an Area Plan for mid Bedfordshire. Within this is a programme of improvements for St. Albans which includes, among other elements, improving bus infrastructure, cycling and pedestrian facilities.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what standard penalty clauses are included in private finance initiative contracts for roads; and how many of these have been invoked. [128589]

Mr. Hill: Penalties in contracts are not enforceable at law. My Department's privately financed contracts for roads include provisions for ensuring proper performance. In all these contracts performance defaults may lead to the accumulation of points which, through a hierarchical structure, could lead to increased monitoring at contractor expense and ultimately, to contract termination. A number of such points have been awarded on seven of the eight privately financed trunk road contracts in England.

Council Tax (Carers)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the cost of extending carers' council tax discounts by (a) five per cent. and (b) 10 per cent. to those caring for partners or disabled children in (i) Scotland and (ii) the UK. [128171]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 4 July 2000]: As council tax is a devolved matter, it is for the Parliament and Assembly to answer about the situation in Scotland and Wales.

The information for England is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Council tax does not operate in Northern Ireland.

RDAs

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the projects successfully undertaken by each of the regional development agencies since April 1999 and make a statement on their progress to date. [129113]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The Regional Development Agencies were responsible for approximately 5,000 projects in 1999–2000. Collating this amount of information could be completed only at disproportionate cost.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each of the last three years (a) the number of applications for mobile telecommunication masts that were the subject of appeals to the Secretary of State and (b) the number of appeal decisions where the local planning authority's decision was upheld. [128937]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Information is not held about telecommunications masts specifically. The following is information relating to appeal decisions about telecommunications development generally.

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–200
Number of appeal decisions made in each year for telecommunications development	122	142	184
Number of appeal decisions made in each year that upheld the local planning authority's decision	68	67	83

Rents

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his latest estimate is of the comparative rent levels of council tenants and housing association tenants. [129122]

Ms Armstrong: The latest period for which both Local Authority and Registered Social Landlord rent figures in England are available is the financial year 1998–99. Average Local Authority rents for 1998–99 were £42.33 per week and those for Registered Social Landlord rents in England were £51.65 per week. Registered Social Landlords are former housing associations that are officially registered with the Housing Corporation.

The average rent figures for local authorities and RSLs are not directly comparable because they do not take into account differences in the composition of stock, e.g. size and type of dwellings, their age and condition.

Housing Green Paper

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the representations received in response to the Housing Green Paper. [129121]

Ms Armstrong: The consultation on the Housing Green Paper runs until 31 July. Responses will in due course be made available for public inspection in the Department's library, unless submitted on a confidential basis.

Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations

Mr. Alan Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he proposes to issue guidance on the forthcoming Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations. [129582]

Mr. Hill: Advance copies of "Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control: A Practical Guide" have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The guidance describes the main provisions of the new Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control regime to be set up under the Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations, a draft of which was laid before Parliament on 15 June. The guidance will set out how the Secretary of State expects to see the regulatory regime applied, and how certain terms are to be interpreted. It will complement the Environment Agency's package of technical guidance.

The guidance will be made more widely available once the regulations have been made.

Road Safety

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government plan to launch the Road Safety Advisory Panel, announced in the road safety strategy "Tomorrow's Roads—Safer For Everyone". [129583]

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government plan to launch the Road Safety Advisory Panel, as announced in the road safety strategy "Tomorrow's Roads—Safer For Everyone". [129603]

Mr. Hill: The new Road Safety Advisory Panel was launched today, and my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Lord Whitty) chaired the first meeting. The Panel includes representatives of the main stakeholders in road safety, including the police, local authorities, road safety organisations, road user groups and other Government Departments. Its remit is to provide advice to Ministers on road safety policies and to advise on the planned three yearly reviews of progress towards the casualty reduction targets set in the road safety strategy.

HEALTH

Vaccination

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 506W, (1) what are the benefits and risks that are considered and constantly reviewed for each individual vaccination; [124762]

(2) what are the serious adverse reactions to vaccination; and how rare they are. [124761]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The benefits of vaccination are the prevention of illness and death from infectious diseases. These benefits are assessed from clinical trials and epidemiological studies, prior to authorisation for clinical use. Following the introduction of a vaccine, there is ongoing monitoring of disease incidence rates and, where appropriate, outcomes.

The risks of immunisation to the individual are those of adverse reactions from the vaccine. These risks are evaluated both before and after authorisation using a range of data sources including clinical trials, spontaneous adverse reaction reports from health professionals, epidemiological studies and the published scientific literature.

The Department publishes full information on the benefits and serious adverse reactions to vaccination in the book 'Immunisation against infectious disease', copies of which are available in the Library. Vaccine-associated paralytic polio is the only serious reaction where evidence supports the suggestion of a causal association and there are demonstrated long-term consequences; this occurs in one out of approximately every million immunisations.

The authorised Summary of Product Characteristics for each product contains important prescribing information on individual vaccines and possible undesirable effects. These are available in the Compendium of Data Sheets and Summaries of Product Characteristics published by the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry. The Summary is updated throughout the lifetime of the product, as new information becomes available.

Compulsory Treatment Orders

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received from mental health users regarding the proposed introduction of compulsory treatment orders in the community. [125938]

Mr. Hutton: Our proposals to extend compulsory powers under the Mental Health Act beyond hospital settings formed part of our Green Paper "Reform of the Mental Health Act 1983". Consultation on this Green Paper ended on 31 March. We have received over 1,000 responses to this consultation from a wide range of people, including mental health users. Among these was a representation from the Mental Health Alliance, an umbrella group for a variety of organisations, which I received at their recent lobby of Parliament. We are now considering them carefully. I will make an announcement on how we will take this forward in the near future.

Medicine Prices

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what powers he has to control the prices of (a) parallel-traded branded medicines, (b) branded medicines dispensed against generic prescriptions and (c) branded generic medicines. [126666]

Ms Stuart: The prices of branded medicines derived from parallel trade follow those not so derived. The price of a branded medicine is unaffected if it dispensed against a generic prescription.

The prices of branded medicines, whether generic or not, are controlled indirectly though the operation of the 1999 Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme (PPRS), a voluntary arrangement which aims to secure the provision of safe and effective medicines for the National Health Service at reasonable prices. Whether the prices are reasonable is determined by the level of profits which manufacturers make from sales to the NHS. The operation of the PPRS is described in detail in the "Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme: Third Report to Parliament December 1999", copies of which are available in Library.

Section 34 of the Health Act 1999 allows my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to limit the prices of branded medicines supplied to the NHS by companies which are not members of the 1999 PPRS. This power has not been exercised because all major manufacturers of branded medicines are members of the 1999 PPRS.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were waiting for admission to hospitals, including suspended patients but not including self-deferred cases, (a) in (i) Great Britain and (ii) each health authority, in (1) 1987 and (2) 1992 and (b) in (A) Great Britain and (B) each NHS trust in each year since 1995. [127209]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 23 June 2000]: The information requested for England has been placed in the Library. Matters for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are for their respective Administrations.

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of in-patients are treated at the Diana Princess of Wales hospital in Grimsby in (a) one month or less, (b) three months, (c) six months and (d) over six months; [128500]

(2) what percentage of in-patients are treated at Scunthorpe hospital in (a) one month or less, (b) three months, (c) six months and (d) over six months. [128501]

Mr. Hutton: The latest available information is given in the table.

In patients treated

Elective waiting list admissions	9,683	18,740
Elective waiting list admissions:

NHS Staff

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) administrative staff, (b) managerial staff, (c) nurses, (d) junior doctors and (e) other medical staff were employed in each region in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [127691]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The information requested is shown in the table.

Dental Services (Prisons)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the provision of NHS dentists in prisons. [128159]

Mr. Hutton: In most cases dental services to prisoners are provided by visiting general dental practitioners working under NHS general dental services arrangements. Some individual prisons contract for dental services with another provider, usually the Community Dental Service, but sometimes with an individual dentist.

As part of the prison health care reforms now under way, all prisons and the health authorities in which they are situated are assessing prisoners' health needs and drawing up health improvement plans, which include dentistry. These assessments will help inform how dental services can best be delivered in the future.

Carers

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what evaluation he has made of the on-line information service for carers, Starthere, referred to in the National Strategy for Carers; [128263]

(2) what assessment he has made of the availability of on-line information for carers; [128264]

(3) what assessment he has made of South Staffordshire's on-line information service for carers. [128265]

(4) what action he plans to take to co-ordinate on-line information services for carers. [128266]

Mr. Hutton: Many carers will not have access to the Internet and will therefore be more likely to use other sources of information (such as: telephone helplines, carers' centres, leaflets in general practitioners' surgeries etc.). However, on-line services are an increasingly important element of information and support to carers as "Caring About Carers", the report of the National Carers Strategy, makes clear.

The Department launched the Government's carers' website (www.carers.gov.uk) in February 2000 to allow the increasing numbers of carers who are on the Internet (or those supporting them such as carers' workers) easy access to a range of relevant Government information. There are links to National Health Service, Department of Trade and Industry, Department of Social Security, Department for Education and Employment and Employment Service sites as well as those of carers' organisations. The Department of Health controls and updates the website to co-ordinate the links to make them easy for carers to use. The process of assessing the availability of on-line information is therefore an on-going one. The website has been very well received by carers and professionals.

The Department does not conduct detailed evaluations of all available on-line information services for carers. Starthere receives funding under s64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 and is being monitored and evaluated accordingly. Recent research undertaken in pilot sites in The Whittington Hospital and GPs' surgeries in North London revealed a very high level of satisfaction.

I am aware of the very helpful Staffordshire Carers' Information website (Resources Bank to Support the Caring Role at Staffordshire University Lichfield Centre) and my officials are making arrangements for a hyperlink from our website to be made to it.

Maternity Leave (GPs)

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the arrangements are for maternity leave for GPs; and if he will make a statement. [128283]

Mr. Denham: The payments due to a GP on maternity leave are available for a maximum period of 14 weeks. The period for which a GP may need to be absent from her practice prior to, and after, the birth, is a matter for individual assessment. A GP who is absent for a period longer than this, before or after the confinement, will be eligible for payments under the sickness payments scheme provided that these further absences are due to illness, whether or not this is caused by or attributable to her pregnancy or the birth of the child.

Certain additional payments may be made to a woman GP during absences due to her pregnancy and her childbirth. Payments will be intended to reimburse her in part for the cost of a locum necessarily engaged to look after her patients.

Salaried GPs are treated as employees and therefore receive statutory maternity pay.

Disability

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are currently registered as wholly or partially disabled (a) nationally, (b) in Teesside and (c) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128513]

Mr. Hutton: Information is not available in the requested format. The table shows the number of people on registers of blind and partially sighted persons, deaf or hard of hearing persons or on registers for people with physical disabilities (general classes). Registration is voluntary and is not a pre-requisite to the provision of services. Figures should not, therefore, be taken as an indicator of prevalence nor of the number of people who are in contact with social services.

Persons on disability registers as at 31 March 1993, 1997 and 1998

Rounded numbers

	1993 Register of people with general disabilities	1997 Registered as blind or partially sighted	1998 Registered as deaf or hard of hearing

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact on religious liberties of the proposal to ban the use of implements in the physical punishment of children by parents included in the document "Protecting Children, Supporting Parents". [129076]

Mr. Hutton: The consultation document "Protecting Children, Supporting Parents" was informed primarily by our recognition of the importance of the family and the need to strengthen it, through support to families with children.

Over 800 replies were received in response to the consultation, a number of which were from faith-based organisations and from individuals who cited the importance of their faith in informing their response. These responses will be considered carefully alongside all of the other responses.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances the use of an implement in the exercise of physical punishment of children by their parents would be considered unreasonable, as proposed in the consultation document "Protecting Children, Supporting Parents". [129082]

Mr. Hutton: In the consultation document "Protecting Children, Supporting Parents", published in January 2000, six questions were raised for consultation within the context of three possible future options for change. These are all based on the proposal that the defence of reasonable chastisement be set out on a statutory basis. The questions are then raised as to whether the following circumstances can be made reasonable:

> physical punishment which causes, or is likely to cause, injury to the head (including injuries to the brain, eyes and ears) > physical punishment using implements (e.g. canes, slippers, belts).

Those of the over 800 responses received which address these questions will be considered as part of the process of analysing the contributions of respondents.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Joannou and Paraskevaides Group

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what construction contracts his Department has awarded to the Joannou and Paraskevaides Group in the last three years. [123144]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Department for Education and Employment has awarded no construction contracts to the Joannou and Paraskevaides Group in the last three years.

Examination Results

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list in respect of each of the last three years (a) the percentage of pupils achieving 5 or more A*-C grades at GCSE and (b) the average points score at A level for pupils attending (i) specialist schools and (ii) comprehensive schools (excluding specialist schools) in England. [127867]

Mr. Wicks: The information requested on GCSEs and GCE A level is shown in the following table. However, it is not possible to make year-on-year comparisons, as the number of specialist schools has increased each year; therefore, the schools in each of the categories have changed.

Percentage

	1997	1998	1999
(a) Percentage of 15-year-old pupils achieving 5 or more GCSE grades A-C*
(i) in specialist schools	50.8	52.2	53.3
(ii) in comprehensive schools excluding specialist schools	41.6	42.3	44

More detailed analysis is available for specialist school performance from the year each school became specialist up to 1998. The annual average improvement in the proportion of pupils achieving at least 5 or more GCSEs

A*-C for specialist schools between 1994 and 1998 was 1.11 percentage points; for non-specialist schools it was 0.75.

	1997	1998	1999
(b) Average GCE A/AS point score of candidates aged 16–18 entered for 2 or more GCE A/AS
(i) in specialist schools	17.4	18.2	18.3
(ii) in comprehensive schools excluding specialist schools	16.3	16.6	16.8

Social Exclusion

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his Department's assessment of the measures required to tackle labour market access for the most disadvantaged groups; and what policies are in place to apply such measures. [127965]

Ms Jowell: The Government's key economic aim is high and stable levels of employment so everyone can share in growing living standards and greater job opportunities. The ambition is that, by the end of the decade, there will be a higher percentage of people in employment than ever before.

An important element of the Government's approach is to address labour market disadvantage to achieve employment opportunities for all. Policies encourage employers to consider the widest range of people for their vacancies—including the long-term unemployed, the economically inactive, people with disabilities, people from ethnic minorities and older people.

To achieve these aims, the Government have put in place a national framework, supplemented by locally targeted policies:

- a stable macroeconomic platform to promote steady, sustained growth in output and jobs
- policies to promote competition, innovation and enterprise
- investing in education and training so people have the skills they need to take up work
- a labour market policy with a strong work focus linking active and continuous jobsearch with payment of benefit. Through this, and the network of local Employment Service Jobcentres, all unemployed people have regular access to vacancies, advice and help with jobsearch throughout their period of unemployment
- a range of New Deal programmes to help those without a job—especially the long-term unemployed and those on inactive benefits—back into the labour market and from there into work
- policies such as the National Minimum Wage and Working Families Tax Credit designed to make work pay
- the national childcare strategy to increase the range of jobs that are open to people
- Employment Zones, regional policies such as Regional Selective Assistance, the Single Regeneration Budget and the New Deal for Communities, designed to boost the infrastructure and human capital of particularly disadvantaged localities

Since spring 1997, the Labour Force Survey shows that the number of people in jobs has risen by 978,000. Three fifths of this increase (570,000) has come from people who were previously economically inactive and two fifths (407,000) from a fall in unemployment. 85 per cent. of the fall in unemployment (353,000) has come from people who had been out of work for one year or more.

These figures are encouraging but there is still more to do.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 554W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128239]

Mr. Wills: The table lists the names of the companies as referred to in my answer of 21 December 1999 and indicates where the secondee worked within DfEE.

Company
Glaxo Wellcome	Higher Education Funding Division
Aquemen	Private Finance Division
BBC	University for Industry—(UFI) Team Broadcasting Adviser
BBC	University for Industry—(UFI) Team Broadcasting Adviser
Pannell Kerr Foster Associates	Private Finance Division
LINK Group	Individual Learning Accounts
ICL	UFI Transition Team

In each case the secondees worked on developing and delivering Government policy in the areas described above.

Southwark LEA

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action he intends to take in response to the most recent Ofsted report on Southwark local education authority. [128489]

Ms Estelle Morris: Consultants were employed, jointly by the DfEE and Southwark Council following December's Ofsted report, to advise on ways to improve the LEA's performance and to raise standards in Southwark schools. As a result of their recommendations, Southwark advertised for a strategic partner in March. Two bids have been shortlisted, and there is currently a rigorous process of clarification and evaluation involving both bidders, DfEE and Southwark, aided by consultants. We will select an appropriate model of partnership and a partner with whom the Council will enter into a formal agreement. The partner will, as a minimum, take over the running of the School Improvement Service and play a major role in strategic policy formation. A wider element of service delivery may be included.

Rural Schools

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures he has taken to enhance the role of rural schools within their local communities. [127919]

Ms Estelle Morris: Our guidance on the reorganisation of schools makes it clear that there should be a presumption against the closure of rural schools, and we are encouraging community use of school facilities. Our recent booklet "Raising Standards: Opening Doors" encourages imaginative approaches to community use of schools, and a manual is being developed to support schools in their work with the community. We recently introduced a new Standards Fund grant for small schools to help reduce the administrative burden on heads and teachers, and from September an additional Small School Support Fund will encourage small schools to consider and pilot new ways of working with others.

Standard Spending Assessment (Kent)

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how much of its standard spending assessment Kent Education Authority allocated to post-16 education between 1997–98 and 2000–01 (a) in absolute terms and (b) per pupil; [128743]

(2) how much of their standard spending assessment the statistical neighbours of Kent Education Authority have allocated to post-16 education between 1997–98 and 2000–01 (a) in absolute terms and (b) per pupil. [128744]

Ms Estelle Morris: This information is not available. Local education authorities allocate funding to schools using various factors and there is no separate post-16 component to mirror that used in the standard spending assessment process. Furthermore, central spending by the LEA on secondary education is not separately analysed into pre-16 and post-16 components.

New University (Shropshire)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will examine the feasibility of establishing a university in Shropshire; and if he will make a statement. [128761]

Mr. Wicks: It is for the higher education funding councils to offer advice to the Government on such matters in the light of representations made locally. We are not aware of any representations about the feasibility of establishing a university in Shropshire.

Business Start-ups

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what resources and money are being made available to help people who are aged 50 years and over, who are not working, to set up their own businesses; and if he will make a statement. [128804]

Ms Jowell: People aged over 50 who are looking for work and are considering self-employment may be eligible for Work Based Learning for Adults. This programme provides: initial support and advice; awareness of the implications of self-employment; help to develop business plans; appropriate skills training; and ongoing mentoring while in training. The budget for Work Based Learning for Adults for this year is £316 million for England.

New Deal 50 plus provides practical advice and financial support for people moving back to work and this support extends to those who become self-employed or set up in business. The Employment Credit of £60 a week for up to a year for those working full-time and the in-work Training Grant of up to £750 provide vital financial support for the individual in their first year back in work. The budget for New Deal 50 plus this year is £120 million for Great Britain.

In addition, from April next year, New Deal 25 plus will be offering a dedicated route into self-employment.

The Department for Education and Employment is also helping to fund PRIME, an initiative modelled on the Prince's Trust. PRIME intends to offer advice and financial support for people over 50 wishing to set up their own business.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is providing information about help provided by DTI programmes.

Swimming Lessons

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what support and assistance he will provide to schools in order to ensure that children are provided with adequate swimming lessons. [128822]

Jacqui Smith: The National Curriculum has always entitled all children to learn to swim unaided for a distance of 25 metres by the time they leave primary school. We have asked Ofsted to report on swimming at Key Stages 1 and 2, using enhanced inspection evidence gathered during November 1999 and information from their existing inspection database. We anticipate receiving their report within the next few months and will then consider their findings.

Training of Scientists

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what consultations he has had with Ministers and officials in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions in respect of the training of scientists with the appropriate expertise to manage radioactive waste. [128862]

Mr. Wicks: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has had no consultation with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on this subject.

Performance-related Pay

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers employed in schools in the London Borough of Wandsworth have applied for the performance-related pay scheme; and if he will make a statement. [128892]

Ms Estelle Morris: At this stage, information relating to applications for threshold assessment has not been analysed in sufficient detail to identify the numbers applying from Wandsworth. We will be making this information available in due course.

Chief Inspector of Schools

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on what date the contract of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools expires. [129020]

Ms Estelle Morris: Chris Woodhead's current term of employment as HM Chief Inspector of Schools ends on 31 August 2003.

Equal Treatment Directive

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the implications of the proposed EU Council directive, establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation for religious liberties. [129086]

Ms Jowell: The Employment Directive is still being negotiated and we will work with our partners in other member states to ensure that its provisions relating to religious liberties are clear, workable and consistent with the existing position in the UK.

DEFENCE

Dockyards

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent meetings he has held with trade unions to discuss dockyard work loads. [128769]

Mr. Spellar: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and the rest of his ministerial team met senior trade unions national officers on 12 June 2000 to discuss, among other matters, the management of overall capacity for warship support and maintenance.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans for efficiency savings he has made with regard to Royal Navy dockyards; and if he will make a statement. [128768]

Mr. Spellar: As part of the Defence Logistic Organisation's drive to reduce costs while increasing the quality of logistic support to the Front Line, discussions have commenced with the privatised dockyard companies and senior trades union national officers looking for innovative ways to reduce the current excess capacity for warship support and maintenance. It is too early to say what this will mean in terms of efficiency savings.

Precision Bombing

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will acquire GPS tail kits for all RAF iron bombs. [129080]

Mr. Spellar: On current plans, we aim to introduce an all-weather precision bombing capability in 2006. The Kosovo campaign confirmed the need to improve our capability in this area and we are examining the scope for advancing this date alongside other high priorities.

Various technological solutions are available that could provide autonomous guidance for a weapon which meets this requirement, including the use of Global Positional System (GPS) technology.

There is not considered to be a requirement to acquire all-weather guidance for all our bombs. Laser guided bombs such as Paveway 2 and 3 remain highly cost effective weapons in the majority of weather conditions.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will acquire the Maverick missile system. [129081]

Mr. Hoon: The Kosovo campaign identified the need to enhance our precision attack capability. In March, I announced the start of work to trial the integration of Maverick anti-armour missiles onto RAF Harrier GR7. Trials are proceeding and further decisions will be taken when they are complete.

TREASURY

European Investment Bank

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those UK companies which receive financial support from the European Investment Bank; for what reason such assistance is provided; and if he will make a statement. [123623]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information is given in the 1999 EIB Annual Report, which is available in the Library.

European Integration

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which areas have been identified by (a) member states and (b) European Community institutions as requiring additional pooling of sovereignty for the better functioning of the single currency zone. [123613]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 71W.

Euro

Tony Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish an independent assessment of the extent to which the five economic tests for entry into the single currency have been met at the time when the Government make their recommendations on entry; [128627]

(2) what plans he has to publish the Treasury's assessment of whether the five economic tests for membership of the single currency have been met. [128628]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Treasury published the paper "UK Membership of the Single Currency: An Assessment of the Five Economic Tests" in October 1997. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said we will make another assessment of the five economic tests early in the nextParliament.

Road Fuel

Mr. Norman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from fuel retailers about rates of duty on diesel and petrol in Northern Ireland and their impact on cross-border smuggling of fuel; and if he will make a statement. [129063]

Mr. Timms: I met with the Northern Ireland Committee of the Petrol Retailers Association in October 1999 to discuss the cross-border smuggling of road fuels in Northern Ireland and its impact on the petrol retail industry.

Treasury Ministers continue to receive representations about the rates of duty on diesel and petrol in Northern Ireland. In addition to representations directly from the Petrol Retailers Association, some individual retailers have contacted their Members of Parliament who have then written to Treasury Ministers on their behalf.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the quantity of smuggled road fuel of each type seized by the customs officers in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years and the current year; and how much revenue these seizures represented. [128611]

Mr. Timms: The seizures for financial years 1995–96 to 1998–99 are in the Northern Ireland Select Committee Third Report (July 1999). The seizures for the financial year 1999–2000 are as follows:

Volume seized (litres)	Revenue (£)
1,037,001[1]	528,870

[1] a breakdown by type is not available

The seizures for the current year are not yet available.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he (1) takes to ensure that answers to parliamentary questions are dealt with in accordance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information; [129068]

(2) has undertaken to ensure that answers to parliamentary questions are dealt with in accordance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. [129217]

Mr. Timms: Treasury Ministers seek to answer parliamentary questions fully, providing Members with the information they are seeking. In those cases where it is not possible to do so—for example, if the information requested is not available, if it would be disproportionately costly to obtain it, or if it is appropriate under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information not to disclose the information—it is our practice to explain the reason in the answer.

Tax Law Rewrite

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the future work programme of the Tax Law Rewrite project; and if it includes the rewriting of the Pay As You Earn Regulations. [129448]

Dawn Primarolo: I am pleased to say that the Tax Law Rewrite project is making very good progress and continues to enjoy wide support. A rewritten draft Capital Allowances Bill will be published at the end of July, for final consultations. It is planned to be ready for introduction in Parliament towards the end of this year.

Work also continues on the much larger task of rewriting the Income Tax legislation. For practical reasons, this will be enacted in stages. The first Income Tax Bill—covering employment income and possibly social security and pensions income—is planned to be ready in November 2002. The aim is to have a second Income Tax Bill—covering trading income, property income and savings and investment income—ready for November 2003.

Although the project's remit does not extend to secondary legislation, I am pleased to announce that—as an exception—the rewriting of the PAYE Regulations will be included in the work programme for the first Income Tax Bill. This should be warmly welcomed by employers. The aim is for the rewritten Regulations to come into force at the same time as the first Income Tax Bill, in April 2003.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to allow members of occupational schemes to make contributions to stakeholder pensions. [129604]

Miss Melanie Johnson: We will shortly table an amendment to the Finance Bill to allow members of an occupational pension scheme, who earn under £30,000 per year and who are not controlling directors, to contribute up to £3,600 a year to a personal or stakeholder pension scheme. This will extend the opportunity of new low cost, good value, portable stakeholder pensions to about 8 million more people. It will allow nearly 90 per cent. of employees who have an occupational pension to also pay into a stakeholder pension.

A copy of the joint Inland Revenue/Department of Social Security press notice, giving further details of the arrangements, will be placed in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Exports

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to seek a change in EU law to limit the number of cycles of travel and rest for animals while being exported to other European countries; and if he will make a statement. [126903]

Mr. Morley: We shall be seeking substantial improvements to the EU requirements on the welfare of animals in transit when the Commission brings forward the updating proposals that it has promised for later this year. We shall wish the improvements to include strict and enforceable provisions on the permissible length of journeys.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with his EU counterparts on milk quotas; and if he will make a statement. [126959]

Ms Quin: During the Agenda 2000 negotiations, regular meetings were held with agriculture ministers from other EU member states regarding milk quotas. Further discussions will be held in the run up to the review of the milk quota system in 2003.

Organic Farming

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received from commercial organisations about the percentage of food consumed in the UK which is (a) organically produced and (b) produced by (i) genetic modification and (ii) biotechnology; and what estimates commercial organisations have given him of the amount that will be so produced in 2010. [127015]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 20 June 2000]: I have received no recent representations from commercial organisations about the percentage of food, provided by any of the above methods, that is currently consumed in the United Kingdom, or estimated for production in the year 2010.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 57W, on organic farming, what have been the major conclusions of the organic research programme on (a) constraints on production, (b) costs of the conversion period and (c) the environmental impact. [126475]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The majority of the projects funded under the Ministry's organic R&D programme address issues relating to constraints on production and the cost of conversion. These projects have considered a considerable number of issues both specifically and in the context of ongoing studies of agricultural systems. Research on the environmental impact of organic farming has concluded that organic regimes can benefit biodiversity at the farm-level although, the impact is farm-specific and dependent on the management of the farm both before and after conversion to the organic system. Lists of projects funded from 1997–98 are posted on the Ministry's website. Reports containing the conclusions of completed projects are available from the Ministry on request.

Common Fisheries Policy

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will identify those elements of the Common Fisheries Policy which operate in (a) Baltic and (b) Mediterranean waters; and if he will account for the differences in applicability of the policy to Atlantic waters. [127191]

Mr. Morley: Baltic Sea fisheries are managed by the International Baltic Sea Fisheries Commission (IBSFC), of which the EU is a member. EU regulations are made under the Common Fisheries Policy (CFP) to implement management measures adopted by the IBSFC. General CFP conservation measures are also applicable in the Baltic Sea to the extent specified in individual regulations.

Coastal states in the Mediterranean Sea have not generally extended their exclusive fisheries limits beyond 12 miles, reflecting the narrowness of the continental shelf in the area. This has restricted the extent to which general CFP provisions have been applied. The EU has, however, implemented various conservation measures under the CFP covering Mediterranean fisheries, including tuna management measures adopted by the International Commission for the Conservation of Atlantic Tuna (ICCAT) and a limited number of technical conservation measures.

The Government consider that the application of the CFP in Atlantic waters can be improved and will continue to pursue opportunities for achieving this.

Press Releases

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average length of time which it took for press releases to appear on his Ministry's website in the past 12 months. [128059]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 28 June 2000]: The Department publishes its press releases on the MAFF website within 24 hours of the time they are issued. Many are published on the day of release, and we are investigating ways of upgrading existing updating methods to ensure that all do so.

Ragwort

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence he has assessed on the efficacy of biological control of ragwort. [128339]

Mr. Morley: My Department is not currently involved in any research and development on the biological control of ragwort. Depending on its location and degree of infestation, ragwort can be controlled effectively by a number of means.

Farrowing Crates

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the extent to which expectant and nursing sows suffer from being kept in farrowing crates; and if he will make a statement. [129032]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: This Ministry has funded a considerable amount of research on the behaviour and physiology of sows kept in farrowing crates. Part of this research has been directed towards determining which aspects of confinement in farrowing crates could, potentially, cause frustration in pregnant and lactating sows. We are also funding research to develop and test commercially viable farrowing systems, which encourage freedom of movement for the sow, and provide adequate protection to piglets from crushing by their mother.

Shellfish Stocks

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the state of shellfish stocks around the United Kingdom coast. [128540]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Monitoring of the state of shellfish stocks by marine fisheries scientists at the Centre for Environment Fisheries and Aquaculture Science (CEFAS) suggests that the current rate of fishing on crab, crawfish and lobster could jeopardise stock sustainability. Work is now proceeding on the introduction of a restrictive Shellfish Licensing Scheme to aid stock conservation.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans he has for the remainder of the year 2000 and for 2001 for (a) netters, (b) beamers, (c) the pelagic sector and (d) all other fishing sectors to financially assist those fishermen who wish to decommission their boat and leave the industry; [128842]

(2) what current financial support is available to those fishermen who wish to leave the industry and decommission their boats; [128843]

(3) what plans he has for the remainder of 2000 and for 2001 to assist financially those fishermen operating a line cash system who wish to decommission their boat. [129025]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: There is currently no financial scheme to encourage fishermen to decommission their vessels.

We are currently considering whether there is a need for a further limited decommissioning scheme, and will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to (a) review the operational effectiveness of sea fisheries committees, (b) manage shellfish stocks and (c) regulate use of high-powered under 10m fishing vessels. [128546]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: I keep the operational effectiveness of the sea fisheries committees under regular view. The introduction of a restrictive shellfish licensing scheme, which is now in preparation, should usefully add to existing action at EU, national and Sea Fishery Committee level on the management of shellfish stocks. A cap of 100 VCUs (vessel capacity units) has applied to the aggregation of under 10m fishing vessel licences since February 1996 and earlier this year arrangements were made to link the registration and licensing of all fishing vessels to the declaration of maximum continuous or permanently derated engine power. From 1 January 2001 it will no longer be possible to aggregate licences from vessels under 8m onto vessels between 8 and 10m and a cap of 70 VCUs will apply to the aggregation of fishing vessel licences onto vessels below 8m.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the operation of the legislative framework under which sea fisheries committees operate, with particular reference to (a) consistency of approach to minimum landing sizes, (b) the evidence required to achieve a prosecution, (c) the management of charter fishing vessels and (d) the impact of high-powered under 10m vessels. [128574]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Under the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act 1966, Sea Fisheries Committees (SFCs) have powers within their districts to control the size and power of vessels fishing and to set minimum landing sizes for fish and shellfish, provided these do not fall below those set by EU regulations. The Government are aware of SFC concerns about the inland extent of enforcement powers and is considering appropriate action. SFC bylaws apply as appropriate to the activities of under 10m fishing vessels and charter fishing boats. Responsibility for the registration of fishing and other vessels rests with the Registrar General of Shipping and Seamen and vessels fishing for profit must hold a valid licence issued by one of the four Fisheries Departments in the UK.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the trade in fishing licences and quota in the last three years; [128838]

(2) what plans he has to ensure that the trade in fishing entitlements (a) does not undermine the prospects of poor fishing regions, (b) does not worsen the prospects for new entrants to the industry, (c) is not sold to foreign or flag of convenience vessels and (d) does not result in a concentration of quota in the hands of fewer owners. [128839]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Trade in fishing vessel licences and the fishing opportunities associated with them have been initiated by fishermen themselves. The trade enables new entrants to join the industry and gives fishermen the opportunity to restructure their operations to meet their own business needs. All licensing transactions and exchanges of quota between groups with quota management responsibilities must be conducted in accordance with the rules on licensing and quota management drawn up by the Fisheries Departments in the UK.

These arrangements are the subject of regular consultation with the fishing industry and are currently under review by two working groups comprising representatives of industry and the Fisheries Departments. A report on possible modifications to the quota management rules, including arrangements for adjusting the fixed quota allocation units attached to fishing vessel licences to take account of transfers between fishermen, is expected shortly and a further report on licensing is expected towards the end of the year.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of a renewable 10-year derogation for national fishing rights within 12 miles of the United Kingdom shore, with particular reference to (a) the length of the derogation, (b) its operation by his Department, (c) its operation by the sea fisheries committees, (d) the exercising of historic rights of other EU member states, and (e) the ability to conserve stock for the future benefit of the fishing industry. [128575]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: As I have already made clear, the Government wish to maintain national 6/12 mile limits when the current EU derogation (under which they operate) expires at the end of 1992, together with current access arrangements based on historic rights under the Common Fisheries Policy. Restrictions on access to waters between six and 12 miles, together with the setting in the EU of Total Allowable Catches and quotas for commercial stocks and EU national, and local technical conservation rules assist in conserving fish stocks for the future benefit of the fishing industry and of consumers. I shall shortly be discussing with the Association of Sea Fisheries Committees a paper they are preparing entitled "2002 and Beyond" which will, I understand, argue for change in the extent of Sea Fisheries Committee jurisdictions from their present limit of six miles.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the efficiency and probity of giving producer organisations in the fishing industry opportunities to manage the distribution of some quota allocations to their members; [128840]

(2) what (a) amounts and (b) proportions of the United Kingdom's fishing quota are not directly allocated to licensed vessels for each year since 1995 and for the current year. [128841]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 July 2000]: In the UK, annual quotas are allocated to groups of fishermen rather than individual vessel owners. The groups are producer organisations (POs), the non-sector (all vessels over 10 metres not in membership of a PO) and the under 10 metre fleet. The quota allocations for the non-sector and the under 10 metre fleet are managed directly by the Fisheries Departments in the UK in consultation with the fishing industry.

Producer organisations have played an active part in managing quota for more than 10 years. It is for each PO to decide how to manage its allocations in the interests of its members. Before a PO is recognised for the purposes of quota management it must satisfy the appropriate Fisheries Department that it has the necessary systems in place to manage its quota allocations, to monitor landings by its members and to penalise any members who exceed their quota allocations. PO's management of quota is subject to the overall supervision of Fisheries Departments who prohibit further landings of fish by a PO's members once its quota allocations have been taken in full.

Fisheries Research Vessel

Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to commission the construction of a fisheries research vessel; and if he will make a statement. [128488]

Mr. Morley: A decision was taken in October 1997 to replace MAFF's oldest fisheries research vessel, RV Cirolana, which is used to collect essential data on the state of fish stocks and the marine environment. A comprehensive business case explored all options, including the Private Finance Initiative and the consequences of not replacing the ship. Investment in a new vessel was agreed as a priority in the 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review, and the procurement process is under way.

In accordance with EU procurement rules, expressions of interest in the contract to construct the new vessel have been invited, and the responses will be evaluated in order to identify a short list of bidders who will be given the opportunity to tender for the contract. The planned schedule allows for negotiation and award of a construction contract by the end of December 2000. The vessel is expected to be ready for service in March 2003.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inward Investment

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on attracting inward investment into the United Kingdom. [129298]

Mr. Byers: With my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, I can announce that the Invest in Britain Bureau (IBB) has in its Annual Review, published today, reported that 1999–2000 was a record year for attracting inward investment projects to the UK, and the creation of new jobs.

Between 1 April 1999 and 31 March 2000, 757 direct investment projects by foreign owned companies into the UK were reported to the IBB by its partner agencies in Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and the English Regional Development Agencies. Based on information provided by the companies at the time of the announcement, it is estimated that these projects will create over 52,700 new jobs.

More overseas companies choose to invest here than anywhere in Europe. They do so because the UK is the best place to do business.

In addition, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has announced today that the Invest In Britain Bureau, the Government's national inward investment marketing organisation, which is a part of British Trade International, will be rebranded 'Invest.UK'.

I am arranging for a copy of Invest.UK's Annual Review to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Balfour Beatty

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grants, loans and other payments were made by Her Majesty's Government, and what loans were underwritten by the ECGD, to Balfour Beatty in each of the last five years. [128570]

Mr. Caborn: From records readily available the following Balfour Beatty business has been the subject of guarantees underwritten by ECGD in each of the last five years:

Year	Number of Balfour Beatty contracts supported by ECGD	Value of ECGD cover £ Million
1995–96	6	62.3
1996–97	8	75.5
1997–98	2	33.7
1998–99	3	15.2

Most cover ECGD has underwritten will have been given to UK banks who extended loans to overseas borrowers to enable them to pay for capital goods and services over an extended payment period. However, some insurance cover has been issued directly to Balfour Beatty.

DFID advises that payments under the Aid and Trade Provision on development projects for which Balfour Beatty was the main contractor, amounted in each of the last five years to the following:

£ million

Payments to Balfour Beatty under the DTI's Overseas Project Fund (now managed by Trade Partners UK), amounted to £459,875 in the last five years.

Jaguar Cars

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what funds have been promised to Jaguar Cars for (a) the X200 project and (b) the X400 project; what payments have been made to date; and when full payment will be made on each of the projects. [129225]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In 1995 Jaguar received an offer of £48 million Regional Selective Assistance (RSA), plus a £32 million package of local support measures to attract the X200 (S-Type) project to Castle Bromwich. Following discussions with the European Commission, the RSA element of the £80 million package was subsequently revised to £40 million. However, the Commission subsequently agreed in principle that additional aid up to the original £80 million total might be provided.

Jaguar also received in 1998 an aid support offer of £40 million RSA and up to £3 million in local support measures to secure the X400 project for Halewood—the X400 package has been fully approved by the European Commission.

The detail of the payments made and their timing is a commercial matter between Jaguar and the aid providers concerned. However in major aid cases such as this, RSA support is normally phased over a number of years.

Karl Kolb

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list (a) contracts awarded to the German company Karl Kolb by the British Government and (b) the amount of ECGD support provided on contracts in which Karl Kolb was a participating party between 1985 and 1999; and if he will make a statement; [128177]

(2) what meetings were held between (a) his Department and (b) British companies with the German company Karl Kolb between January 1985 and June 2000, stating in each case the reason for the meeting, the attendees and any subsequent agreements reached; and if he will make a statement. [128178]

Mr. Caborn: There is no record of ECGD having provided support for any contract in which Karl Kolb was a participating party.

Equally there is no record of this Department ever having awarded a contract to Karl Kolb or held a meeting with Karl Kolb.

As this Department does not monitor meetings between British companies and overseas firms I am unable to answer the right hon. and learned Member's final point.

Post Offices

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) rural and (b) urban sub-post offices operated unprofitably in the last financial year in each constituency in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland; and how many of these in each constituency will benefit from the new fund to improve the quality of post offices. [128749]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In its report on the Post Office network, the Performance and Innovation Unit has estimated that around 90 per cent. of urban sub-post offices operate profitably and that around 60 per cent. of rural sub-post offices operate unprofitably. I understand from the Post Office that they do not hold data by constituency for the numbers of urban or rural sub-post offices operating unprofitably.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many urban and rural sub-post offices closed for avoidable reasons in the years (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [128751]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand that the Post Office does not hold the specific data requested for causes of closure of sub-post offices. The Post Office seeks as far as possible not to close post offices when it can be avoided. As the Performance and Innovation Unit's report recognises, sub-post office closures occur typically in small rural communities where a sub-postmaster resigns or dies and, despite best efforts, the Post Office can find no suitable replacement to take over the running of the office.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his oral statement of 28 June 2000, Official Report, columns 907–20, how many (a) urban and (b) rural sub-post offices were unavoidably closed because (i) no one was prepared to take over from the departing sub-postmaster and (ii) an associated retail business was no longer commercially viable, in (1) 1997, (2) 1998 and (3) 1999. [128750]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand that the Post Office does not hold the specific data requested for causes of closure of sub-post offices. The Post Office seeks as far as possible not to close post offices when it can be avoided. The total numbers of sub-post offices which have closed in the last three financial years are:

Year	Sub-post offices
1997–98	238
1998–99	232
1999–2000	380

Electricity Order 1997

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has reached conclusions following his consultation on proposals to amend the Electricity (Class Exemptions from the Requirement for a Licence) Order 1997. [129580]

Mrs. Liddell: In order to reduce the regulatory burden on generators which are not subject to central despatch at present I am proposing to make changes to the de-minimis level above which a generation licence is required. Subject to final comments, I propose to lay an order to exempt for a period of one year all generators which are not capable of exporting more than 100 MW to the total system and which have energised connections on the date of the order coming into force. Additionally a small number of stations which exceed this limit but are not presently subject to central despatch will be included within this exempt class.

The change will allow generators which are currently connected to the public network and do not presently have to submit to central despatch the freedom to aggregate their output with suppliers when the new electricity trading arrangements come into effect. This will be of particular help to those plants which do not have predictable or flexible output, including renewables and CHP operators.

The Government propose to lay the order in August. It will come into force before the commencement of NETA trading in the autumn.

This order will be an interim arrangement pending the coming into force of new legislation and will apply in England and Wales. During this interim period, generators who wish to connect new plant capable of exporting between 50–100 MW or who plan to increase the size of their plant so that it comes within this category may apply to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for an individual exemption. In deciding whether or not to grant and in determining the date of the granting of such exemptions, the Department will take into account the views of interested parties—including those of Ofgem and the relevant transmission and distribution network operators.

It is my intention within the coming year to lay a further, final order replacing this interim order. Further orders will cover the de-minimis rules to govern exemptions from the need for licences to generate, supply and distribute electricity.

The generation exemptions covering plant of this size will be subject to periodic review. It is the Government's present intention that they will be reviewed approximately every three years.

I intend to consult further on possible changes to the rules governing supply exemptions. These changes, which I would propose to bring into effect within the coming year, would help small and industrial on-site generators, including renewable and CHP operators to serve their customers more effectively.

I am therefore seeking views on a proposal to allow suppliers who generate electricity themselves to supply an aggregate of up to 5 MW of power, of which 2.5 MW may be supplied to domestic customers. The class would be required to supply at prices not exceeding those set out in the order, and would be required to alert customers being recruited as to their status as exempt suppliers.

I also wish to hear views on a proposal to allow generators which supply a qualifying group of customers on the same site as the generator, to supply the same group of customers at remote sites. This latter class would be required to demonstrate that at least one third of the electricity supplied to the qualifying group went to on-site premises.

Telecommunications Report

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received a report by the Director General of Telecommunications for 1999, as required under section 55 of the Telecommunications Act 1984. [129579]

Mr. Byers: Yes. The sixteenth Report by the Director General of Telecommunications is being published today. It covers the period 1 January to 31 December 1999. This includes initiatives to encourage the widespread take-up of Information Age services such as innovative pricing packages for internet access and opening up competition in BT's local loop to deliver new high-speed services to homes and small businesses. Copies of the report have been laid before each House of Parliament.

Ilisu Dam

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the number of people who will be displaced if the Ilisu Dam project goes ahead; and what plans he has for aid to deal with the consequences of this displacement. [127758]

Mr. Caborn: There have been various estimates made about the number of people who will be displaced by the Ilisu Dam project. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by the Prime Minister to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 268W. In addition, a number of people will be partially affected by the project. Accurate assessment of the numbers who would be affected is now being made as a result of a detailed survey. This work is being carried out by SEMOR, a firm that has experience of carrying out social assessment projects for the World bank. Dr. Ayse Kudat, an eminent environmental sociologist, who was until recently a senior staff member at the World bank, has been appointed by the Swiss Export Credit Agency to assist in this work; the expertise of Dr. Kudat will help ensure that the resettlement programme will reflect internationally accepted practice.

The Resettlement Action Plan (RAP) which is being drawn up for the Turkish authorities will publish these accurate numbers. The RAP will set out what is to be done to deal with the consequences of those who are displaced or whose lands will be partially affected. It is ultimately for the Turkish authorities to ensure that resettlement is properly carried out. The RAP will of course be discussed among the Export Credit Agencies who are considering offering support for the project. The RAP is currently not expected to be ready until the end of August at the earliest.

Hydrofluorocarbons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment has been made by (a) his Department and (b) consultants to his Department of the potential toxic effects of release of hydrofluorocarbons into the environment. [128454]

Ms Hewitt: My Department has not itself carried out or commissioned any such assessments. The Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR) is responsible for Government policy on climate change and protection of the stratospheric ozone layer. My Department works closely with DETR in the development of Government policy in these areas.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he has had with the refrigeration industry trade associations in respect of replacement options for hydrofluorocarbons. [128451]

Ms Hewitt: My Department holds regular Refrigeration Sector Group meetings, which involve representatives of the refrigerant industry trade associations, industry and other Government Departments to discuss current and future issues of interest such as the use of alternative refrigerants.

Packaging

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to distinguish between producer responsibility obligations for packaging that has a high energy contribution to its life cycle, and that which does not. [128889]

Ms Hewitt: A producer responsibility regime exists for packaging in the form of the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997. These regulations place an obligation on businesses throughout the packaging chain which meet certain threshold requirements, to recover and recycle packaging waste. The regulations do not distinguish between different kinds of packaging or packaging materials on the basis of either their energy content or the energy consumed in their manufacture and use.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129058]

Mr. Byers: The Department and its agencies have signed three PFI contracts—the Radiocommunications Agency's joint venture for the provision of IT services and international consultancy, signed on 8 June 1998, with an estimated capital value of £15 million; the contract for the redevelopment of the National Physical Laboratory at Teddington, signed on 31 July 1998, with a capital value of £88.6 million; the Elgar contract for the provision of the Department's IT services, signed on 18 November 1998 with a currently estimated capital value of £60 million. The only contract that included external financing by a bank or financial institution was the redevelopment of the National Physical Laboratory. This contract has not been subject to refinancing. DTI agreement would be required in the event that refinancing led to an increase in potential DTI termination liabilities, although there is no pre-determined formal claw-back provision in the contract.

Small Businesses

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to help people aged 50 years and over who are not working to set up their own businesses; and if he will make a statement. [128739]

Ms Hewitt: The Small Business Service, launched in April this year, will provide information, advice, and access to experts on all aspects of running a business, including planning, finance, management, exporting, quality, employment issues, training and development, innovation, design, regulation, information and communication technology and e-commerce.

The SBS will also run national services to help small firms, including:

grants for innovation technology transfer;

management best practice schemes;

small firms finance, including Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme.

All these services will be available via the "SBS Gateway", a comprehensive network of business support organisations, initiatives and information from the public, private and voluntary sectors. The Gateway will make extensive use of internet and call-centre technology.

These services are available to anyone wishing to setup or run their own business, irrespective of age.

The SBS is also working with PRIME (The Prince's Initiative for Mature Entrepreneurs) with a view to supporting that organisation's plans to enhance access to finance for the over-50s in deprived areas seeking to start in business.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has to implement the recommendations made in the Better Regulation Task Force's recent report on helping small businesses cope with regulation, in particular the simplification of rules; and if he will make a statement. [129019]

Ms Hewitt: The Government response to the Better Regulation Task Force's report was published on 26 June 2000; copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance his Department gives to entrepreneurs in socially excluded areas who wish to start up and develop small businesses as to how they can access the new Phoenix Fund. [129018]

Ms Hewitt: The Phoenix Fund does not support individual enterprises directly, but instead promotes the development of business support among disadvantaged groups or neighbourhoods. A mentoring scheme is already being piloted through some 45 local enterprise agencies and other local partnerships. The Small Business Service is seeking bids for support from community finance initiatives, and I shall shortly be issuing bidding guidance for assistance for novel forms of business support, including incubators.

Exports

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will investigate the best practical means available for determining the nature and value of goods exported from the United Kingdom to member states of the (a) European Union and (b) European Economic Area, which are re-exported to third nations; and if he will make a statement concerning the available information and the means used to collect it, concerning such exports. [128852]

Mr. Caborn: The collection and provision of statistical information is kept under regular review. However, there are no immediate plans to collect information on goods exported from the United Kingdom to the European Union or Economic Area and subsequently re-exported to third countries.

HM Customs and Excise are the Department responsible for collecting and recording statistics on the movement of goods with other countries. Information on trade in goods with the other member states of the European Union is collected through the Intrastat system. Information on trade with third countries is collated from customs declarations submitted by importers and exporters of goods. UK export statistics are produced by Customs on the basis of declared final country of destination. Goods whose destinations are declared as non-European but which transit other member states after clearing UK customs are recorded as third country exports. Some trade in goods recorded as exports to EC destinations may subsequently be shipped to other countries including non-EC destinations—for instance, as part of further commercial transactions. The Intrastat system does not allow the identification of these movements.

Shipbuilding Forum

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the date, venue and agenda of the next meeting of the Shipbuilding Forum. [128717]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The next Shipbuilding Forum meeting is scheduled for Wednesday 20 September at 3 pm, at the DTI Conference Centre, 1 Victoria Street, London SW1. The agenda has not yet been agreed.

Coalfield Regeneration

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will break down the £1 billion provided to assist regeneration in former and existing coalfield communities by principal heads of expenditure. [123127]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 24 May 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

A break down of this investment is set out in "Making the Difference—a New Start for England's Coalfield Communities; The Government's Response to the Coalfield Task Force Report". Copies of this document have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much was paid from the Legal Aid Fund to (a) David Cocks and (b) Johnathan Goldberg in (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98, (iii) 1998–99 and (iv) 1999–2000. [129119]

Mr. Lock: I am not able to provide the details requested within the time available, I will therefore write to my hon. Friend shortly. A copy of my reply will be placed in the Library of the House.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions have taken place with parties other than Dome Europe and Legacy plc and their affiliates concerning the future use of the Dome since the final shortlist was announced. [127821]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 26 June 2000]: Since the final shortlist announcement the competition team has not had any discussions about the future use of the Dome site with any parties interested in purchasing it other than the two shortlisted bidders. While the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the competition team have received a small number of new expressions of interest, it has been made clear that no new bids can be accepted in the competition process at this advanced stage.

TV (Deaf and Hard of Hearing People)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action he is taking to promote equal access to (a) digital and (b) cable and satellite TV for deaf and hard of hearing people. [128271]

Janet Anderson: We are about to undertake a review of the targets set out in the Broadcasting Act 1996 and the Broadcasting (Sign Language) Order 1996 of 50 per cent. for subtitling and 5 per cent. for the signing of digital terrestrial programme services by the 10th anniversary of the start of the service. We are continuing to encourage cable and satellite broadcasters to increase the provision of subtitling and signing on their services. We will be considering the needs of viewers with sensory impairments as part of our consideration of the future regulation of broadcasting in the forthcoming White Paper on communications.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129045]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department has itself not entered into any PFI contracts. The Royal Parks Agency, which is an Executive Agency, has entered into PFI contracts. I will write to my right hon. Friend with details, as soon as they are available, placing copies of my letter in the Library of the House.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Mr. Roger Sylvester

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Solicitor-General what decisions have been taken by the Crown Prosecution Service in the case of Mr. Roger Sylvester; and if he will make a statement. [128629]

The Solicitor-General: The circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Sylvester have been investigated by the Essex police and reports submitted to the Crown Prosecution Service. The evidence is being carefully considered by the Crown Prosecution Service in accordance with the tests set out in the Code for Crown Prosecutors. A decision on whether or not any criminal charges should be brought in connection with the death of Mr. Sylvester will be taken as soon as possible after the evidence has been fully reviewed. It is hoped that a decision can be reached soon.

PRIME MINISTER

Sellafield

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will meet (a) Save Our Sellafield Campaign, (b) Friends of the Earth Cumbria and (c) the Socialist Environment and Resources Association to discuss the future of Sellafield. [127569]

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe and I will be meeting representatives of the Save Our Sellafield Campaign with my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) later this month to discuss matters relating to Sellafield. I currently have no plans to see representatives of the other two organisations.

Lord Levy

Mr. Maude: To ask the Prime Minister if Lord Levy has served as a personal envoy for other (a) heads of Government and (b) heads of state. [128261]

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Prime Minister on which occasions since May 1997 Lord Levy has issued (i) public statements and (ii) talked to foreign media, as a representative of the (a) Prime Minister and (b) United Kingdom. [128260]

The Prime Minister: When travelling abroad as personal representative of the Prime Minister, Lord Levy has spoken briefly to the press in Lebanon, Tunisia, Morocco and Egypt.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Prime Minister if Lord Levy has passed messages between Middle Eastern leaders in his role as the Prime Minister's personal envoy. [128519]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 3 July 2000]: When travelling between capitals, it is normal to relay impressions of meetings, and to pass messages between interlocutors. Lord Levy has accordingly passed some such messages. Details of these are confidential. Lord Levy reports to me and to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on all his diplomatic activity.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the accountability to Parliament of Lord Levy. [129224]

The Prime Minister: Accountability to Parliament for Lord Levy's work on my behalf is through me and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister what further trips he has asked Lord Levy to undertake in his capacity as the Prime Minister's personal envoy. [129226]

The Prime Minister: None at present.

Queen Mother's Birthday

Mr. Burns: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 12 June 2000, Official Report, columns 443–44W, what form the consultations with the Royal Household took; and if he will place minutes of the meeting in the Library. [128734]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 3 July 2000]: Officials in the Department of Culture, Media and Sport contacted the Royal Household, who agreed it would be inappropriate to designate the Queen Mother's birthday as a public holiday.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 5 July. [128621]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I will have further such meetings later today.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, in cases where the right to pay reduced rate of national insurance contributions has been lost after two complete tax years out of the labour market or without paying national insurance, if home responsibilities protection, where appropriate, is awarded for retirement purposes. [128597]

Mr. Rooker: Married women and widows cannot get home responsibilities protection (HRP) for any tax year in which they have reduced contribution liability. If they lose their right to reduced liability they can get HRP provided they meet the qualifying conditions.

Fraud

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the anti-fraud measures introduced by the National Intelligence Unit. [128933]

Mr. Rooker: The new national benefits intelligence unit will co-ordinate and extend intelligence on Social Security fraud, aiding both prevention and detection. This builds on intelligence work already being carried out. It will crack down on benefit fraud and draw on the expertise of fraud investigators in the Department, as well as intelligence from local authorities and other agencies.

This will contribute to a significant strengthening of our defences against benefit fraud and our ability to tackle it where it occurs.

We have just appointed Mr. John Alpass as head of fraud intelligence, and he is expected to take up post from early September.

CABINET OFFICE

Policy Action Teams

Mr. Field: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make it her policy to appoint persons with earnings below half average earnings as members of the policy action teams. [128051]

Marjorie Mowlam: As I said in my previous answer to my right hon. Friend, on 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 468W, policy action team members were chosen to reflect a wide range of backgrounds, knowledge and experience of issues affecting deprived areas. Information is not held about members' earnings.

Disaster Contingency Measures

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what representations she has received from (a) consumer and (b) pensioner groups about disaster contingency measures in central Government. [128870]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have been asked to reply.

Assuming the question relates to Home Office responsibilities for emergency planning, I am not aware of any such representations.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what guidance she has issued to Departments about disaster contingency measures. [128872]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have been asked to reply.

I assume the question refers to other Government Departments. "Dealing with Disaster", third edition, 1997 is a comprehensive statement of best practice used by Government Departments, the emergency services, local authorities, and other agencies. Other more specific guidance is issued from time to time; some of this can be found on the Home Office website: www.ho.gov.uk/epd

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sierra Leone

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is on the establishment of an international tribunal to investigate human rights abuses in Sierra Leone. [128821]

Mr. Hain: Perpetrators of serious violations of international humanitarian and human rights law should be brought to justice. We condemn the flagrant violations in Sierra Leone. We are in discussions with the Government of Sierra Leone and in the United Nations on how best to support President Kabbah's wish to bring those responsible to justice.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128988]

Mr. Battle: Foreign and Commonwealth Office purchasing and leasing policy is based on value for money. We are also required to meet our legal obligations under the EU Public Procurement Directives.

At present we have contracts with Rover, Land Rover, Jaguar and Rolls-Royce for the supply of cars, and LDV for commercial vehicles.

At Posts overseas, vehicles are purchased from other manufacturers when this is value for money or when servicing facilities for UK manufactured vehicles are not available.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support the establishment of an International Criminal Court to try the most serious violations of international criminal law. [128586]

Mr. Hain: It has always been the policy of this Government strongly to support the establishment of an International Criminal Court (ICC) to try the most serious violations of international criminal law. The UK played a leading role in the successful negotiations which produced the Rome Statute of the ICC. The Government are committed to ratifying the Rome Statute as soon as the necessary legislation can be passed.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the conclusions reached by the Preparatory Commission on the International Criminal Court at its meeting in New York in June. [129209]

Mr. Hain: We will be happy to place in the Library the official report of the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court on its 12–30 June session once it has been issued. I will inform my hon. Friend when this occurs.

Jordan

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's relations with Jordan. [128585]

Mr. Hain: The United Kingdom enjoys a long-standing and close friendship with Jordan. We conduct a substantive bilateral dialogue at all levels, including regular high-level contact. Both my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I have visited Jordan this year, and HM King Abdullah of Jordan will pay a state visit to the United Kingdom in November 2000. We look forward to this with enthusiasm.

Rome Treaty

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's timetable for ratification of the Rome Treaty of July 1998. [128587]

Mr. Hain: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 122W.

Pakistan

Mr. Ivan Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's export licensing policy is towards Pakistan. [129447]

Mr. Hain: We continue to assess export licence applications for Pakistan on a case-by-case basis against the national criteria and those in the EU Code of Conduct, taking into account the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) on 10 July 1998, Official Report, columns 687–88W. The Government have taken time to consider the situation in Pakistan and the wider region following the coup in October 1999 before deciding on a number of licence applications.

The Government have now refused 26 standard individual export licence applications for Pakistan. We have also refused Pakistan as a permitted destination on one open individual export licence and approved its inclusion on one other such licence. We have reached these decisions following careful consideration of each licence application against the stated criteria.

We remain concerned about defence exports to Pakistan, in the light of last year's incursion at the Kargil sector of the Line of Control in Kashmir, the military coup, the possibility of diversion to undesirable end-users and continued regional tensions. We have refused licences for certain military equipment to Pakistan because we do not judge that they meet our criteria.

The Government have issued 20 standard individual export licences for a narrow and well defined range of equipment, eg naval spares, bomb disposal equipment, goods for civilian end-users. We have assessed that issuing licences for this equipment would not contravene our national criteria, nor those in the EU Code of Conduct. Details of all licences issued will appear in the 2000 Annual Report.

We will continue to assess licence applications on a case-by-case basis and keep the situation in Pakistan under close scrutiny.

Sanctions

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on that part of the Government's response to the International Development Committee on the Future of Sanctions (HC 473) concerning the imposition by the United Kingdom of unilateral financial sanctions. [129581]

Mr. Hain: I regret that the statement is incorrect. The UK has imposed unilateral financial sanctions on several occasions. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for drawing my attention to this oversight in a recent adjournment debate in Westminster Hall, on 29 June 2000, Official Report, column 260WH.

Iraq

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what amounts of Iraq's supplies of (a) botulinum, (b) anthrax, (c) aflatoxin, (d) gas gangrene and (e) ricin remain unaccounted for; and if he will make a statement. [128179]

Mr. Hain: Iraq took four years to admit it had a biological weapons (BW) programme. Even after a further three and a half years work, the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) could not compile a comprehensive technical, industrial and scientific assessment of Iraq's BW programme. This was because of Iraq's failure to provide a credible full, final and complete disclosure of its programme, as required by the United Nations, or to co-operate with UNSCOM in clarifying its declarations. There have been no UN weapons inspections in Iraq since December 1998, hence the importance we attach to the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) gaining access at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what amount of Iraq's supplies of (a) tabun, (b) sarin, (c) mustard gas and (d) VX gas remain unaccounted for; and if he will make a statement. [128180]

Mr. Hain: Although the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) was able to destroy, remove or render harmless large quantities of chemical weapons (CW), their components, precursors and major production equipment, there remain significant gaps in their understanding of Iraq's CW programme. Even accepting the figures for CW agents and precursors unilaterally destroyed by Iraq in contravention of United Nations Security Council resolution 687, there are discrepancies in Iraq's declarations on the number of weapons filled with chemical agents and the number used during the Iran/Iraq war or lost after the Gulf War. Questions remain on the production and weaponisation of VX, CW production equipment and CW precursors. There have been no UN weapons inspections in Iraq since December 1998, hence the importance we attach to the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) gaining access at the earliest opportunity.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Kosovo

8. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with her EU counterparts to discuss aid for humanitarian and reconstruction purposes in Kosovo; and if she will make a statement. [127744]

27. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on aid to Kosovo. [127765]

Clare Short: We made a major contribution costing £119 million to the emergency effort in Kosovo.

The EC is now taking the lead, and has agreed programmes in health, energy, water supply, housing transport and economic reconstruction costing 360 million euros, of which the UK contribution is £50 million.

28. Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the humanitarian situation in Kosovo, with particular regard to children. [127766]

Clare Short: We keep the humanitarian situation in Kosovo constantly under review, including through our close contacts with the multilateral humanitarian agencies. We have contributed £2.5 million in this financial year to UNICEF's operations in the Balkans.

Civil Conflict

9. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the Government's criteria are for giving aid to countries experiencing civil conflict. [127746]

Clare Short: We support the provision of humanitarian relief to all who are in need. Conflict is a major threat to development. We are strengthening our effort to resolve and prevent conflict.

China Western Poverty Reduction Project

10. Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement regarding her Department's policy on the Qinghai component of the China Western Poverty Reduction Project, to be considered by the World bank on 6 July. [127747]

Clare Short: Britain supported this project in the bank board meeting in June 1999 because it would bring significant benefits to 1.7 million of the poorest people in China. They represent four different ethnic minorities, they live in very remote and inaccessible villages and many of them are barely scratching a living. It will give poor people from a range of ethnic groups the opportunity to meet their basic needs. It will deliver a wide range of benefits such as increasing food production, providing safe water and improving access to basic social services. We also supported the Board conclusion that no funds would be disbursed on the Qinghai component of the project until an independent inspection panel had conducted an investigation, and pending further environmental and social assessments.

20. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's policy on the Qinghai component of the China Western poverty reduction project. [127757]

Clare Short: The report by the independent inspection panel, and bank management's response to it, will be discussed at a World bank board meeting in early July 2000. We will be looking very carefully at the conclusions of the inspection panel report, and the bank management's response to it, in advance of the bank board meeting.

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the independent Inspection Panel's findings about the World Bank's practice in identifying and comparing alternatives to the Qinghai project. [128731]

Clare Short: In response to the claim in the inspection panel report that they have not considered alternatives to the Qinghai project, the World bank state that they have explored a range of developmental options in some detail, covering both whether resettlement is the most appropriate response, and whether the area chosen for that resettlement is appropriate.

We have asked, and will ask again at the board meeting on 6 July, that this analysis be documented more thoroughly prior to project appraisal.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the independent inspection panel's findings that the World bank's relating to (a) its indigenous peoples policy and (b) its operational directive on involuntary resettlement in respect of the Qinghai project. [129028]

Clare Short: We have looked very carefully at the conclusions of the independent inspection panel, which raises a number of important issues regarding social safeguards and resettlement policy. The Report and the response to it from bank management will be discussed at a board meeting on 6 July 2000. At that meeting we will be seeking to satisfy ourselves that the World bank has in place the necessary social safeguards before this project begins.

Britain supported this project in June 1999 because it would bring significant benefits to 1.7 million of the poorest people in China. We also supported the board conclusion that no funds would be disbursed on the Qinghai component of the project until an independent inspection panel had conducted an investigation.

Conservation (Africa)

11. Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the impact on indigenous and nomadic people in Africa of Government-supported conservation projects. [127748]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave on 29 March 2000, Official Report, column 175W and on 7 June 2000, Official Report, column 260W.

India

12. Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's aid programmes in India. [127749]

Clare Short: Britain has a large and growing programme of development assistance to India: we expect to spend about £125 million this year, rising to £140 million in 2001–02. This reflects the fact that about a third of the world's poorest people live in India, and we see good opportunities to work with reforming states to tackle poverty more effectively. We are supporting programmes of fiscal and public sector reform, to help improve accountability and access by the poorest to basic education, health, water and sanitation, and to promote better management of the natural and physical environment. Our programme is currently focused on Andhra Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Orissa and West Bengal, and we are collaborating closely with the World bank, the Asian Development bank, UNICEF and other major development agencies. In all our programmes we take particular care to ensure the inclusion of poor women and girls and members of scheduled castes and tribes.

I am placing a copy of our India Country Strategy Paper in the Library of the House.

Poverty Alleviation (Russia)

13. Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what help her Department is giving to the Russian Government to alleviate poverty. [127750]

Clare Short: We expect to spend around £28 million on bilateral assistance to Russia in the current financial year. This is additional to the UK share of the European Commission's Tacis programme (our contribution to which is on average £12 million per annum) and as a shareholder of the World bank and EBRD. Our aim is to support the process of transition to a democracy and a market economy in a way which protects the people—particularly the poorest—during the transition and brings real benefits to the society.

The transition is far from complete and the level of poverty is very great. We are currently reviewing our programmes.

World Education Forum

14. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking following the agreement reached at the world education forum in Dakar. [127751]

Clare Short: In preparation for the Forum, my Department produced a consultation document, "Education for All: The Challenge of Universal Primary Education". Copies are available in the House of Commons Library. This document is being refined following the Forum but its threefold strategy for achieving the International Development targets for education will remain unchanged:

> strategic contributions to the development of international commitment, and well co-ordinated policies and programmes designed to achieve Education for All (EFA). This will include involvement with the "high-level small and flexible group" to be established by UNESCO's Director General to coordinate EFA partners and maintain the momentum of Dakar.
> strong bilateral programmes, with priority to Sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia, that will provide strategic assistance to Governments and civil societies committed to achieving universal primary education and gender equality. We will allocate significant additional resources to support basic education, where Governments are committed to this objective and have put in place appropriate policies to deliver on it.
> knowledge and research strategies that will contribute to the ability of the international community to learn lessons, share experience and monitor progress.

West Bank

15. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's efforts to promote economic development in the West Bank. [127752]

Clare Short: Our development strategy for the West Bank and Gaza Strip concentrates on nation building with a view to promoting peace, stability and economic development. To promote economic development we are intensifying our policy dialogue with the Palestinian Authority, and with the European Community, the International Monetary Fund, the World bank and others and funding a programme which supports this. We are providing technical assistance to the Ministry of Economy and Trade, to strengthen its capacity to develop and apply economic policy, particularly with regard to trade with the EC and the region. Our programme also emphasises the importance of an accountable and transparent government framework in which private investors can operate. Our bilateral programme expenditure for 1999–2000 was approximately £8 million. Our contribution to the United Nations Relief Works Agency for Palestinian refugees and our share of European Community and other multilateral programmes for the Palestinians takes our average annual contribution to over £25 million in recent years.

Zimbabwe

16. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her plans for aid to Zimbabwe. [127753]

26. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her policy is on future bilateral development assistance to Zimbabwe. [127764]

Clare Short: A copy of our country strategy for Zimbabwe is in the Library, and we are keeping the situation under continuous review.

Sierra Leone

17. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance her Department is providing to the people of Sierra Leone. [127754]

Clare Short: We are supporting a wide range of programmes to improve the effectiveness of Government systems including policing the media and the accountability of the security sector. We have also contributed to disarmament and demobilisation programmes, humanitarian relief and reconstruction. We expect to remain engaged in Sierra Leone for the long term to support peace, disarmament and development for some of the poorest people in the world.

St. Helena

18. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will visit St. Helena to mark the 500th anniversary of its discovery. [127755]

Clare Short: I have no current plans to visit St. Helena.

HIPC

19. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the progress of the revised Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative. [127756]

Clare Short: So far, only six countries have qualified for debt relief under the enhanced Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. A further three are expected to do so later this month. But it is disappointing that so few have reached their decision points. Some countries who could benefit from HIPC debt relief are involved in war and civil strife, or have failed to demonstrate their commitment to tackling poverty. At the spring meetings of the World bank and the IMF in April, the Government's proposal to establish a joint World bank/IMF committee to oversee the implementation process was agreed. The committee has begun its work and should provide a focus for efforts to meet the target that three quarters of eligible countries start to receive debt relief before the end of 2000.

AIDS (Sub-Saharan Africa)

21. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of her Department's aid to countries in sub-Saharan Africa to combat the spread of AIDS and HIV. [127759]

Clare Short: Along with conflict, the HIV/AIDS epidemic poses the greatest threat to development in sub-Saharan Africa. HIV/AIDS has affected people of every class and culture in Africa. However, it is the poor who have felt the worst of the impacts because they are more vulnerable to the economic and social difficulties the epidemic brings.

We are heavily engaged in work to combat HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa, both in seeking to prevent new infections and in supporting improved care for people whose lives have been affected by the disease. We currently allocate about £25 million per year to HIV/AIDS prevention and care activities in sub-Saharan Africa and this is set to rise.

In the face of such a devastating epidemic, we cannot afford to be complacent and there is an urgent need to intensify action. In Uganda and Senegal we have seen how sustained political commitment by African Governments and a co-ordinated response in partnership with the international community has controlled and even reduced infection rates. This must be replicated elsewhere in Africa.

Primary Education

22. Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress the Government are making towards their goal of ensuring that all children benefit from primary education. [127760]

Clare Short: We are making good progress in helping developing countries achieve the international development target of universal primary education (UPE) by 2015. But much remains to be done; it is unacceptable that in the year 2000 more than 113 million children, a large majority of whom are girls and those from socially vulnerable groups, have no access to primary education.

The bulk of spending on education by most developing countries remains directed to higher education. The reason is that elites are powerful in very poor countries. It is difficult political task to get a commitment to spending on the poorest children in rural areas. We are working hard on this task through the international system, and by contributing more funds. We have committed £300 million over the past three years to UPE programmes and will do more. We are working to persuade governments and their civil societies to prioritise the education of poor children. Progress is being made and we need sustained interest through to 2015.

Our strategy for achieving the UPE target is set out in the Department for International Development's consultation document "Education for All: The Challenge of Universal Primary Education". Copies are available in the House of Commons Library.

International Development White Paper

23. Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress is being made on the preparation of the second international development White Paper. [127761]

Clare Short: Work on the White Paper is proceeding well. There has been a public consultation agreement across Whitehall on the provisional outline, research has been commissioned and detailed work is being undertaken by cross-departmental groups.

Human Rights

24. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how her Department is helping to promote human rights in poorer countries; and if she will make a statement. [127762]

Clare Short: Human rights are central to my Department's work, which is dedicated to the achievement of the human rights of the poorest people of the world. We will shortly be publishing our strategy paper on "Human Rights for Poor People".

Zambia

25. Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the effectiveness of micro credit schemes in reducing poverty in Zambia. [127763]

Clare Short: Studies of one of our micro-credit partners, the Christian Enterprise Trust of Zambia, show that access to micro-credit helps its clients, who come from the poorest groups, to achieve higher incomes, better household nutrition, and increased access to education and health services. Our other micro-credit projects show similar results.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list for her Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if she will make a statement on her Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128991]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development makes use of three official cars, namely a Vauxhall Omega, a Vauxhall Vectra and a Ford Mondeo. All cars are used on a lease basis from the Government Car Service costing a total of £142,476.36 per annum.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many employees of her Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129097]

Clare Short: The information requested is as follows.

Number: 5

Percentage: 0.4.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the PFI contracts entered into by her Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if her Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129052]

Clare Short: My Department has not entered into any PFI contracts.

Third-world Debt

Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what pressures she will bring to bear on countries attending the G8 Summit in July to ensure that the debt owed by the world's poorest countries is cancelled. [129085]

Clare Short: When the Prime Minister met the Japanese Prime Minister last month, they agreed the importance of discussing debt issues at the G8 Summit in Okinawa.

It was at the Cologne Summit last year that the G7 agreed a very substantial improvement to the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative, which was agreed by the boards of the World bank and IMF at the annual meetings in September 1999. The enhanced HIPC initiative provides faster, wider and deeper debt relief to poor countries committed to eradicating poverty.

The emphasis now is on implementing the enhanced initiative, so that the target of three-quarters of eligible countries starting to receive debt relief before the end of the year can be achieved. At the spring meetings of the World bank and IMF in April, we persuaded the bank and the Fund to establish a joint committee to oversee the implementation process. The Government are committed to keeping up the momentum not only in the run up to the G8 Summit but also beyond it.

Globalisation

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what consultations she is holding with organisations in developing countries in advance of the publication of the White Paper on Globalisation. [127745]

Clare Short: We are consulting widely organisations and individuals here and in developing countries as part of the preparation of the White Paper on Globalisation and Development. In March, an outline of the White Paper was sent out to key institutions and a website established. We have invited submissions from individuals and organisations in the UK and from developing countries. In addition, on 11 and 12 July I am chairing a round table on globalisation and development for various academics and practitioners from developing countries.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Policing Charges

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the charges made in the last year for which figures are available for policing commercial events; and if he will make a statement. [128576]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on charges made by police forces for policing commercial events is not held centrally.

The decision whether to charge for costs of policing at local events is for the local police authority and the Chief Constable.

Under Section 25(12) of the Police Act 1996, > the Chief Officer of Police may provide, at the request of any person, special police services at any premises or in any locality in the police area for which the force is maintained, subject to the payment to the police authority of charges on such scales as may be determined by that authority.

The rationale behind charging is that the taxpayer at large should not be asked to pay for services provided at private events or events which benefit only a relatively small section of the community. It is for the Chief Officer concerned to determine whether a given service would constitute a special police service. Special police services are not defined in the 1996 Act or elsewhere. However, I would expect them to be services that meet some or all the following criteria:

> they are not part of the general duty of the police to keep the peace and protect life and property;
> the service to be provided is on private land; and, > the service to be provided is for a commercially organised event.

Police (Efficiency Savings)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces have achieved the requirement of year-on-year efficiency savings of 2 per cent.; what monitoring is undertaken of how forces are achieving the efficiency savings and what guidance is issued by his Department; and if he will make a statement. [128536]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There are two elements to the achievement of the 2 per cent. efficiency targets set for the police each year between 1999–2002. The first is to plan and deliver savings, either cashable, non-cashable or both; the second and most important element is to deliver levels of performance to a required standard. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) reported in May 2000 that all 43 forces were on track to deliver the required efficiency gains subject to performance levels being assessed as satisfactory. I expect HMIC to report on police performance levels later this month.

The efficiency process is subject to rigorous inspection by HMIC with support from the Audit Commission and external auditors. This ensures that only permissible savings are counted. The police authority and force must also ensure that a link between resources and performance outcomes is established.

The Home Office issued guidance on efficiency planning to police forces and authorities in November 1998, when the process was launched, and again in December 2000 to support planning for the second year of efficiency gains. HMIC also issued detailed guidance in the course of its inspection process and has advised forces and authorities throughout the process.

Public Safety Radio Communications Project

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total planned cost is of the Public Safety Radio Communications project in each year; what his estimate is of the costs which will have to be met directly by police forces, per force and in total, in each of the next 10 years; what proportion of the total cost is to be met by additional central Government funding; and if he will make a statement. [128535]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on 26 June 2000, Official Report, column 655, and to the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) on 17 January 2000, Official Report, columns 301–02W.

The tables show the Public Safety Radio Communications Service (PSRCS) core costs as contained in the PSRCS contract, and the anticipated distribution of estimated menu costs over the 10-year period. Forces will additionally need to purchase control room and radio terminal equipment. Based upon our present understanding of the police service's overall requirement, we estimate the initial purchase and subsequent replacement costs for terminals to be around £300 million in net present cost terms over the whole PSRCS contract life. We cannot at present assign these costs to individual forces.

The future costs of the project will be taken into account during our discussions with the Treasury on spending for the next three years, the results of which are expected to be announced in the summer.

Estimated PSRCS menu charges, based on same roll-out profile as core charges

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many units of accommodation the National Asylum Seekers Support Service has so far secured for housing destitute asylum seekers. [128558]

Mrs. Roche: As of 30 June the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) had placed 3,028 destitute asylum seekers into accommodation. The process of accommodating destitute asylum seekers is of course demand led. The exact number of units available changes day by day as providers notify the service of properties. We are continuing to negotiate with both the public and private sector for further accommodation, but it was always the intention that accommodation providers would be asked to provide accommodation on a basis of need.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff are employed at the National Asylum Seekers Support Service. [128560]

Mrs. Roche: As of 30 June there were 433 staff employed in the National Asylum Support Service. Of these 423 are employed in Croydon. In addition there are 10 Regional Managers situated around the country who are responsible for ensuring that the support arrangements function satisfactorily in their area.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he has given to the Refugee Council on the establishment of emergency reception facilities for destitute asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [128559]

Mrs. Roche: Officials in the National Asylum Support Service have provided assistance to the Refugee Council in identifying suitable property and in contract negotiation where this has proved necessary. In addition, the Refugee Council has been given advice on the standards we expect to be met for emergency accommodation that is provided for destitute asylum seekers while their claim for support by the National Asylum Support Service is considered.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases the National Asylum Seekers Support Service has so far (a) assessed and (b) referred to accommodation outside London. [128557]

Mrs. Roche: As of 30 June the National Asylum Support Service had received 5,327 applications for support. Not all of these would have included a request for accommodation. As of 30 June 3,212 asylum seekers including dependents had been dispersed to accommodation outside London.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the last review of the Criminal Injuries Compensation scheme took place; what its conclusions were; when the next review is due; and if he will make a statement. [128537]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The scheme is under review at the present time. The review was launched by the issue last year of a consultation paper entitled "Compensation for Victims of Violent Crime: Possible Changes to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme". The responses to that public consultation exercise are still under consideration, and we hope to be in a position to announce our intentions shortly after the summer recess.

Prison Service

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the results achieved by the Prison Service on each of its key performance indicators during 1999–2000. [129194]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service is currently assembling final performance data for 1999–2000. The key performance indicator (KPI) results will be reported in the Prison Service Annual Report and Accounts which is scheduled to be laid before Parliament on 20 July 2000. Copies will be placed in the Library.

The provisional KPI results for 1999–2000 were given in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 210–12W.

Anti-suicide Strategy (Women Prisoners)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to produce an anti-suicide strategy relating to women in prison; and if he will make a statement. [128740]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service's current suicide awareness strategy came into effect from April 1994. Its main principles apply equally across all types of prisons and prisoners whether male/female, adult/young offender or remand/sentenced. This approach to caring for the suicidal is based upon sound research and draws upon best practice from within other organisations.

Strategies for reducing the risk of suicide are kept under continual review. The publication of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons thematic review: "Suicide is Everyone's Concern" last year provided a key impetus for this work. Work is in progress to examine how existing strategies can be better tailored to the needs of women prisoners. Guidance and good practice will be incorporated in a Prison Service order due for issue later this year.

Data Protection Act 1998

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many certificates he has signed with respect to section 28 of the Data Protection Act 1998 since 1 March. [129186]

Mr. Straw: None. However, I expect to sign a certificate in the near future.

Death in Custody

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the investigations carried out into the death in custody of Nathan Graham by the (a) Governor of HM prison Whatton and (b) Nottinghamshire police. [128702]

Mr. Boateng: I am replying, as the Minister responsible for prisons.

An internal investigation into the death of Nathan Graham at Nottingham prison on 9 November 1999 was carried out by David Walmsley, Governor of Whatton prison. This is routine practice on behalf of the Prison Service and an investigation report of the findings has been compiled. This report was disclosed to Mr. Graham's family before the inquest. The report concluded that there were no grounds for any disciplinary action against prison staff.

An investigation into this death was also conducted by Nottinghamshire police on behalf of the Coroner, in view of the unusual circumstances of this case (Mr. Graham was disabled). There was no evidence of any criminal action in this matter and no charges were laid against prison staff. Mr. Graham's death was considered at a Coroner's inquest between 7–9 June, when it was adjourned. A date has yet to be set for the resumption of this inquest.

Holloway Prison

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the windows in cells in Holloway Prison will be changed to make it impossible to attach a ligature to them; and if he will make a statement. [128741]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service is currently testing prototype improved window ventilators at Holloway prison. These will be evaluated to assess all potential benefits, including the effectiveness of their anti-ligature properties. Following the assessment, funding will be sought through the Prison Service's normal capital appraisal process for installation of the most appropriate ventilators. Assuming these funds (likely to be of the order of £8 million) are forthcoming, a rolling installation programme for all cells at Holloway will be developed. Completion of such a programme could take three to four years.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128990]

Mr. Straw: The Home Department does not maintain a list of approved vehicle manufacturers. The Home Department accesses Ministry of Defence contracts to acquire its vehicles. The following list includes all mainstream British vehicle manufacturers.

Ministry of Defence contractors, cars and commercial vehicles, accessed by the Home Office:

Rover
Land Rover
Ford Motor Company
Vauxhall Motors
Peugeot Motor Co.
Nissan Motor (GB) Ltd.
Honda (UK) Ltd.
Volkswagen AG
Citroen UK Ltd.
Fiat
Renault Cars
Volvo Car UK Ltd.
Diahatsu UK
LDV Ltd.
Leyland DAF Trucks Ltd.
International Motors (ERF Trucks).

Departmental policy for the selection of vehicles has three main roots:

to select the vehicles most suited to the task bearing in mind our responsibility for the disbursement of public funds; to uphold the policies of the European Communities supplies directive 93/36/EC Purchase of Goods; and to reduce the environmental impact of the fleet by ensuring that 70 per cent. of the vehicles purchased this year will incorporate either high pressure injection diesel engines with particulate filters, or dual fuel petrol liquid petroleum gas engines.

Football Hooligans

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what efforts are being made to inform football clubs of the identities of the football hooligans who were (a) detained and (b) deported from Euro 2000. [128156]

Mr. Straw: It is the intention of the Football Association, with the strong support of the Government, to seek life bans from their home grounds for any individual convicted of offences involving hooliganism at Euro 2000; this cannot, however, apply to the majority of those detained and deported, since it has been acknowledged by the Belgian authorities that many of those detained or deported were not guilty of any criminal offence.

It is intended that the Bill on football hooliganism which I announced on 4 July 2000, Official Report, columns 170–83, should include provisions better to permit the National Criminal Intelligence Service to transfer appropriate information to the Football Association.

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many international restriction orders against football hooligans are in force in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland. [128151]

Mr. Straw: There are currently 106 people subject to international football banning orders in England and Wales; there is no equivalent legislation in Scotland or in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many international restriction orders have been made in each of the past 10 years. [128152]

Mr. Straw: There were 19 restriction orders imposed in 1990, four in 1991, two in 1992, none in 1993, one in each of 1994, 1995 and 1996, 10 in 1997, and 100 in 1998. In 1999, 18 restriction orders were imposed, as well as three international football banning orders, which replaced the restriction order under the terms of the Football (Offences and Disorder) Act 1999. So far 28 international football banning orders have so far been imposed in 2000.

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those football hooligans deported from Euro 2000. [128157]

Mr. Straw: No, since it has been acknowledged by the Belgian authorities that many of those deported were not guilty of any criminal offence.

Police (Out-of-court Settlements)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the out-of-court settlements agreed to by police forces in the UK since 1 January 1998, broken down by police force, indicating in each case the recipient, the amount agreed and the reason for the settlement; what process exists for police forces to make a decision to settle out-of-court; how the public are informed of such decisions; and if he will make a statement. [128516]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information is available centrally only on the number and total amount of settlements agreed in 1998–99 before proceedings were initiated or after court proceedings were commenced but before final judgment, including payments "without accepting liability". The available information has been placed in the Library for each force in England and Wales by type of action. 1998–99 was only the second year in which forces were requested to supply this information and the information provided is not complete.

The process by which a force agrees to settle a case out of court is one for the force and its insurers (where it has employer and public liability cover). This will be based on an assessment of the cost and likelihood of successfully defending an action. Forces are accountable to their police authority for their handling of these cases. The Government's response to the Home Affairs Select Committee's report in 1998 on the Confidentiality of Police Settlements of Civil Claims supported the view that forces should publish information about civil actions in their annual reports.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Winter Fuel Allowance

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when men aged between 60 and 64 years in the Bury St. Edmunds constituency will receive their Winter Fuel Allowance; and if he will make a statement on the reason for the delays. [129021]

Angela Eagle: Retrospective payments for previous years Winter Fuel Payments started to be paid in the week commencing 26 June 2000 in line with Government's targets. The payments will be issued as claims are processed and are not defined in postcode areas. Some customers in Bury St. Edmunds may have already received their payment and the remainder will receive them over the coming months as claims are received and processed.

Claimants (Criminal Convictions)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to modify the benefit arrangements for claimants who have criminal convictions which will appear on criminal conviction certificates and other certificates issued under the Police Act 1997; what assessment he has made of the extent to which details displayed on certificates may result in claimants being unable to find suitable work easily; what plans he has to increase payments to claimants who are obliged to certificate on a regular basis; and if he will make a statement. [129138]

Angela Eagle: We have no plans to modify the benefit arrangements for claimants who have criminal convictions which will appear on criminal conviction certificates and other certificates issued under the Police Act 1997.

The Home Office will be working closely with relevant organisations to ensure that guidance is provided to encourage employers not to reject applicants with a criminal record without careful consideration of all the relevant factors.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129057]

Mr. Rooker: The PRIME (Private Sector Resource Initiative for Management of the Estate) contract, commenced on 1 April 1998. It has an estimated private sector capital spend value of £350 million. It has not been subject to refinancing and has no specific refinancing share mechanism, but does provide for possible sharing of windfall gains and profits, including benefits from refinancing, made in the first five years.

The ACCORD (Access to Corporate Data) project has so far progressed to signature of four Services Agreements, which are contractual vehicles to enable the Department to award specific PFI/PPP contracts in future. None of the Service Agreements contains a monetary value, but the projects estimated private sector capital spend value is £100 million. No contracts yet exist, and contract negotiations will include possibilities for sharing in future savings.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of the claims for disability living allowance from sufferers of MS were rejected by the tribunal because the sufferer was in temporary remission in the last three years. [129001]

Mr. Bayley: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Hunting with Hounds

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, in respect of implementation of the Burns report on banning hunting with hounds, what estimate he has made of the total additional social security payments which will fall to be paid, broken down by type of benefit. [129038]

Angela Eagle: The Burns Report (The Final Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Hunting with Dogs in England and Wales) investigated the effects of banning hunting on employment. Its finding was that, in view of all the uncertainties, it is not possible to give a precise figure for the number of jobs that would be lost if hunting were banned. Consequently, it is not possible to estimate accurately the effects on Social Security expenditure.

Pensions

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) of 26 June 2000, Official Report, columns 348–49W, on pensions, if he will re-present the figures assuming (a) the state second pension remains earnings related and (b) the minimum earnings guarantee is available to those who made no second pension provision and the Minimum Income Guarantee is uprated in line with earnings; if he will set out the assumptions about investment returns which underly his estimates of returns on stakeholder pensions; what assumption he has made about the level of contributions to stakeholder pensions; and if he will estimate the effects of these projections based on 75 per cent. of average earnings. [128623]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the tables.

Estimated basic and compulsory second tier pension for someone on average earnings throughout their working life who reaches pensionable age in 2050, assuming state second pension remains earnings-related

	All	Man	Woman
Basic Pension	31.00	31.00	31.00
Additional Pension from State scheme or stakeholder pension	71.00	73.00	67.00
Total Pension	102.00	103.00	98.00

Estimated basic and compulsory second tier pension for someone on 75 per cent. of average earnings throughout their working life who reaches pensionable age in 2050, assuming state second pension remains earnings-related

	All	Man	Woman
Basic Pension	31.00	31.00	31.00
Additional Pension from State scheme or stakeholder pension	65.00	67.00	67.00
Total Pension	96.00	98.00	91.00

Notes:

1. Figures, which are in 1999 earnings terms, are rounded to the nearest £ and may not sum as a result.

2. The estimates are based on 100 per cent. and 75 per cent. of average earnings of (i) all full-time employees; (ii) all male full-time employees; and (iii) all female full-time employees.

3. The estimates are based on a person beginning work at 16 and working for 49 years until age 65.

4. The estimates are based on the Department's Lifepen model and the following assumptions:

Stakeholder pensions start April 2001
State Second Pension starts April 2002
Earnings grow 1.5 per cent. a year faster than prices
Basic State pension is uprated in line with prices

Projections for stakeholder pensions are based on National Insurance rebates only. They are estimated weekly amounts a person would receive if the investment return and other relevant factors affecting the amount of the stakeholder pension were the same as the assumptions underlying the calculation of the National Insurance rebates paid into a stakeholder pension. No allowance is made for voluntary contributions made by individuals or their employers.

The level of the rebates will be determined by the Secretary of State based on the advice of the Government Actuary. The assumptions which underlie the rebate, including investment return, will be the subject of a consultation exercise by the Government Actuary this summer, culminating in an Order to be laid before Parliament no later than April 2001. The Order will set the rebate rates for the period April 2002 to March 2007.

In 1999 earnings terms, the value of the Minimum Income Guarantee would remain constant at £75 a week if it were consistently increased in line with earnings.

Child Benefit

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people receive Child Benefit by area in Great Britain. [129912]

Mr. Darling: Figures for the numbers of families receiving Child Benefit as at 14 August 1999 broken down by parliamentary constituency, government office region and local authority have been placed in the Library.

Pensioners

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in Hendon are aged over (a) 65, (b) 75 and (c) 85 years; how many in each of (a) to (c) receive minimum income guarantee; and how many (i) pensioners and (ii) pensioner couples will (1) receive winter fuel payments this year and (2) qualify for a free television licence. [129276]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Number of pensioners receiving the minimum income guarantee in Hendon parliamentary constituency

Age of claimant	Number of claimants
65–74	800
75–84	900
85 and over	700

Notes:

1. Figures for pensioners receiving the minimum income guarantee are based on a 5 per cent. sample and are therefore subject to a degree of sampling error. For this analysis pensioners are defined as where the claimant is aged 65 or over. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred.

2. The numbers eligible for winter fuel payments include some people aged between 60 to 64 who are not yet eligible for a pension.

3. The numbers of pensioner households qualifying for free television licenses refer to any household which is the primary place of residence for any pensioner aged 75 or over.

4. Information about the numbers of pensioners in Hendon is not held.

Source:

Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry, February 2000

We estimate that around 19,000 people will be eligible for winter fuel payments in the Hendon constituency this winter. It is not possible to give a further breakdown of these figures at this stage.

Three million pensioner households will qualify nationally for a free television licence this year. We do not hold this information at local level.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Correspondence

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will reply to the letter from the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey of 28 February concerning Mr. M. Grove. [127347]

Mr. Byers: As the right hon. Lady has been informed, the issue she has raised is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I have therefore passed the correspondence to him.

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the hon. Member for Broxbourne will receive a reply to her letters of (a) 3 April, (b) 5 May, (c) 1 June and (d) 29 June relating to her constituent Mr. S. Kitchiner. [128916]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 4 July 2000]: I replied to the hon. Member on 4 July 2000.

Start-up Assistance

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses have benefited from start-up assistance from Government schemes; what types of business have benefited; and what initiatives have been taken in the years 1997 to 2000 (a) nationally, (b) in Teesside and (c) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128512]

Ms Hewitt: Numbers of businesses which have used Business Link services, which includes advice to people wanting to start their own business, since 1997 is as follows:

Year	Number
1997–98	446,040
1998–99	393,580
1999–2000	419,294

Note:

Businesses using BL more than once in a quarter count only once. Business using BL more than once in different quarters are counted in each quarter.

Nationally, the following major initiatives have been taken since 1997: the Government made their commitment in the Competitiveness White Paper published in December 1998 to provide a new high-quality advice service to 10,000 businesses in England per annum by the end of 2001, focusing on those with high growth potential; the Small Business Service, launched in April this year, will provide information, advice and access to experts on all aspects of running a business. The SBS is ensuring that the Business Link Network tailors its services to the different needs of the whole range of smaller businesses, including the self-employed and those considering starting-up in business; my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on 23 June this year a new package of help worth up to £500, and £2000 in areas of high unemployment, for anyone in Britain wanting to start up in business; the DTI is spending some £3 million on the Business Volunteer Mentoring Scheme, which is currently being piloted. The scheme is based on a core of volunteers—both retired and otherwise—drawn from all sections of the business community and who will provide mentoring for pre-start-ups, start-ups and those businesses yet to reach the stage of stability.

In Teesside, Start Right in Business, a Tees Valley TEC-led partnership, aims to provide support and funding to help create and maintain 900 new businesses during 1999–2001. The partnership brings together unemployed people, local authorities, Business Link Tees Valley, local enterprise agencies, banks and private sector sponsors to give training, advice and support to people wanting to set up their own business.

No separate information is available for the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East.

Former Officials (Employment)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many officials, on ceasing employment in his Department, have sought permission to take up employment, since May 1997, with (a) companies and (b) partnerships under the business appointment rules; and to what companies and partnerships they went. [128453]

Dr. Howells: Between May 1997 and June 2000, a total of 195 applications have been made to take up external appointments. As applicants are not required to detail the status of the organisation they are proposing to join, it is not possible to break down applications by type of organisation.

Only senior Crown servants are required to notify that they have taken up appointment after their applications are approved. The following information details relevant appointments that have been taken up:

Further information on appointments approved prior to May 1999 is published in the First and Second Reports of The Advisory Committee on Business Appointments that are available in the Library of the House. Details of appointments approved since May 1999 will be covered in the Third Report of the Advisory Committee.

Malaysia

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the export licences granted for the export of (a) CS gas, (b) CS irritant cartridges and (c) CS canisters to Malaysia (1) in each year since 1992 broken down by category code; [128552]

(2) since 1992 where end use destination was for other countries. [128553]

Dr. Howells: The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating. The export of CS gas, CS irritant cartridges and CS canisters are controlled under entries in Part III of Schedule I of the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 as amended (commonly known as the Military List): CS and other irritants under entry ML7; cartridges (as ammunition) containing CS irritants under entries ML3 or PL5021 and canisters containing CS irritants under ML4 or PL5030. However, a variety of other devices may contain tear gas and these are also controlled under the latter four entries above as well as several other entries: for instance, portable anti-riot devices for administering an incapacitating substance under PL5001; grenades under ML4 or PL5030; ammunition (including artillery and mortar) under ML3 or PL5021; gas projectors or generators under ML2 or PL5018; gas projecting equipment for controlled ground vehicles, combatant vessels or aircraft, that are specially designed or modified for military use under entries ML6, ML9, or ML10 respectively; and portable devices designed for self-protection by the administration of an incapacitating substance under entry 1A905 of the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulation 1996, as amended. It should be noted that other goods may also be controlled under each of these entries.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. Between 1 January 1992 and 1 May 1997, 548 Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) were issued covering the export to consignees or end users in Malaysia of goods with the relevant ratings: in the same period six SIELs were issued covering such exports to consignees in Malaysia with end users in any other destination.

Individual licences may cover a range of goods with various ratings and OIELs may cover a range of countries. Where this is so, the licence is included in the table in the total for all the relevant ratings.

An Open Individual Export Licence (OIEL) is specific to an individual exporter and covers multiple shipments of specified goods to specified destinations and/or, in some cases, specified consignees; these licences do not authorise exports by the licensee other than to those destinations specified on the licence and do not prohibit transfer between those permitted destinations. The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. Between 1 January 1994 and 1 May 1997, 57 OIELs were issued covering the export of goods with the relevant ratings to Malaysia and any other destination.

It would entail disproportionate cost to establish which, if any of these licences covered the export of the particular types of equipment concerned, and make any subsequent inquiries necessary under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

All of the information set out should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307–08W.

Finally, Malaysia is a permitted destination on certain Open General Export Licences covering the export of goods on the Military List and other goods; copies of all Open General Export Licences are routinely placed in the Library of the House.

Research Councils

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions are taking place in the Office of Science and Technology concerning the future of the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils. [128858]

Ms Hewitt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the terms of reference for the quinquennial review of the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils in his reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on 13 June 2000, Official Report, columns 596–97W.

Daresbury Laboratory

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans are being considered for the future of the Daresbury Laboratory as a scientific research establishment after 2007. [128857]

Ms Hewitt: The future of Daresbury laboratory is a matter for the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils (CCLRC) which, under its Royal Charter, is responsible for the staff and resources under its control. Further to this, the Government have recognised the need to consider Daresbury's role in the North West Science Base and have commissioned two reviews to consider this matter. I refer the hon. Member to the announcements of the North West Science Review on 27 April 2000 and the North West Science and Daresbury Development Group on 9 June 2000, Official Report, column 388W.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effect on small and medium-sized enterprises of the assisted area status policy. [128865]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced the introduction of Enterprise Grant Areas in England on 15 July 1999, Official Report, column 275W. Small and medium sized enterprises in the Enterprise Grant Areas and in Tiers 1 and 2 of the Assisted areas are eligible to apply for Enterprise Grants. The introduction of Enterprise Grant Areas significantly increased the number of areas in England where small and medium sized enterprises could apply for grants to support investment.

Package Holidays

Mr. Roy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints his Department has received in the last 12 months in relation to the pricing of foreign package holidays. [128997]

Dr. Howells: According to Departmental records, a total of 46 complaints were received in the last 12 months in relation to the pricing of foreign package holidays. Seventeen of these were from the same person.

Hyder Plc

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his policy is regarding the repatriation of the consideration of competition issues arising from the sale of Hyder plc. [129031]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The Director General of Fair Trading advises this Department on the competition issues raised in cases that have fallen to the EC Merger Regulation. The Secretary of State will assess whether Western Power Distribution Limited's proposed acquisition of Hyder Plc meets the tests laid down in the EC Merger Regulation by which member states can request referral of cases from the Commission and whether to request such a referral in the light of the DGFT's advice.

Exports Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a draft regulatory impact assessment in advance of the announcement of the conclusions of the review of the Export Credits Guarantee Department. [129394]

Mr. Caborn: There are no plans to make a Regulatory Impact assessment in advance of the Review announcement. It is unlikely that the Review will lead to any legislation or change in regulations.

Memo Leak

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to launch an inquiry into the leaking of a memo sent to him by Andrew Fraser. [129416]

Mr. Byers: An internal inquiry into the leaking of the memo sent to me by Andrew Fraser is underway.

Commuter Coach Services

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the operation of Commuter coach services from Kent to London to the Competition Commission. [129311]

Dr. Howells: Under UK competition law in the first instance, it is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) to investigate allegations of anti-competitive behaviour and possible abuses of a dominant position.

If my hon. Friend has any evidence that competition in this market is not working, he should draw it to the attention of the DGFT.

Post Office (Subsidies)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has held with small business organisations concerning his proposals to pay subsidies to sub-post offices. [129431]

Mr. Byers: In preparing their report "Counter Revolution: Modernising the Post Office Network", the Performance and Innovation Unit (PIU) had discussions with a number of organisations representing small businesses. In addition, both the PIU and I have had extensive discussions with the National Federation of Subpostmasters about the Government's proposals for financial assistance to modernise and improve the sub-post office network.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has held with the EU concerning his proposals to pay subsidies to sub-post offices. [129432]

Mr. Byers: The European Competition Commissioner has been informed about the new package of measures to modernise the post office network. Throughout the process of developing detailed projects officials will work in close consultation with the European Commission.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what recent discussions he has had with the European Commission about the legality of granting subsidies to post offices; [129212]

(2) if he has clearance from the EU competition authorities to grant subsidies to post offices. [129211]

Mr. Byers: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given today to the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning).

Post Office Network

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sub-post offices are projected to close in (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02 and (c) 2002–03. [129418]

Mr. Byers: As all sub-post offices are privately owned and operated, there can be many different reasons leading to a decision to close and there is no accurate way of forecasting future closure levels. However, the Post Office seeks to maintain post office services wherever possible and this policy is being reinforced by the Government's requirement on the Post Office to maintain the rural network and to prevent any avoidable closures of rural post offices.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a copy of the research by Christie and Co., referred to on page 62 of the Performance and Innovation Unit's report into the post office network. [129430]

Mr. Byers: Christie and Co. provided information about sub-post offices to the Performance and Innovation Unit on an exclusive and confidential basis as the information was and is commercially sensitive. I am therefore unable to place a copy of this research in the Library of the House.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research his Department has commissioned into the impact of Internet-based services on the letters market. [129420]

Mr. Byers: This issue is kept under review by the Post Office.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate he has made of the level of remuneration sub-post masters will receive for acting as Government general practitioners; and if he will make a statement; [129423]

(2) what level of additional investment the Horizon platform will require to operate the universal bank; [129427]

(3) if the Government intend to provide financial support for the improvement of the urban post office network recommended on page 88 of the Performance and Innovation Unit's report into the post office network; [129426]

(4) what estimate he has made of the (a) setting up cost and (b) annual running cost of the universal bank; [129424]

(5) if benefit claimants who opt to receive their benefits in cash from a post office following the switch to ACT will be required to have a bank account; [129428]

(6) what plans he has for delivery of funds to support post offices in urban deprived areas; [129434]

(7) what estimate he has made of the income to the Post Office which will be generated by the universal bank; [129425]

(8) what estimate he has made of the impact on the income of sub-post offices if those people who do not have a bank account at present start to pay utility bills by direct debit following the introduction of the universal bank; [129429]

(9) how much funding he will commit to improve post offices in deprived areas. [129433]

Mr. Byers: I refer the hon. Member to my statement and subsequent exchanges on 28 June 2000, Official Report, columns 907–20, and the PIU report also published on 28 June, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House and the Vote Office.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of rural sub-post offices have ISDN lines. [129421]

Mr. Byers: I understand from the Post Office that they do not have a percentage breakdown of rural post offices which currently have an ISDN line, but every post office will have an ISDN line or equivalent satellite link by February 2001.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the cost of installing ISDN lines to the post office network. [129422]

Mr. Byers: Under the existing Horizon programme, every post office outlet will have an ISDN line or equivalent satellite link by February 2001. The costs are an integral part of the Horizon contract.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the average figures for European unleaded petrol prices for each country of the European Union in pence per litre, with the amount of tax paid and the percentage of tax this represents. [129285]

Mrs. Liddell: The latest available information for premium unleaded petrol prices and taxes is for April 2000 and is as shown.

TREASURY

Pensioners' Incomes

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent assessment his Department has made of levels of taxation on pensioners' income; and if he will make a statement. [127613]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Six out of 10 pensioners do not have any income tax to pay. In his 1999 Budget, the Chancellor increased the age-related personal allowances by an amount well above inflation, and in his latest Budget maintained their value by increasing them by statutory indexation. As a result in 2000–01, someone aged 65 to 74 can have an income of £111 a week before paying tax. This Government are committed to supporting older people. We will be spending an extra £6.5 billion on pensioners in the course of this Parliament.

Child Tax Credit

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much it costs to send out the forms to taxpayers in respect of child tax credit; and if he will make a statement. [128364]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue sent out claim forms in June to all PAYE taxpayers who they thought might be eligible for the Child Tax Credit. The cost of doing this is estimated to be about £1.7 million.

Environmental Taxation

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies have used the mechanism which allows them to contribute 20 per cent. of their tax obligations to environmental bodies. [128318]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 3 July 2000]: Operators of landfill sites who are registered for landfill tax may claim tax credits for contributions that they make to support environmental projects. There are currently 850 registered operators. Of these, 494 have made contributions representing 91 per cent. of the potential amount available as tax credits.

Individual Savings Accounts

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the number of new ISA accounts opened by savers who did not previously hold (a) PEPs or (b) TESSAs. [129027]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Detailed information on each ISA opened has to be sent to the Inland Revenue by ISA managers after the end of each tax year. The information for 1999–2000 has not yet been received from all ISA managers. When all this has arrived, the Inland Revenue will be able to start the analysis which will determine how many ISA savers do not also have TESSAs and PEPs.

Cruickshank Report

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on (a) the Cruickshank report on anti-fraud aspects of the future development of credit card technology and (b) representations by Europay and its members on the technical basis underlying the report. [128932]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The Government have consulted and received responses from a number of organisations about the Cruikshank report's recommendations on payment systems. While some of these have referred to fraud issues the responses have tended to focus on the broader competition issues raised in the report.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assistance he will provide for micro businesses that will not benefit from the reduction in National Insurance contributions to address the impact of the climate change levy. [128935]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 5 July 2000]: Small and medium-sized firms stand well placed to benefit from a number of the features of the climate change levy package, notably the reduction in employers' National Insurance Contributions, the enhanced capital allowances for energy savings investments and the £50 million 'energy efficiency' fund. In particular, one of the specific aims of the £50 million 'energy efficiency' fund is to provide energy efficiency advice/audits to small and medium sized firms. Furthermore, firms that are very small consumers of energy—as set out in Schedule 6 of the Finance Bill—will be covered by the exemption for the domestic sector, and will therefore not be subject to the climate change levy.

Petroleum Product Smuggling

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of revenue lost due to the (a) cross-border purchasing and (b) smuggling of road fuels in Northern Ireland; and what are his latest estimates for the volume of legitimate fuel imports from the Republic of Ireland to (i) Northern Ireland and (ii) Great Britain. [128183]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 20 March 2000, Official Report, 442W.

HM Customs and Excise do not have information on which to base estimates for the volume of commercial-scale legitimate fuel imports from the Republic of Ireland to Northern Ireland and Great Britain.

Fuel Duty

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the most recent figures for road fuel duty levels in (a) the Republic of Ireland and (b) the United Kingdom, in sterling; and if he will estimate the additional duty for (i) a motorist to fill a tank of petrol in an average car and (ii) a haulier to fill a tank of diesel in an average lorry in (1) Northern Ireland and (2) the Republic of Ireland. [128184]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 5 July 2000]: The rates of excise duty for the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland are published in the European Commission's Oils Bulletin, which is kept in the House of Commons Library.

Financial Service Authority

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the annual report of the Financial Services Authority to be published. [129789]

Miss Melanie Johnson: A copy of the Board's report was laid before Parliament today. It includes a report, pursuant to Section 1(3) of the Banking Act 1987, on the exercise of the Authority's functions under that Act, during the period 1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000. It also includes the report made by the FSA under section 117 of the Financial Services Act 1986, covering the period 1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Knowledge Economy

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 June 2000, Official Report, column 106W, on the knowledge economy, if he will list representations that he has received during the course of the review; and if he will make a statement. [129279]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The representations received during the course of the review from external organisations and individuals were provided in confidence.

Aggregates Tax

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he has had with Scottish industry concerning the implementation of the aggregates tax in 2002; and if he will make a statement. [129042]

Mr. Timms: The Government have developed the aggregates levy in an open and consultative way. HM Customs and Excise issued a consultation document in June 1998, which invited views from industry and other parties with a potential interest on the practical issues that would arise from a levy on aggregates. Draft legislation for the levy was then published for consultation on 30 April 1999.

During this process, the Government have received a number of representations from Scottish business, and these have been taken account of in the design of the levy.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the proposed aggregates tax on Scottish industry; and if he will make statement. [129040]

Mr. Timms: The aggregates levy will bring about environmental benefits by making the price of aggregates better reflect their true environmental costs. This will provide an incentive for all business to use more recycled aggregates and to use all aggregates more efficiently.

All of the revenues raised will be recycled back through a cut in employer NICs and a new "Sustainability Fund" aimed at delivering local environmental benefits. It is not possible to say precisely what the effect will be on Scottish industry, since this will depend, among other things, on the degree to which firms switch to recycled materials.

Quarrying (Scotland)

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implementation of the new Quarrying Sustainability Fund in Scotland. [129041]

Mr. Timms: The Government will be consulting all interested parties shortly on how the new Sustainability Fund can best be used to deliver local environmental improvements.

No decisions have yet been made on the form or size of the Fund.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Terrorist Violence

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each week since 1 January the number of (a) punishment beatings, (b) punishment shootings and (c) murders in Northern Ireland, indicating the number in each category attributable to (i) Republican terrorist organisations and (ii) Loyalist terrorist organisations. [128616]

Mr. Ingram: The table shows the number of casualties resulting from paramilitary-style attacks for the period 1 January to 28 June 2000. The figures may be subject to amendment.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department prior to 30 May, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129061]

Mr. Mandelson: The Northern Ireland Office has never entered into any PFI contracts.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government first consulted English Nature about the contamination by GMOs of rape seed. [123834]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The Government have not formally consulted English Nature about the planting of oil seed rape containing 1 per cent. GM material. However, English Nature is aware of the facts and has been in contact with my officials since 18 May. English Nature has stated publicly in a press notice of 22 May 2000 that there is no immediate risk to wildlife from the contaminated rapeseed.

English Nature is also an assessor on the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) and was party to the ACRE meeting on 25 May where members discussed this matter in full and further endorsed their recent advice.

Crop Contamination

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish advice given to him by English Nature on the GM contamination of Advanta Seeds UK's Hyola spring oilseed rape. [124325]

Mr. Meacher: English Nature has not given formal advice on this matter. English Nature published a press notice of 22 May 2000, stating that there is no immediate risk to wildlife from the contaminated rapeseed. A copy has been placed in the House Library.

Incineration

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to introduce independent and comprehensive testing of incinerator emissions and ash. [126471]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 20 June 2000]: Incinerator emissions are already tightly regulated. Under the provisions of Part I the Environmental Protection Act 1990, regulators (for England and Wales, either the Environment Agency for larger plant and all hazardous waste incinerators, or local authorities for other plant) must include in an incineration plant's permit conditions to deliver BAT/BATNEEC (Best Available Techniques Not Entailing Excessive Cost). Guidance is published on what constitutes BATNEEC. The regulators have powers to require independent emissions testing where they consider it warranted.

Data on levels of dioxins in ash sent for disposal are not routinely held by the Agency or my Department. The operators of incineration plant are required by section 34 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to provide sufficient information to those managing waste ash to ensure that it is disposed of appropriately, for example chemical and physical information. They are also required to ensure that ashes which contain hazardous substances above certain thresholds are disposed of in accordance with the Special Waste Regulations 1996 (as amended). Environment Agency powers enable it to monitor the operation of these controls. We have no plans at present to introduce further requirements for testing ash sent for disposal.

The Environment Agency requires that site-specific authorisation be sought for the use of ash in unbound construction applications and for ashes which have not been 'characterised' on the basis of various chemical properties. Where used in a construction application the processed ashes will normally be required to meet relevant technical specifications. We understand that the industry is working towards a quality control procedure to ensure that the ash consistently meets the 'fit for purpose' criteria required by these technical specifications. DETR, the Environment Agency and industry representative organisations are also developing a policy protocol for the use of Incineration Bottom Ash (IBA) in construction applications. A draft is currently under review. It will also require the 'characterisation' of ash for various chemical properties which, according to best practice, would be carried out in accordance with a robust quality control procedure.

The proposed waste incineration Directive (Common Position (EC) No 7/2000), which the Government have welcomed and which is now in the last stages of negotiations, will apply to virtually all types of incineration and co-incineration plant. It sets stringent standards for emissions to air and water, places controls on solid residues, and includes monitoring requirements for air and water emissions. Article 9 of the proposal also says:

> "Prior to determining the routes for the disposal or recycling of the residues from incineration and co-incineration plants, appropriate tests shall be carried out to establish the physical and chemical characteristics and the polluting potential of the different incineration residues."

Similar wording is already included in Article 9(4) of the hazardous waste incineration Directive (94/67/EC). Subject to the remaining stages of negotiations, the proposed Directive is likely to apply to new plant from Autumn 2002 and to existing plant from Autumn 2005.

Bus Drivers

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the extent of shortages of bus drivers; and if he will make a statement; [128447]

(2) if he will make it his policy to offer financial incentives to bus companies facing recruitment difficulties for the training of bus drivers. [128446]

Mr. Hill: My Department is aware of the difficulties being experienced by bus operators in recruiting and retaining bus drivers in some areas. The bus industry has drawn our attention to this issue, which has also been a matter considered as part of the Department's research on trends in the industry.

The responsibility for ensuring that they have sufficient drivers is primarily a matter for individual bus companies. However, my Department and the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency are pursuing with the industry what steps can be taken to assist with the current problems.

In addition, I understand the Department for Education and Employment has provided £145,000 to TRANSfED, the bus industry's National Training Organisation, to identify and address future skills needs.

Single Regeneration Funding

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the council wards in Morecambe and Lunesdale that are eligible for single regeneration funding. [128341]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 29 June 2000, Official Report, column 604W.

Heathrow

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals are under consideration by his Department for additional runways at Heathrow; and what is the status of these proposals. [128869]

Mr. Mullin: As the then Minister for Transport announced on 11 March 1999, Official Report, columns 360–61W, the South East and East of England Regional Air Services (SERAS) study will examine a wide range of options and has started from the position that nothing is ruled in and nothing is ruled out.

Options will be appraised through a process of successive sifts. A very large number of options will be considered during the sifting process, which is designed to reduce the options to a manageable number, so that those can be appraised in sufficient detail to support a meaningful public consultation at the end of the study.

Until then, it would be premature to comment on the scope or status of any option.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to introduce a performance target for tackling the backlog of repairs in the local authority sector; and if he will make a statement. [128903]

Mr. Raynsford: The Housing Green Paper issued in April sets out a range of proposals for tackling housing problems, including our commitment to ensure that all social housing is of a decent standard within 10 years. The Department's Public Service Agreement (PSA) target on the council house repairs backlog agreed in the 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review is to deliver a reduction of 10 per cent. in the backlog by April 2002. Any further targets will be announced following the current spending review.

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the proposed council housing stock transfer programme for 2000–01 on the rents of (a) existing tenants and (b) future tenants; and if he will make a statement. [129065]

Mr. Raynsford: The table shows (a) the transfer rents of existing tenants and (b) the relet rents of new tenants for local authorities who have places on the 2000–01 housing stock transfer programme. These rents are guaranteed to rise by not more than RPI plus 1 per cent. for five years after transfer under the new landlord. We would expect rent increases to be kept below this level wherever possible. We have also set out in the Housing Green Paper, our proposals for achieving rent harmonisation over the next 10 years.

Birmingham CC and Sunderland CC have yet to be formally accepted onto the programme.

Affordable Housing

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on setting targets for affordable housing in regional planning guidance; and if he will make a statement. [128908]

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State published his proposed changes to the South East and East of England draft Regional Planning Guidance in March this year. The consultation period finished on 19 June and the responses are still being analysed. Over 500 representations have been analysed as of 3 July. Of these some 100 have pressed for targets for affordable housing in regional planning guidance. However, this Government have made it clear that assessments of local housing needs are matters for local authorities to undertake in light of their local circumstances.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the current unmet need for affordable housing in (a) London and (b) England; and if he will make a statement. [128902]

Mr. Raynsford: While the Government have from time to time commissioned studies of the extent and nature of housing need to inform their views on the requirement for affordable housing in England, they believe that neither national nor regional estimates can adequately reflect the wide diversity of needs and priorities which exist at the local level. For these reasons, the Government believe that local authorities are best placed to carry out robust assessments of housing need in their areas.

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will (1) give local authorities greater discretion to secure affordable housing on sites for developments below the thresholds currently set out in Circular 6/96; and if he will make a statement; [129062]

(2) revise Circular 6/98 to reduce the threshold above which an affordable housing element can be secured through the planning system in (a) inner and (b) outer London; and if he will make a statement. [129064]

Mr. Raynsford: The thresholds were in fact reduced by Circular 6/98. We have recently issued Planning Policy Guidance Note 3: Housing (PPG3) which reaffirms the detailed policy guidance on affordable housing in Circular 6/98 including the flexibility to facilitate lower thresholds in areas of special need outside Inner London. We have no plans at present to revise the guidance.

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received on reducing the threshold set out in Circular 6/98 for securing affordable housing through the planning system; and if he will make a statement. [129067]

Mr. Raynsford: We received a number of representations about affordable housing in response to the consultation draft of revised Planning Policy Guidance note 3: Housing. Of these, 23 raised the question of the thresholds set out in Circular 6/98.

Starter Home Initiative

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his definition of a key worker is for the purposes of the Starter Home Initiative described in the Housing Green Paper; and if he will make a statement. [128901]

Mr. Raynsford: The Housing Green Paper made clear that the Government were looking for proposals on how the Starter Home Initiative could be operated most successfully and cost effectively, and that we would announce details of the initiative in the light of responses to the Green Paper and the Spending Review. The announcement will cover, inter alia, how a key worker might be defined.

Housing Rents

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide a breakdown by registered social landlord of the average rent paid by (a) existing tenants and (b) new tenants where large-scale voluntary transfers have taken place in each of the three years following transfer. [129066]

Mr. Raynsford: Information on average rents is collected by the Housing Corporation as part of their Regulatory Statistical Returns but information on average rents paid by transfer tenants and by new tenants is not collected separately. The Government have set out their proposals for rent harmonisation in the Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: a decent home for all".

M42 Motorway Service Area Development

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when a decision will be announced on the three motorway service area development applications on the M42 in Solihull. [128876]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government have set a target for deciding 80 per cent. of planning appeals within eight weeks of receipt of the Inspector's report following the local inquiry. The inquiry into the appeals closed in June, and the Inspector has not yet submitted his report to the Secretary of State. At the inquiry the Inspector indicated his intention to submit his report by September.

European Habitats Directive

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress in the implementation of the European Habitats Directive. [128733]

Mr. Meacher: Last year, the Government submitted a list of [illegible] UK sites as candidate Special Areas of Conservation under the Habitats Directive. The UK site list was, like those of other member states, criticised as inadequate by the European Commission in the autumn of last year. As a result, the country nature conservation agencies, co-ordinated by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, have conducted a fundamental review of site selection. The advice arising from that review is currently being considered and I hope to be able to make an announcement on a revised site list soon.

Housing (Capital Improvements)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the current year's investment is, for each London borough, per property, of capital improvements to (a) council and (b) housing association properties; and if he will make a statement. [129120]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 5 July 2000]: The latest available outturn data for Registered social landlords (RSLs) relate to 1999–2000, and for local authorities to 1998–99. Figures for local authorities in 1999–2000 will become available in the autumn.

Figures for planned expenditure on existing stock by RSLs based on Approved Development Programme (ADP) allocations for 2000–01 are also available. Local authorities reported their planned spend for 2000–01 on the HIP Annual Plan returns last summer but these plans were drawn up before HIP allocations for the year had been decided.

Contaminated Brownfield Sites

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will challenge the European Commission ruling that member state grants to clear contaminated brownfield land violate EU regulations. [128399]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We have accepted the European Commission's ruling of 22 December 1999 that the Partnership Investment Programme breached the state aid rules, and closed the programme from that date. We are discussing with the Commission possible ways forward on joint public/private partnership working in regeneration.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of brownfield sites in (a) England, (b) the South West and (c) Devon are classified by his Department as suffering from contamination preventing redevelopment. [128562]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Sites are not classified in the manner suggested. The potential impact of contamination on any development will depend significantly on the nature and design of the specific development. For example, a site which is "suitable" for development for commercial and retail uses may not be "suitable" for residential use without prior remediation.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many contaminated brownfield sites identified for development (a) qualify for Government grants to aid decontamination and (b) will be affected by the European Commission's ruling on state aid for decontamination. [128563]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Under the former Partnership Investment Programme, it was the specific development proposal for any given site which may have been eligible for support, not the site itself. Data are not available in the form requested, as sites were not classified as eligible for funding support.

Dartford River Crossings

Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about his plans for charging at the Dartford river crossings. [129910]

Mr. Hill: The current legislation authorising the collection of tolls at the Dartford river crossings is forecast to expire in June 2002. The cessation of tolling would be likely to have the effect of significantly increasing demand on the eastern sector of the M25 which would further increase the level of congestion at the crossings and elsewhere and have associated environmental and safety implications.

The Government are therefore minded to continue to charge for the use of the Dartford river crossings when the current legislation expires. Subject to the consent of Parliament we will consult next year on detailed proposals. Revenues from charging would be hypothecated for spending on transport.

Flooding

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide financial assistance to Wear Valley District Council under the Bellwin Scheme in respect of costs incurred following flooding in the district on the weekend of 3 and 4 June. [129913]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I am satisfied that financial assistance under the Bellwin scheme is justified in the case of Wear Valley District Council given the exceptional nature of the flooding and the damage caused. A scheme will, therefore, be established under section 155 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. Grant will be paid to the authority to cover 85 per cent. of the eligible costs above a threshold, which it has incurred in dealing with the flooding.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

GM Contamination

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to check if United Kingdom crops have been affected by GM contamination of French maize crops. [129915]

Mr. Nick Brown: Following reports in the French press last week that the French authorities had discovered low levels of GM presence in conventional maize seed imported into France, we contacted the French authorities, who confirmed on 30 June that they had indeed found some GM seed in conventional maize seed, which has been sown in South West France. Further information now indicates that they have found three different modifications in a number of varieties of forage maize imported into France by the company Golden Harvest. The French authorities have not yet confirmed which varieties of maize seed are involved, but have confirmed that sweetcorn varieties are not affected by their current investigations. We are seeking further information from them on the varieties concerned. However, as the varieties concerned are cultivated in Southern France, it is possible that they would be unsuitable for cultivation in UK conditions.

The GMs found in maize samples by the French authorities are BT 176 and BT 11, and one further, as yet unidentified, modification. BT 176 is insect resistant and has Part C consent within the EU under Directive 90/220 for import, food and feed use, and for cultivation. BT 11 is insect resistant and has Part C consent for import and use in animal feed. Pending further information from the French authorities, my Department, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Food Standards Agency are considering what the implications would be should further investigations indicate that affected seed may have been sown in the UK.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128992]

The Solicitor-General: The Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers and the Treasury Solicitor's Department make use of cars provided by the Government Car Service. I understand that the Cabinet Office will shortly give details of cars leased and purchased by the Government Car Service to my hon. Friend in a written answer.

The Crown Prosecution Service has a car and van leasing scheme. There is no purchase scheme. Under the leasing scheme, there are four approved manufacturers: Ford, Peugeot, Rover and Vauxhall. The Crown Prosecution Service ensures good value for money from its leasing scheme by seeking Competitive quotations for all new leases and, to take account of environmental considerations, there are limits on the size of engine capacities for leased vehicles.

The Serious Fraud Office neither leases nor has purchased cars or commercial vehicles, though it keeps this position under review.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by the Law Officers' Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129053]

The Solicitor-General: The Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers have not entered into any PFI contract.

Alton Manning

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will make a statement on the action he will take following the High Court ruling in respect of the Crown Prosecution Service's decision not to prosecute officers involved in the death of Alton Manning in Blakenhurst private prison. [129095]

The Solicitor-General: Judgment in this case was handed down on 17 May 2000 when the CPS decision not to prosecute was quashed and the matter was referred back to the CPS to reconsider the decision. The avenue of appeal is to the House of Lords. No appeal is possible unless the Divisional Court certifies that its decision involves a point of law of general public importance and unless leave to appeal is given by either the Divisional Court or the House of Lords. The relevant legislation provides 14 days within which to make an application to the Divisional Court for such certification and leave. The CPS made such an application within the 14-day limit.

DEFENCE

Trees

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's policy is on the country of origin of trees planted on its land and that of its agencies. [124633]

Mr. Spellar: Conservation is a key element in the Ministry of Defence's stewardship of its woodland and the Defence Estates Agency employs full-time professional foresters who manage this process on Ministry of Defence land. Woodland planning includes a study of the local habitat, the soil and the environmental impact of any planting. Wherever possible, species indigenous to the soil are planted, often using seeds collected on the Defence estate.

Reservists

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many reservists are currently serving with regular forces as mobilised soldiers; and in each of the last five years what was the total number of (a) regular forces, (b) reservists and (c) reservists serving with regular forces as mobilised soldiers. [126202]

Mr. Spellar: The total number of reservists currently serving as mobilised soldiers is 649. (This figure consists of members of the Army Reserve and Territorial Army)

Total number of regular forces for each of the last five years

Year	Number
1995	233,340
1996	221,870
1997	210,823
1998	210,136
1999	208,636

Total number of reservists[1] for each of the last five years

Year	Number
1995	348,956
1996	320,636
1997	321,977
1998	317,070
1999	306,440

[1] The total number of reservists consists of members of: the Royal Fleet Reserve, the Royal Naval Reserve, the Royal Marine Reserve, the Army Reserve, the Territorial Army, the Air Force Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force

Number of reservists serving as mobilised soldiers in each of the last five years

Year	Number
1995	[1]441
1996	1,416
1997	973
1998	756
1999	1,177

[1] Records start at the first call-up to Bosnia in December 1995. Figures for the rest of 1995 are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost

Note:

The figures include members of the Territorial Army and Army Reserve

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the detailed costs and benefits of the Royal Naval Reserve utilising reservists as Sea Harrier pilots, with particular reference to (a) the costs of the reservist pilot programme and (b) improved aircraft utilisation. [129282]

Mr. Spellar: The Air Branch of the RNR has 13 trained Sea Harrier pilots. All of them are former regular RN Sea Harrier pilots.

Their RNR function is to maintain a close familiarity with current military fast jet operations so that, in the event of call-out, it would take a minimum period of training to bring them up to operational standard and permit them to be deployed alongside, or in support of, their RN counterparts.

The minimum annual training requirement which these pilots are required to achieve is 17 Operational Role Training days. In the period April 1999 to March 2000 they averaged 25 training days. The training is designed to maintain otherwise perishable skills. The cost of 25 days' training, in current individual pilot salary terms, is £2,778.

With regard to the benefits of aircraft utilisation, in recent years one, but very often two, such pilots have at any time been serving in support of Sea Harrier pilot training. Every opportunity is taken to recall these pilots—when their civilian jobs allow—as a very cost-effective way of supporting the Regular forces and ensuring maximum usage of Sea Harrier aircraft.

Clyde Naval Base

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his long-term plans for the Clyde Naval Base, with special reference to the likely impact on the numbers employed there. [128073]

Mr. Spellar: The Defence Logistics Organisation has challenging targets to reduce costs while improving the quality of logistics support to the Front Line. As part of this, discussions are being held with the Dockyard companies and senior Trades Union national officers on the problem of over-capacity in warship support within the Dockyards and Naval Bases, including Clyde. The discussions are not aimed at closing any Dockyards or Naval Bases.

It is too early to say what the outcome of these discussions will be in terms of numbers employed.

Belize

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what British forces are stationed in Belize; and if he has any plans to increase their number. [129077]

Mr. Spellar: The British Army Training Support Unit Belize (BATSUB) is the only unit permanently stationed in Belize and consists of 84 British military personnel. There are no plans to increase this number.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received from the Belize Government regarding military assistance; and if he will make a statement. [129079]

Mr. Spellar: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I, as well as other Ministers including my right hon. Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, met Said Musa, the Prime Minister of Belize, during his recent visit to the United Kingdom. During our meeting we discussed the strong defence relationship between our two countries, and current levels of military assistance funding provided by the UK to Belize. Her Majesty's Government are giving further consideration to representations from Mr. Musa on this subject. I also took the opportunity to express our thanks to Mr. Musa for his country's continuing support for the British Army jungle training unit in Belize, BATSUB.

MLRS

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the Army's inventory is of MLRS; and how many are operationally available. [129123]

Mr. Spellar: The Army has 64 Multiple Launch Rocket Systems (MLRS) including one non-operational training equipment. Three systems are currently in storage or repair. As at 31 May 2000, the latest date for which information is available, 77 per cent. of systems were immediately available for operations increasing to 90 per cent. within 24 hours.

British Forces Post Office

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement about the future of British Forces Post Office, Mill Hill. [129277]

Mr. Spellar: A study is currently being conducted into the future structure and location of the British Forces Post Office, whose headquarters is at Inglis Barracks, Mill Hill. I expect to receive advice in the autumn of this year and announce my decision soon after.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Employment Zones

16. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the function is of the personal job account in the operation of employment zones. [127935]

Ms Jowell: The Personal Job Account is a radical and practical way of helping long-term unemployed people into work. Existing funds have been drawn together to make up the Personal Job Account, namely funds for Employment Service Support, training and benefits payments. There is no upper or lower limit to the amount allocated; it is dependent upon the needs of that participant and their most effective route back into work.

Nursery Education

17. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what further steps his Department proposes to take to extend the provision of nursery education. [127936]

Ms Hodge: Since September 1998, all four-year-olds have had access to a free nursery education place. By April 2002, we shall have created 190,000 new free places for three-year-olds. 66 per cent. will then have access to such a place.

In line with our Manifesto pledge, we shall announce in this Parliament the date by which we shall achieve universal provision for three-year-olds.

Older People

18. Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the impact of the Government's employment policies for older people. [127937]

Ms Jowell: We are making progress in this area. The Code of Practice on Age Diversity in Employment, launched last year, has been widely welcomed. In the first two months since the national launch of New Deal 50 Plus, over 4,000 older people have returned to work and drawn on the Employment Credit. We are evaluating the impact of these initiatives. Overall, employment levels of older people rose by 2.4 per cent. and unemployment fell by 13.3 per cent. since last year.

Aptitude Testing

19. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his policy on the testing of aptitude in schools. [127938]

Jacqui Smith: Our policy is set out in the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 which allows schools with a specialism in designated subjects to give priority to up to 10 per cent. of pupils on the basis of aptitude for those subjects.

Small Schools

20. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the small school support fund. [127940]

Ms Hodge: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave today, Official Report, column 270W to my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham).

Numeracy

21. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what support his Department is continuing to give to schools for the teaching of numeracy skills. [127941]

Jacqui Smith: The National Numeracy Strategy began in primary schools last September, supported by a training programme for all schools. We are continuing to fund over 370 local numeracy consultants to provide a wide range of intensive support and training to those schools in most need. This year, 27,000 teachers will attend our highly successful five-day intensive training course.

Modern Apprenticeships

22. Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to raise standards in foundation and advanced modern apprenticeships. [127943]

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to raise standards in foundation and advanced modern apprenticeships. [128723]

Mr. Wicks: The Government are committed to an apprenticeship culture which meets the needs of the individual in a learning environment, offers greater opportunities for progression and secures higher standards. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched a consultation exercise on 27 June on implementing reforms to strengthen Modern Apprenticeships. The consultation document is available in the House Library.

Physical Education

23. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what provision he is making for the teaching of physical education in courses of initial teacher training. [127944]

Ms Estelle Morris: We recognise the need to ensure that initial teacher training (ITT) equips trainees with the confidence and skills they need to deliver a broad and balanced curriculum in all the foundation subjects, including PE. We are addressing issues in relation to PE and sport through our wider reforms to improve the quality and flexibility of ITT provision. The Teacher Training Agency is also addressing training in PE and sport as part of its review of the ITT Curriculum and Qualified Teacher Status Standards in DfEE Circular 4/98 "Requirements for Courses of Initial Teacher Training".

Regional Development Agencies

24. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the educational responsibilities of the regional development agencies. [127945]

Mr. Wills: The Government set up Regional Development Agencies to improve the economies of the English regions. They have a broad statutory responsibility to enhance the development and application of skills in their area. In addition to producing a Regional Economic Strategy, one of their key tasks is to develop with their partners a plan containing actions to improve the regional skills base.

Child Care Workers

26. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps have been taken to encourage the recruitment of child care workers. [127947]

Ms Hodge: The Government launched earlier this month a National Recruitment Campaign to help raise the status of the early years, childcare and playwork sector and recruit the new workers needed to staff expanding services. The campaign will help support the work of Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships (EYDCPs), which are implementing strategies for recruiting workers in their area. An extra £5 million has been made available to the EYDCPs this year to help.

Internet

27. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made in connecting schools to the internet over the last three years. [127948]

Mr. Wills: Excellent progress is being made under the National Grid for Learning programme in connecting schools to the Internet. The 1999 Survey of Information and Communications Technology in Schools indicated a significant increase in connectivity in primary schools from 3 per cent. in 1996 to 62 per cent. in March 1999 and in secondary schools from 42 per cent. to 93 per cent. over the same period.

Foundation Degrees

29. Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his plans for foundation degrees. [127950]

Mr. Wicks: Following the launch of the proposals for the Foundation Degree in February this year, we established a Foundation Degree Group, comprising all the key stakeholders and including significant employer representation. The work of the Group has informed the prospectus inviting bids from consortia to design and develop the prototype Foundation Degree programmes, which will be issued this month by the Higher Education Funding Council for England. We expect the prototype courses to be delivered from autumn 2001 with further expansion taking place gradually.

New Deal

30. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the proportion of people on the New Deal schemes who gain permanent employment on leaving. [127951]

Ms Jowell: Statistics are not collected using a category of "permanent" as this is not a term that adequately describes the realities of the modern labour market. By the end of March 2000, 57 per cent. of leavers to known destinations from the New Deal for Young People and 17 per cent. of leavers to known destinations from the New Deal for long term unemployed adults aged 25 or over, found sustained unsubsidised employment (i.e. a job that lasted for 13 weeks or more).

External Examiners

31. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress he has made on standardising the work of external examiners in the higher education sector. [127952]

Mr. Wicks: External examiners are a matter for the higher education sector itself and I have nothing further to add to the replies I gave on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 542W and 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 183W.

Class Sizes

32. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress he is making on reducing class sizes in primary schools. [127953]

Ms Estelle Morris: After rising for the previous 10 years, the size of the average class in primary schools has fallen from 27.7 in January 1998 to 27.1 in January 2000. Over the same period, the size of the average class in primary schools in the Sheffield, Hillsborough parliamentary constituency has fallen from 28.2 to 28.1.

We are well on course to deliver our pledge to limit infant classes to 30 pupils. We have since January 1998 already reduced the number of children in infant classes of over 30 pupils by 300,000. £620 million is available to support the pledge, and allocations so far to Sheffield LEA amount to some £2.8 million. This has helped to reduce the size of the average Key Stage 1 class in Sheffield, Hillsborough to 25.6. The figure in January 1998 was 27.2. The number of children in infant classes of 31 or more pupils in the constituency has fallen from 1,250 in January 1998, to 230 in January 2000.

Skills Training

33. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received on skills training for mothers returning to work. [127954]

Ms Jowell: The New Deal for Lone Parents currently provides skills training for lone parents on Income Support wishing to return to work. Help with training, normally up to NVQ level two, is available for up to 12 months, provided that the training is related to the local labour market and has been agreed with a New Deal for Lone Parents adviser. From time to time we receive representations about the nature and level of this training.

Learning and Skills Councils

34. Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action his Department is taking to ensure that learning and skills councils will deliver optimum assistance to small and medium-sized enterprises. [127955]

Mr. Wicks: The Learning and Skills Council (LSC) will establish priorities for developing the skills of the workforce and targeted strategies for engaging, influencing and meeting the needs of employers, including small and medium sized enterprises. Subject to the passage of the Learning and Skills Bill, the LSC will work very closely with the Small Business Service (SBS). In the vast majority of cases, the boundaries of the SBS franchises are coterminous with those of local LSCs to assist with joint working. The local Learning and Skills Councils will contract with the SBS franchises for the provision of LSC—funded workforce development services to small and medium sized enterprises, including advice on Investors in People, Modern Apprenticeships and management development. At national level we will expect the LSC National Council to invite the Chief Executive of the SBS to its meetings, and local LSC Councils will, likewise, be expected to invite a representative of the relevant SBS franchises as observers to their meetings.

Teachers (Performance-related Pay)

35. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of teachers have applied for the performance-related pay scheme. [127956]

Ms Estelle Morris: 197,000 teachers in England, which represents over three quarters of the numbers eligible, have applied to cross the performance threshold in the first year of operation.

Oxbridge Intake

36. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent research he has undertaken into the proportion of undergraduates at Oxford and Cambridge universities who come from schools in the maintained sector; and what conclusions he has reached. [127957]

Mr. Wicks: CVCP are currently undertaking research into higher education as a follow up to their "Elitism to Inclusion" report which was published in 1998. The Higher Education Funding Council for England are preparing a report entitled "Action on Access"—which will be available in the autumn. The most recent information on access is taken from data collected by the Universities and Colleges Admissions Services (UCAS) which gives information about previous educational establishment for students normally resident in the UK. These statistics published by the Higher Education Funding Council for England are shown in the following tables.

Note:

Information on previous educational establishment is only collected from students normally resident in the UK. HEFCE is now providing:

1. £20 million funding in respect of students recruited and supported from disadvantaged backgrounds which was enhanced by a further £4 million by the Secretary of State when he addressed the AUT on 10 May 2000.
2. £5 million for providing for students with disabilities.
3. Funding premiums for mature and part-time students within the funding model Special funding.
4. £5 million for a special funding programme focusing on developing regional partnerships to improve progression to HE of students from disadvantaged backgrounds, and promotion and dissemination of good practice.
5. £2 million from HEFCE to contribute to a £4 million joint fund with the FEFC to improve pathways from FE to HE for disadvantaged groups, through links between HEIs and the new Lifelong Learning Partnerships.
6. £2 million p.a. for Development funding to improve the quality of provision for disabled students.
7. £4 million for HEFCE to administer the Millennium Summer Schools programme under guidance of the DfEE.

Rapid Response Fund

37. Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the deployment of the Department's rapid response fund within the Yorkshire and Humberside region. [127958]

Mr. Wicks: Departmental officials approved in June the first Rapid Response Fund bid within the Yorkshire and the Humber Region. Up to £236,177 will support the 300 workers being made redundant from RHP Bearings, Ferrybridge, Wakefield. Officials also expect to receive a bid to support those being made redundant from Corus, Rotherham (formerly British Steel). There is also a strong possibility of a bid being received for British Aerospace, Brough, Humberside.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has made to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on the review of standard spending assessments for education. [127946]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend has regular discussions with the Deputy Prime Minister about these issues as part of the current review of local authority grant distribution. As you might expect, the future of education funding is an important part of the review, since education accounts for around 40 per cent. of local authority revenue expenditure. We expect to publish a Green Paper later this summer, which will set out a range of options for debate.

ICT Access

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress is being made in implementing the Government's policy on increasing access to ICT among families on low incomes. [126115]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 20 June 2000]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 29 June 2000, Official Report, column 575W.

New Deal for Schools

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the schools in Worcester constituency which have received funding through the New Deal for schools; and in each case for what purpose the money was allocated. [128880]

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128986]

Mr. Wills: The DfEE and the Employment Service do not operate an approved list of manufacturers for cars and vans.

The DfEE and the Employment Service do not lease vehicles. Cars and vans are bought from the manufacturer that offers the best value for money across a range of vehicle specifications. This is determined by competitive tender. The current contract was awarded to Vauxhall in 1999.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129047]

Mr. Wills: The Employment Service has entered into three Private Finance Initiative contracts since 1997. It has established private finance deals for the delivery of procedural guidance via networked personal computers, for the delivery of all IT and related services, and for pay and personnel records. These are listed in the following table:

£ million

PFI contract	Commencement date	Capital value
ESCOM	February 1997	4.0
IT Partnership	May 1998	116.0
HR Partnership	January 1999	5.8

The commencement date is the date of financial close.

None of these contracts has been subject to refinancing, although there is provision in the IT partnership contract for refinancing. There is no claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing of this project. If any refinancing were proposed, the parties would be required to negotiate suitable terms.

National Skills Task Force

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that the Government's response to the National Skills Task Force study on literacy, numeracy and skills levels will be co-ordinated across the United Kingdom between his Department and the devolved Administrations. [128583]

Mr. Wills: Education and Training are devolved matters for Administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. There are liaison arrangements in place to ensure co-ordination between my Department and these Administrations. These arrangements will apply to work in response to the National Skills Task Force as they do in other areas of policy.

City Academies

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his oral statement of 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 755, if pupils at schools which are to be designated as city academies will have an entitlement to attend the city academy if they so wish. [128592]

Ms Estelle Morris: We expect most pupils at schools replaced by city academies to have the option of transferring to the city academy. In some cases, the establishment of a city academy will be part of a re-organisation involving several schools and where this happens pupils may transfer to the city academy or to another local school. Parents may also choose to send their children to a school other than the city academy.

In all cases, the admission arrangements for each city academy will be agreed with the Secretary of State as a condition of the funding agreement and will be clear, fair and objective.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what arrangements are made for the provision of support, including (a) regular access to his Department's documentation, (b) access to funding for the National Grid for Learning and (c) funding for continuing professional development, for local education authority support services for children with special needs. [128324]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 4 July 2000]: At the moment, all local education authority (LEA) support services for children with special educational needs (SEN) receive "SPECTRUM" a monthly update of new DfEE publications from which support services can place orders for documentation. Each month all the publications DfEE has sent automatically to schools are posted on the EASEA website, where there is also a searchable archive of documents from past months. School and LEA staff can register with the service at www.easea.co.uk to receive a regular e-mail alert when new information fitting their personal profile of interest, is on-line. Work is in hand to automatically provide LEA support services for children with SEN with the monthly batch mailing to schools from September. Funding for the National Grid for Learning is made available to LEAs through the Standards Fund. A total of £205 million has been made available for 2000–01 of which £155 million has been provided specifically to allow LEAs to continue to equip schools in line with their ICT development plans. As such it is not available to LEA support services. Additionally, under the Standards Fund for 2000–01, £26 million is being provided to support in-service training in special educational needs. LEA support services are eligible for this funding.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many special education needs tribunal hearings took place in each of the last five years; and what proportion of them in each year resulted in a determination in favour of a material change in provision for the pupil in question. [128791]

Year	Decisions issued	Upheld	Dismissed
1994–95	242	150	92
1995–96	904	522	382
1996–97	981	556	425
1997–98	1,135	701	434
1998–99	1,220	921	299

Note:

'Decisions issued' is the terminology used in the Special Educational Needs Tribunal's Annual Reports where this information is published. It equates to hearings that have taken place.

Veterinary Schools

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the cost of fees and charges for students at veterinary schools. [129275]

Mr. Wicks: There is no special treatment in terms of fees and charges for students at university veterinary schools in England and Wales.

Post-16 Education

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the major changes set out in his second update of the transition plans for post-16 education and training. [129274]

Mr. Wicks: The latest version of the joint DfEE/DTI National Transition Plan was published in June 2000. The early part of the plan sets out the considerable progress made since the plan was last updated in November. The most significant changes are reflected in the plans for the Learning and Skills Council and the Inspectorates, where the plans now set out in much greater detail the steps that need to be taken over the next nine months.

Architects

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action he is taking to improve disability awareness in the professional training of architects. [129309]

Mr. Wicks: The design and content of higher education courses leading to professional qualifications in architectural studies is a matter for the professional bodies which accredit and the institutions which offer that training and education. The Royal Institute of British Architects is involved in a number of initiatives aimed at increasing knowledge of disability issues among their members. Architects also undertake Continuing Professional Development and disability awareness training which includes preparation for the full implementation of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in October 2004.

Common Clearance Systems

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the benefits of introducing common clearance systems for school applications. [127942]

Ms Estelle Morris: None. Under admissions legislation any parent can state a preference for any school. Local education authorities have a duty to ensure that a school place is provided if the parent wants one.

Universities

Paddy Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the universities which were established in England and Wales within the last five years with their dates of establishment; what plans he has to establish new universities over the next five years; and if he will make a statement. [128789]

Mr. Wicks: No universities have been established in the last five years. As far as the establishment of new universities is concerned, it is for the higher education funding councils to offer advice to the Government in the light of representations made locally.

Pupil Costs

Paddy Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the annual levels of full fees were at independent schools in England and Wales which participated in the former assisted places scheme in the last year of its operation; what the average per capita funding was of pupils in maintained schools in the same year; and if he will make a statement. [128790]

Ms Estelle Morris: The last year in which children could take up assisted places was academic year 1997–98. Existing assisted pupils will continue to hold their places until the end of their current phase of education. The average day tuition fee charged by schools in England for assisted pupils in 1997–98 was £4,598. The average cost to my Department of an assisted place in that year was £4,082 when parental contributions are taken into account. The unit cost of a maintained secondary place in England in 1997–98 was £2,359.

Figures for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

HEALTH

Influenza Immunisation

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 21 February 2000, Official Report, column 778W, on influenza immunisation for healthcare workers, when he expects the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation will publish their recommendations on influenza immunisation of healthcare workers for the coming winter; and if he will make a statement. [124206]

Yvette Cooper: The Department's guidelines on influenza immunisation for healthcare workers for the coming winter are set out in Health Services Circular 2000/016, which was issued on 23 May 2000. A copy of the circular can be found in the Library.

Meningitis C (Immunisation)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue new advice to practitioners who are immunising against Meningitis C to take account of possible adverse reactions. [126254]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 19 June 2000]: The Deputy Chief Medical Officer wrote to all practitioners immunising against Meningitis C on 13 June 2000, with further advice about possible adverse reactions; a copy is in the Library.

The safety of all new medicines, including vaccines, is continuously monitored by the Medicines Control Agency. Advice is sought from the independent expert advisory committees, the Committee on Safety of Medicines and Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation, when appropriate. Advice to prescribers is contained in the Summary of Product Characteristics and to patients in the Patient Information Leaflet. Product information is updated as necessary.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking in his evaluation of the Meningitis C immunisation programme to ensure that he receives an accurate assessment of the numbers of individuals who may be suffering an adverse reaction. [126255]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 19 June 2000]: In October 1999 a letter from the Chief Medical Officer advised doctors and pharmacists to report all suspected adverse reactions to the new meningococcal C vaccine to the Medicines Control Agency via the yellow card scheme. In December 1999, following the Committee on Safety of Medicines' advice, nurses were also invited to report suspected adverse reactions to this vaccine via the yellow card scheme. The Medicines Control Agency continuously monitors the safety of all medicines including Meningitis C vaccine. Various data sources are used including spontaneous reports of suspected reactions from health professionals, clinical trials, epidemiological studies and regular safety update reports from manufacturers. This post-licensing monitoring follows the detailed safety and efficacy trials of meningococcal C vaccine undertaken before the vaccine was licensed.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will produce a report on the immunisation programme against Meningitis C, including reported incidents of side effects. [126253]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 19 June 2000]: The Department intends to produce a report of the meningitis C campaign after the catch-up programme is complete. The report will cover all aspects, including adverse reactions. A report along these lines was produced after the last major immunisation campaign in the United Kingdom, the measles/rubella (MR) campaign of 1994, when about 8 million children in the UK aged five to 16 were immunised.

HIV-AIDS

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total financial allocation in respect of HIV/AIDS (a) is in the current financial year and (b) was in each of the previous three years, broken down into the amounts devoted to (i) treatment and care, (ii) prevention, (iii) AIDs support grants, (iv) Section 64 grants, (v) public education and (vi) research. [127014]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 20 June 2000]: The information requested is given in the table.

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01
Treatment and care	199.6	228.1	233.1	[1]184.2
HIV prevention	51.9	53.4	53.4	54.7

Public education	4.3	4.4	5.0	3.6
Research	15.4	16.2	[3]20.4	[2]—

[1] We have introduced a new funding formula for the treatment and care budget in 2000–01. The HIV/AIDs allocation was brought in line with actual spending as part of the introduction of residence based funding.

[2] We have not yet committed all Department of Health/National Health Service research and development expenditure for 2000–01, so figures for 2000–01 are not yet available.

[3] Estimate

Cancer Services

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for (a) breast cancer (b) cervical cancer and (c) cancer of the prostate, (i) the number of cases diagnosed, (ii) the number of recorded and (iii) the amount of Government money spent on research in the financial year 1999–2000. [128117]

Yvette Cooper: Registrations of newly diagnosed cases of breast, cervical and prostate cancer in 1993 in England and Wales are as follows:

	Number
Breast cancer	30,495
Cervical cancer	3,302
Prostate cancer	17,208

The estimated figures for Government spend in 1999–2000 on research supported through the Medical Research Council and the Department are as follows:

	£ million
Breast cancer	9.02
Cervical cancer	1.53
Prostate cancer	1.52

These figures do not include:

Department of Health/National Health Service support for research commissioned by the research councils and research charities taking place in the NHS (with the exception of the Royal Marsden Trust/Institute of Cancer Research). The Department spends £63 million a year of this support on cancer research. Management of budgets is devolved and details of spend at project level are not collected routinely by the Department.

Departmental and Medical Research Council expenditure on research projects relevant to all cancers, for example on the biological basis, causes, prevention, services, psychosocial issues and palliative care.

Government spend via the higher education funding councils to universities (from the Department for Education and Employment)

Government spend via research councils other than the MRC (from the Department of Trade and Industry).

Cobham Cottage Hospital

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will increase the level of resources for Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust in respect of services at Cobham Cottage Hospital. [128463]

Yvette Cooper: The distribution of resources among the units of a National Health Service Trust is not properly a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but is decided instead by the trust itself in conjunction with its commissioning health authorities on behalf of the residents of the area. It is for East Surrey health authority and Mid Surrey Primary Care Group in liaison with Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust to establish the correct level of funding for local services taking a range of health service priorities into account. Discussions around funding this year were concluded recently as part of the negotiations on the service and financial framework.

Dorset Health Authority

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional funds have been made available to NHS trusts in Dorset in the current financial year to deal with administration costs. [128640]

Ms Stuart: The Department does not allocate specific funds to meet National Health Service trusts' administration costs. These are met from within the general allocations to health authorities. Dorset Health Authority's allocation for 2000–01 is £487.3 million, a real terms increase of £25.5 million (5.66 per cent.).

We firmly believe that the NHS needs a sufficient number of good managers to run services efficiently and effectively. Good management is essential to ensure that money is spent prudently on the NHS in order to secure maximum improvements in healthcare. However, we are determined to target wasteful and inefficient practice so that more money is spent on improving health and healthcare services.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many surgical procedures he estimates the private health care sector will carry out for the Dorset Health Authority in 2000–01. [128632]

Ms Stuart: This information requested is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Major General Richard Keightley CB, Chairman of Dorset Health Authority, for information on this matter.

Source Informatics

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason he withdrew his Department's application to the House of Lords in its case against Source Informatics. [129017]

Ms Stuart: We have concluded that it would not be in the public interest to pursue this litigation further.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128989]

Ms Stuart: The Department and the agencies of the Department do not obtain cars or commercial vehicles from an approved list of manufacturers. The Department does not currently purchase vehicles but has a contract for the supply of lease cars. Drivers are free to lease the car of their choice, within the parameters laid down by the Department for the operation of the lease car scheme.

Patient Waiting Times

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people suffered from conditions that became inoperable in the time between diagnosis and treatment in each year since 1990. [128698]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Organ Donor Card Scheme

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the organ donor card scheme; and if he will make a statement; [128898]

(2) how many transplant operations were carried out last year where the donor was identified as a consequence of carrying a donor card. [128897]

Mr. Denham: This information requested is not available centrally.

Our current organ donation campaign, launched in 1998, is ongoing. It encourages people to join the National Health Service organ donor register, carry the donor card and, most importantly, discuss their wishes with their friends and family.

Cancer Facilities (Merseyside)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on investment in cancer facilities in Merseyside. [129222]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 5 July 2000]: Cancer services in Merseyside and Cheshire are being developed as a network of cancer units linked to the Oncology Centre at Clatterbridge Hospital on the Wirral. This is in line with the Calman-Hine report on cancer services and the emerging recommendations of the National Cancer Director, Professor Mike Richards.

Merseyside and Cheshire have received £3.5 million from the New Opportunities Fund to invest in cancer services. In addition to this, local health authorities have received identifiable shares of the £9 million national gynaecological cancer moneys and, within their general allocations, a pro-rata share of £30 million made available nationally to improve access to cancer services.

NHS Dentistry (Yeovil)

Paddy Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve access to NHS dentistry in the Yeovil constituency; and if he will make a statement. [128788]

Mr. Hutton: We have already made good progress towards improving access to dental services in Yeovil, Somerset. Investing in dentistry grants amounting to nearly £200,000 have been paid to dentists in the Somerset Health Authority area in return for promises of up to 17,000 new National Health Service registrations. The NHS Executive is also working with Somerset Health Authority and East Somerset NHS Trust on plans for a dental access centre. The centre would be based on a network of clinic sites, including one in Yeovil. Access centres provide a full range of NHS dental treatment, routine and urgent, to people who are not registered with a dentist.

The NHS Executive wrote on 16 May to all health authority chief executives and regional dental advisers asking them to tell us whether more needs to be done to improve NHS dentistry in their locality and inviting ideas for potential funding.

Further initiatives to improve access to services will form part of our plans for modernising NHS dentistry, which will be published this summer in conjunction with the National Plan for the New NHS.

NHS Funding (Bury and Rochdale)

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total increase in revenue and capital budgets to (a) Bury and Rochdale health authority and (b) Bury NHS Health Care Trust for each financial year since 1995–96. [128003]

Mr. Denham: Health authorities have existed in their current form only since 1 April 1996. Therefore the cash increase for Bury and Rochdale health authority since 1996–97 is as follows:

	£ million
1996–97	6.6
1997–98	6.7
1998–99	8.9
1999–2000	[1]16.4
2000–01	[2]23.7

[1] Allocations for 1999–2000 are not comparable with those for 1996–97 to 1998–99 which cover hospital and community health services only. 1999–2000 is the first year of unified allocations which cover hospital and community health services, prescribing and general practice infrastructure.

[2] Includes an element of the extra £660 million announced by the Secretary of State on 28 March 2000.

CABINET OFFICE

Children

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to develop cross-departmental child well-being indicators to help monitor child outcomes and set policy goals on child well-being. [128998]

Mr. Bayley: I have been asked to reply.

We have pledged to halve child poverty in 10 years and eradicate it over 20.

"Opportunity for All" sets out 13 cross-departmental indicators referring to children and young people that will monitor the success of these and other policy priorities. The indicators are outcome focused and capture a number of aspects of well-being: income, health, education, housing and fuel poverty. It also contains a range of policy milestones, which we will use to monitor our progress in tackling child poverty.

Janet Anderson: For the UK in the year 2000–01 the additional annual cost of extending free TV licences to

(a) 65–69 year olds is £200 million, and

(b) 70–74 year olds is £200 million.

Lottery Awards

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much Lottery money was spent on arts projects, and how many arts projects were funded in (a) 1997 and (b) 1999; since the commencement of the Lottery, how much money has been spend on arts projects; and how many arts projects have been funded in total. [128701]

Lord Levy

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what facilities have been made available to Lord Levy by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in the last 12 months. [128162]

Mr. Hain: I refer to the answer by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of 30 March 2000, Official Report, column 245W, and to my answers of 7 June 2000, Official Report, column 291W, and 30 March 2000, Official Report, columns 261–62W. Since those answers, Lord Levy has also stayed in the Ambassador's residence in Egypt.

Northern Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken on the Cuco report to the Council of Europe on Turkish settlers in Northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [128891]

Mr. Vaz: The UK is in regular contact with all those with an interest in the Cyprus settlement process. As recommended in the Cuco report, the UK continues to promote person-to-person contact on the island and to urge the parties involved in the UN process to co-operate with Kofi Annan in a constructive and flexible manner.

Step Change Project

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Ministers and officials have participated in the Step Change Project efforts, initiatives and visits; and if he will list those efforts, initiatives and visits. [128722]

Mr. Vaz: As part of the Government's Step Change initiative, all Departments have taken steps to increase contacts with EU member states and the applicants. It is impossible to quantify the precise number of initiatives and visits which have arisen from the process. Ministers and officials with an interest in EU business across all Departments have participated in the initiative.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those backbench hon. Members who have participated in the Step Change Project efforts, initiatives and visits. [128719]

Mr. Vaz: The Step Change initiative is designed to build on and extend Government-to-Government links. As such, it involves Ministers and officials in increasing contacts with EU member states and applicant countries. Activities arising from the Government's increased engagement with its partners may involve other participants, including MPs (from all parties).

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the cost to date of the Step Change Project; and if he will itemise those costs. [128720]

Mr. Vaz: It is not possible to quantify the costs arising solely from the Step Change initiative since it is an integral part of the Government's European policy, which builds on and extends existing contacts.

MINECOR

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the cost to date of MINECOR; and if he will itemise those costs. [128721]

Mr. Vaz: The monthly meetings of the Ministerial Group for European Co-ordination incur no additional costs.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many times Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 and 123 of the Ministerial Code; and on which occasions such advice was sought; [129168]

(2) on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code. [129155]

Mr. Robin Cook: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Armenia

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the export of demining equipment to Armenia. [129911]

Mr. Vaz: The Government have recently approved the export of demining equipment for operations in Armenia. These will be used by the HALO Trust during humanitarian landmine clearance operations. This licence was granted for humanitarian purposes. It also reflects the determination of the Government to eliminate the scourge of landmines.

The UK remains committed to the OSCE arms embargo against both Azerbaijan and Armenia, which the UK interprets as covering all goods and technology in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 (commonly known as the military list).

Visas (Istanbul)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the current waiting time is for a person applying in Istanbul for a visa to visit the UK for business purposes to be granted an initial interview. [129284]

Mr. Vaz: 91 per cent. of visit visa applications in Istanbul are processed without the applicant requiring a full interview and would look to process their application within 24 hours. The few visitors who require a full interview, including any applicants travelling for business purposes, currently have to wait 10 days.

Mr. Love: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many appeals were heard against reviews undertaken under section 2.4 of the Housing Act 1996 in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000, in each county court. [128907]

Mr. Lock: Statistics specifically on appeals against reviews undertaken under section 204 of the Housing Act 1996 are not collected and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128996]

Mr. Lock: I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer, covering the Government Car and Despatch Agency, given today in another place by my noble and learned Friend the Minister of State at the Cabinet Office to the noble Lord Hoyle. For the Lord Chancellor's Department and its agencies, HM Land Registry, the Public Record Office and the Northern Ireland Court Service the current manufacturers on approved lists for cars are: Citroen, Fiat, Ford, Honda, Land Rover, Peugeot, Rover and Vauxhall.

There are no approved lists of manufacturers for commercial vehicles.

Vehicles are purchased through Government contracts, which determine the choice that is available.

Vehicles are procured in line with the Government's policy to secure value for money for the taxpayer and the EC procurement rules.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129100]

Mr. Lock: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer given today, Official Report, column 292W, by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney). The number of New Dealers within my Department, its executive agencies and the Land Registry and Public Records Office represents 0.1 per cent. of total staff. This figure does not include those participants in the New Deal scheme who have joined the Court Service and Public Trust Office agencies or the Land Registry or Public Records Office through normal open recruitment schemes and have taken up unsubsidised places. Statistics on these members of staff are not currently held centrally; however, centralisation of these records is planned.

Mr. Brady: To ask the President of the Council how many amendments to Government Bills tabled during the present Parliament by (a) Opposition spokesmen, (b) Opposition backbench hon. Members and (c) Government backbench hon. Members which had been selected were not debated on the Floor of the House as a result of timetabling of the report Stage of Bills. [127857]

Mrs. Beckett: The information requested could be provided only for Sessions 1998–99 and 1999–2000 (to 30 June) and is included in the following table[1]. Information for session 1997–98 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

UK Delegations

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister if there are any changes in the composition of the United Kingdom delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the assembly of the Western European Union. [129909]

The Prime Minister: The hon. Member for Ruislip, Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) has been appointed as a representative in place of the late Michael Colvin.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Conviction Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with respect to the Criminal Conviction Certificates to be issued by the Criminal Records Bureau what plans he has (a) to issue advice to employers requesting access to such certificates of job applicants and (b) to extend the statutory code of practice which covers other certificates to the Criminal Conviction Certificate; what research he has undertaken on the impact of the certificate on recidivism; for what activities, other than employment and visa applications, the Criminal Conviction Certificate will be used; and if he will make a statement. [129187]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Guidance to employers and others on the use of Criminal Convictions Certificates (CCCs) is in course of preparation. We shall consult widely, including with representatives of employers' organisations, before issuing the guidance. We have not undertaken specific research on the impact of the certificate on recidivism. But the guidance will encourage employers to consider the relevance of information contained in certificates to the particular position being applied for. We shall be working closely with employers' organisations and other interests to ensure that employers are discouraged from rejecting applicants solely on the basis of their criminal records without careful consideration of all the relevant factors.

The Code of Practice prescribed by section 122 of the Police Act 1997 applies to the use of information provided to registered persons. As the registration arrangements apply only to the higher levels of certificate, the code will not apply to CCCs. We shall be using the code to ensure that Registered Bodies fully understand their obligations under the legislation, and to promote good practice in the handling, interpreting and disposal of information received from the Criminal Records Bureau in connection with Criminal Record Certificates and Enhanced Criminal Record Certificates. To the extent that similar guidance is needed in relation to CCCs, we shall include it in the guidance we shall be issuing to applicants, employers and other interested parties.

While the main reason for introducing CCCs is to improve the quality of employment decisions, anyone may apply for a certificate in relation to their own records, and use it as they wish.

Police (Out-of-court Settlements)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the out-of-court settlements agreed to by UK police forces since 1 January 1998 which included a requirement of (a) non-disclosure of the terms of the settlement and (b) non-publication of the circumstances surrounding actions complained of. [128742]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 5 July 2000, Official Report, columns 239–40W, I gave details of out-of-court settlements. Information is not recorded centrally on which out-of-court settlements were subject to a non-disclosure or non-publication requirement.

Prisoners (Mental Health)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has made to the report of the Prison Inspectorate team on the care of prisoners with mental health problems; and if he will make a statement. [129107]

Mr. Boateng: All prisons and the local health authorities in which they are situated have been asked, in line with the programme of reform set out in "The Future Organisation of Prison Healthcare" (March 1999), by March 2001 at the latest jointly to assess prisoners' health needs and identify appropriate services to meet them and effective means of delivery.

These should include inreach into prisons from community mental health teams as part of the broader development of mental health services as set out in the National Service Framework for Mental Health. Implementation of improvements through individual prison health plans is scheduled to begin from April 2001, although reforms are well underway in a number of prisons already.

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the recommendation of the Joint Prison Service and NHS Executive Working Group in its report, "Future Organisation of Prison Health Care" published in March 1999, with particular reference to progress made in securing the care of mentally ill prisoners in line with NHS mental health policy in respect of its arrangements for referral and admission of such prisoners to high and medium secure psychiatric services. [129004]

Mr. Boateng: All prisons and the local health authorities in which they are situated have been asked, in line with the programme of reform set out in "The Future Organisation of Prison Healthcare" (March 1999), by March 2001 at the latest jointly to assess prisoners' health needs and identify appropriate services to meet them and effective means of delivery.

These should include in reach into prisons from community mental health teams as part of the broader development of mental health services as set out in the National Service Framework for Mental Health. Implementation of improvements through individual prison health plans is scheduled to begin from April 2001, although reforms are well underway in a number of prisons already.

The Prison Service and the NHS are now actively monitoring the number of prisoners awaiting transfer to secure psychiatric hospitals and waiting times, referring particularly difficult cases to the newly established NHS Regional Specialist Commissioning Groups for review or transfer action, as appropriate.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many anti-social behaviour orders have been served in each police authority area in Wales; [128581]

(2) what advice he has given to local authorities in Wales on the use of anti-social behaviour orders. [128582]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As far as we are aware, no anti-social behaviour orders (ASBO's) have been granted in Wales.

In March 1999, the Home Office issued guidance on anti-social behaviour orders. In June 2000, this was supplemented by guidance on drawing up local ASBO protocols. Both documents have been sent to all local authorities in England and Wales. In addition to the guidance, my officials have spoken at three seminars on ASBO's, which were attended by representatives from local authorities in Wales: at Conwy in December last year, and at Liverpool and Bridgend in March and April this year respectively.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been issued for (a) juveniles, (b) adults and (c) in total (i) nationally, (ii) on Teesside and (iii) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128639]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Figures for the number of anti-social behaviour orders granted are being collected centrally with effect from 1 June. However, we understand that at least 80 such orders were issued in England and Wales between 1 April 1999 and 31 May this year, including one against an adult in the Cleveland police area. We understand that the order does not apply in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East. At lease 27 anti-social behaviour orders nationally have been issued against people under the age of 18.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been issued to date in each district of Greater Manchester. [128001]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Figures for the number of anti-social behaviour orders granted are being collected centrally with effect from 1 June. However, we understand that at least 80 such orders were issued in England and Wales between 1 April 1999 and 31 May this year, including at least seven in Greater Manchester. The figure is not broken down by district.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many speed camera fines were issued in each of the last 10 years; what was the income from speed camera fines in each of those years; and if he will make a statement. [128389]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The information currently available is for the years 1993–97 and concerns fixed penalties issued and prosecutions undertaken for speeding offences detected by automatic cameras. Details are published in the Home Office Statistical Bulletin, Motoring Offences, England and Wales 1997. A copy is available in the Library.

The precise income to the Treasury from the penalties imposed is not known, but the fixed penalty for speeding offences during the period was £40 and the average fine imposed by a court for a speeding offence in 1997 was £119.

The table shows average fines at magistrates' courts for certain motoring offices[1] and average fines revalued to 1987 prices[2] (shown in brackets).

England and Wales

CCTV Schemes

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many CCTV schemes have been funded by the Government in each of the last 10 years; and what is the planned expenditure in future years. [128386]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The available information is shown in the table:

	Funded schemes		Cumulative totals
Year	Number	Value £ million	Number	Value £ million
1994–95	106	5	106	5
1995–96	0	—	106	5
1996–97	259	17	365	22
1997–98	190	15	555	37
1998–99	32	1.5	587	38.5
1999–2000	342	59.6	929	98.5

Between 1994–95 and 1998–99, schemes were funded under a Home Office Closed Circuit Television (CCTV) Challenge Competition. From 1999–2000, schemes are funded under the Crime Reduction Programme CCTV initiative. Around £90 million remains to be allocated under this initiative, which runs to the end of December 2001.

Information prior to 1994–95 is not available. CCTV measures under the earlier Safer Cities and Single Regeneration Budget Programmes (pre 1994) are not separately identifiable.

Special Units (Prisons)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many alarm bells were rung in each calendar year from 1986 to date (a) in the Special Close Supervision Unit in C Wing Parkhurst Prison, (b) in the remainder of Parkhurst Prison and (c) on average in the remainder of the other Special CS Units, with particular reference to Lincoln, Hull, Woodhill and Durham. [128618]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested in relation to Parkhurst could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The information requested in relation to the special units at Lincoln or Hull is not available. In relation to Durham and Woodhill, the information requested is only available from 1998, when the Close Supervision Centre (CSC) system came into operation. Since 1998, there has been an annual average of four other occasions when the alarm bell has rung. At Woodhill, there has been an annual average of 12 occasions when the alarm bell has rung.

Young Offenders

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what health services are available to young people (a) sentenced and (b) remanded in custody; what specialist mental health services are available to repeat young offenders; and if he will make a statement. [128784]

Mr. Boateng: Young people held in prison custody, whether on remand or sentenced, have access to a full range of primary and specialist healthcare services through the institution's healthcare centre. Prison doctors will arrange for any necessary specialist treatment to be provided either within the institution or as an in or out patient at an outside hospital, as appropriate.

Young offenders needing in-patient treatment for mental disorder may be transferred to psychiatric hospitals. The care and treatment of inmates who do not need to be admitted to hospital is generally undertaken by prison healthcare staff under the supervision of visiting NHS specialists. Part of the substantial programme of reform to prison healthcare now underway is aimed at extending inreach from community mental health teams into prison to improve standards of care for such prisoners.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what academic and vocational education and training is available to young people serving custodial sentences; and if he will make a statement. [128630]

Mr. Boateng: Education in Prison Service establishments is provided by education contractors. For all prisoners it focuses on a core curriculum of basic educational skills (literacy and numeracy), life and social skills, information technology and generic preparation for work. Prisoners of compulsory school age as defined in section 8 of the Education Act 1996 must be provided with at least 15 hours a week of education or training, plus five hours of physical education. For juveniles, life and social skills must include citizenship, sex and relationships education, and preparation for work.

Education contractors are expected to support students taking General Certificate of Secondary Education examinations by liaising with their previous school.

Education for prisoners over school leaving age is entirely voluntary. Prisoners aged between 17 and 21 should be offered at least two hours a week of physical education.

There is a wide range of accredited vocational training available in Young Offender Institutions. Areas covered includes construction industry training; engineering; motor vehicle maintenance; industrial cleaning; catering; office skills; information technology; and agriculture and horticulture.

Life Tariffs

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have a whole life tariff. [129219]

Mr. Boateng: There are at present 23 people in custody in England and Wales with whole life tariffs.

Hilda Murrell

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress made to establish the identity of the DNA tested by the Forensic Science Service in connection with the Hilda Murrell murder case. [128864]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from West Mercia Constabulary that they are awaiting the outcome of investigations by the Forensic Science Service into the remaining forensic evidence.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women prisoners are held in prison establishments (a) over 25 miles, (b) over 50 miles and (c) over 100 miles from their committal Crown court. [129198]

Mr. Boateng: The following information is based on the distance that female prisoners are held from their committal court town. The Prison Service does not distinguish between prisoners who have been committed from Crown court or magistrates' court. The data were collected on 15 June 2000 and are set out in the table in the nearest format to that requested. There are in the region of 1,000 female prisoners held under 25 miles from their committal court town.

Distance from home area	Number of female prisoners[1]
Between 25 and 50 miles	800
Between 50 and 100 miles	900
Over 100 miles	600
Total over 25 miles	2,300

[1] Rounded to nearest hundred

Prison Facilities

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons have visiting areas with a supervised children's play area. [129200]

Mr. Boateng: We estimate that there are around 90 play areas in visiting areas of prison establishments. Not all of these are supervised at all times.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which prisons (a) have and (b) do not have prisoner representation on their anti-bullying committees. [129197]

Mr. Boateng: Prison Service Order number 1702 (PSO 1702) sets out the requirement for all prison establishments to have a local strategy to reduce bullying. It defines the elements that the strategy must contain and those that may be considered for inclusion.

The expected practice is that every establishment will have an anti-bullying committee. PSO 1702 suggests that committees may include prisoner representatives, but urges establishments to exercise caution to avoid these prisoners being viewed as informants. It also suggests there are alternative ways of enabling prisoners to put their views forward.

The statistics required are not held centrally and could not be obtained reliably in time to answer the question. A brief audit of copies of some local strategies held in Prison Service headquarters suggests that establishments have opted for the cautious approach and do not have prisoner representatives on their committee.

Incentives Scheme

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons, prisoners who maintain their innocence are ineligible for progression to the enhanced stage of the incentives and earned privileges scheme. [129201]

Mr. Boateng: Under the national framework for incentives and privileges the criteria for the earning and retention of privileges do not include acceptance of guilt by the prisoner but do include constructive participation in the sentence planning process.

Sentence planning may include the completion of an offending behaviour programme. If a prisoner then refuses to address his or her offending behaviour this will be of relevance in assessing his or her privilege level and may be sufficient to deny him or her enhanced status.

Mobile Police Units

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the use of mobile police units to help police rural areas. [128534]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 5 July 2000]: The Government welcome imaginative and innovative ways of working by the police, including the use where appropriate of mobile units. To enhance policing in rural areas we have recently announced the allocation of a specific £15 million from the Police Modernisation Fund. This will provide a significant boost to police capabilities and bring direct benefit to the countryside. How the best use is made of the resources available and how the police operate in particular local circumstances are matters for the local Chief Constable.

Burns Inquiry

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in respect of the implementation of the Burns report on banning hunting with hounds, (1) what estimate he has made of the number of jobs that will be lost (a) directly and (b) indirectly as a result of the ban; [129039]

(2) what estimate he has made of the (a) number of additional firearms licences that will be required to control foxes, (b) safety of lamping foxes at night with high-powered rifles and (c) total cost of compensation broken down by (i) value of animals to be destroyed, (ii) redundant property and (iii) fees and other expenses. [129127]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The consequences of a ban on hunting with dogs will be considered as the legislative options for a Hunting Bill are drawn up.

Fraud

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fraud cases were investigated in each police authority area in (a) 1979, (b) 1983, (c) 1987, (d) 1992 and (e) each year since 1995; what was the clear-up rate in each year; and what estimate he has made of the value of such fraud in each year since 1995. [129129]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Fraud offences comprise part of the offence group covering both fraud and forgery. The number of fraud and forgery offences recorded in the years requested in each police force, and the clear-up rate, are given in the tables.

The counting rules for recorded crime changed from 1 April 1998. The effect on the number of fraud and forgery offences recorded was substantial, resulting in an estimated increase of 61 per cent. due to counting rules changes in England and Wales as a whole.

The Economic Cost of Fraud, a report for the Home Office and the Serious Fraud Office, will be published by National Economic Research Associates (NERA) on Tuesday 11 July. The report will provide estimates of expenditure on investigations, court proceedings and preventative measures, and the amounts of money defrauded across all sectors of the economy, for the years 1997 and 1998.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of credit card fraud there have been in each year since 1995; what the clean up rate was in each year; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of his recent meeting with credit card systems and providers. [129128]

Mr. Charles Clarke: A separate recorded crime figure for cheque and credit card fraud has been collected since 1 April 1998. The number of offences in the year ending March 1999 was 141,948, with the clear-up rate for these offences being 31 per cent.

On 27 June, I chaired a constructive and positive meeting with cheque and credit card systems providers, retailers and law enforcement agencies. The discussion was wide-ranging: information-sharing, cross-border co-operation, the European and international dimension to fraud, the role of law enforcement agencies, hotspots, education and training were all given serious consideration.

It was agreed that, in addition to the work already being taken forward by the banking and retail industries on the development of new technologies, the Home Office would lead work on information sharing and the involvement of the relevant law enforcement agencies, with a particular remit to consider how to target and tackle hotspots. The group will reconvene in autumn to review progress.

Restorative Justice

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the use of restorative justice approaches for (a) young offenders and (b) adult offenders; and if he will make a statement. [128541]

Mr. Charles Clarke: For young offenders the final warning scheme, reparation order and action plan order under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, were implemented across England and Wales on 1 June 2000; and the referral order under the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 is being piloted in seven areas from summer 2000 ahead of national implementation. These measures reflect the restorative justice principles of responsibility, reparation and reintegration in tackling offending and requiring offenders to make amends for their actions. The Youth Justice Board for England and Wales is funding and evaluating a number of local schemes in support of these measures. For adult offenders, community service orders provide the opportunity for offenders to undertake work for the benefit of the community. In addition, a review of best practice, focused on restorative justice schemes for adult offenders, is being undertaken under the Government's crime reduction programme, on the basis of which further schemes may be funded and evaluated.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the change in recorded crime rates over the last 10 years (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in other European Union countries; and if he will make a statement. [128543]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information covering recorded crime in all the European Union member states (including the parts of the United Kingdom) for the period 1988 to 1998 was published by the Home Office in the Statistical Bulletin 04/00, "International comparisons of criminal justice statistics 1998", on 22 February 2000. A copy is in the Library.

Voice Tagging

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the use of voice tagging; what pilot projects are being undertaken; what plans he has to extend the use of voice tagging. [129293]

Mr. Boateng: There are currently two pilots using voice verification technology being undertaken in England and Wales; the first is a pilot using VoiceTrack technology (which is licensed to Group 4 in the United Kingdom) and after an initial six month pilot in the Kent Probation Service region, they have been extended to cover the North Wales area. The Youth Justice Board is also undertaking pilots using a voice verification system developed by Group 4 with Kent and Medway Youth Offending Teams. The Board is currently in discussions about extending the pilots but there are no firm plans at present to extend either of them. Both of these pilots will be evaluated by the Home Office Research, Development and Statistics Directorate. No decision about whether to extend the pilots will be made until after they have been evaluated.

Kosovan Humanitarian Evacuation Programme

Mr. Paul Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reimburse local authorities for their expenditure on the Kosovan Humanitarian Evacuation programme during the current financial year. [129759]

Mr. Straw: The arrangements for reimbursement are set out in Special Grant Report Number 68, which I have laid before Parliament today. The Report explains the areas of expenditure that will be eligible for the grant and invites local authorities to submit interim claims by 30 September. This will ensure the prompt repayment of the bulk of the expenditure incurred by local authorities during 2000–01.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Advertising

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much has been spent by his Department on advertising in each year since May 1997. [125689]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Department's financial year starts 1 April and the advertising spend from April to March for each financial year from 1994 is as follows:

Year	£
1994–95	8,988,000
1995–96	9,293,000
1996–97	7,219,000
1997–98	6,500,000
1998–99	6,000,000
1999–2000	12,000,000

Note:

Figures exclude VAT

The figures for 1994–95 to 1996–97 show the combined spends of the then Departments of Transport and of the Environment.

Expenditure in 1999–2000 includes £3 million for the campaign to encourage voting in the GLA election and £4.6 million for the "Are You Doing Your Bit" campaign.

Liquid Petroleum Gas

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to promote the use of liquid petroleum gas in cars. [128276]

Mr. Hill: The Government have introduced a number of measures to promote the wider use of liquefied petroleum gas (LPG) in recognition of the fuel's environmental benefits. The Energy Saving Trust's Powershift programme, which is funded by my Department, provides grants towards the additional cost of vehicles fuelled by LPG. Funding for this programme was increased to £10 million following the last Budget. LPG and other road gas fuels also benefit from a relatively low rate of fuel duty compared to petrol and diesel. From 1 March 2001, Vehicle Excise Duty for new cars will be graduated on the basis of CO_2 emissions. Under the new scheme, LPG cars will benefit both from a modest discount and from generally having lower CO_2 emissions than equivalent petrol cars. The Government are currently consulting on further tax discounts under the new company car tax regime, which comes into effect from 6 April 2002, for gas and electric cars.

Exchange Flags Building (Liverpool)

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress he has made in recovering the regeneration grant awarded to the Walton Group in respect of Exchange Flags Liverpool; and if he will make a statement. [128635]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Under section 175 of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993, the Secretary of State appointed the Urban Regeneration Agency ("English Partnerships") to act as his agent in respect of the agreement to pay a City Grant to the Walton Group for the refurbishment of the Exchange Flags building, Liverpool. In that capacity English Partnerships carried out a review of the project and are pressing for repayment of the grant.

Inquiries are in progress, and therefore it would be inappropriate for me to make any further statement at this time.

Homelessness

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to introduce common arrangements for monitoring homelessness throughout the UK; [128896]

(2) what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of current arrangements for monitoring homelessness in England. [128895]

Mr. Raynsford: Local housing authorities in England make quarterly and annual returns to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions of data concerning their activities under the homelessness legislation. They also provide annually an estimate of the number of people sleeping rough in their area on any one night in June. The extent of the rough sleeping problem in England is monitored through single-night street counts, co-ordinated by local authorities and carried out in partnership with the local voluntary sector and volunteers. We are satisfied that these arrangements provide an effective means of monitoring homelessness in England. The Government currently have no plans to introduce common arrangements for monitoring homelessness throughout the UK.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the arrangements for reviewing homelessness decisions made by local authorities under sections 202 and 203 of the Housing Act 1996; and if he will make a statement; [128905]

(2) how many reviews were undertaken by authorities of decisions taken under section 202 of the Housing Act 1996 in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 in each local authority area. [128906]

Mr. Raynsford: We will consider the effectiveness of the current arrangements for local housing authorities' review of homelessness decisions when we take forward the proposals for reform of the homelessness legislation set out in the Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all". Information about the number of reviews undertaken by local authorities is not held centrally.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to seek amendments to the provisions of Part VII of the Housing Act 1996 relating to intentional homelessness; and if he will make a statement. [128904]

Mr. Raynsford: The Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all", sets out the Governments proposals for introducing more choice for existing and prospective tenants of social housing and for strengthening the protection available to homeless people. The Paper suggests that it may be possible to modify the rules of intentional homelessness if these proposals were adopted. The Government will consider responses to the Green Paper before deciding whether to take this forward, and would wish to discuss any proposals with representatives of local government, Shelter and others before introducing amending legislation.

Planning (South-east)

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what proportion of the potential growth areas and long-term potential growth areas in the draft regional planning guidance for the south-east are at risk or likely to be at risk in the future from potential flooding; [129072]

(2) what area of land in the south-east planning area (a) consists of flood plains and (b) is liable to tidal or coastal flooding according to the Environment Agency's indicative maps; [129071]

(3) what proportion of brownfield land available for development in the south-east planning area is at risk or likely to be at risk in the future from flooding. [129070]

Mr. Raynsford: Information about areas at risk from fluvial and other tidal or coastal flooding is based on best estimates and information about recorded events. It is provided in the form of maps held by the Environment Agency regional offices and supplied to local authorities.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code; [129161]

(2) if he will list the occasions since May 1997 on which Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the permanent secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 or 123 of the Ministerial Code. [129181]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make improved timekeeping and extended boarding times on the Euston to Liverpool Lime Street line a condition for renewal of the West Coast main line franchise. [129601]

Mr. Hill: The present franchise for the West Coast main line is not due to be replaced until 9 March 2012. When replacing franchises, the Franchising Director will be seeking to improve services to passengers and improvements in performance. Boarding times at stations are an operational matter for Train Operating Companies and it is not envisaged that they will be the subject of specific franchise requirements.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about making the level of on-board service a condition of franchise renewal for the West Coast main line. [129600]

Mr. Hill: The Secretary of State has not received any representations about making the level of on-board service a condition of franchise renewal for the West Coast Main Line. The present franchise for the West Coast Main Line is not due to be replaced until 9 March 2012. This franchise, in common with all the other passenger rail franchises, does not contain any provisions stipulating which on-board services must be provided. It is not envisaged that there will be any such provisions in any of the replacement franchises.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will ensure that, where a new franchise is awarded by the Strategic Rail Authority, the performance standards in the new franchise agreement are applied during the unexpired period of the old franchise agreement; [129687]

(2) what powers the Strategic Rail Authority has to ensure a smooth and rapid transfer when it awards a new franchise to a company different from the one currently providing the service and the existing company decides to continue until its contract expires. [129705]

Mr. Hill: This would be a matter for negotiation between the Franchising Director and the existing and potential franchisees. In the event of failure to agree transfer arrangements in advance of expiry of the existing franchise, the existing franchisee would be obliged to continue to honour its contractual commitments.

Atomic Energy

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what changes he plans to make to the location of intermediate and high level nuclear waste by the United Kingdom Government in the returns to the International Atomic Energy Agency for 2000; and what requests for environmental sampling have been received by the Government from the Agency since 15 May 1997. [129135]

Mr. Meacher: I am not aware of any requests from the International Atomic Energy Agency for returns about the location of intermediate and high-level nuclear waste, or on environmental sampling.

New Trains

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the further exemption order for the fleet of new trains to be introduced into service by Anglia

Railways Ltd. and ScotRail Railways Ltd. in respect of provisions of the Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998. [130052]

Mr. Hill: We have received further applications from Anglia Railways Ltd. relating to their Class 170/2 trains and ScotRail Railways Ltd. relating to their Class 170/4 trains. These seek to revoke the original Orders and replace them with new Orders. These have been discussed with our statutory advisers the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

Exemption Orders relating to the exemption of the Class 170/2 and 170/4 trains have been laid in Parliament today. Copies are available from the Library.

Abandoned Vehicles

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department will commission research into possible links between abandoned vehicles, vandalism and other crime; and if he will make a statement. [128490]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

While we have no current plans for research into links between abandoned vehicles, vandalism and other forms of crime, we will consider this area when we next review the forward work programme. We are mindful that abandoned vehicles can be an indicator of problems affecting a neighbourhood, and the local Crime and Disorder Partnerships do take into account action to address such issues when devising the local strategy.

WALES

Council House Sales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary on the release of additional council house sales receipts; and if he will make a statement. [129501]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply I gave to him on 13 June 2000, Official Report, column 571W.

Lords Lieutenant

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money his Department has spent in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available on (a) Lords Lieutenant and (b) their deputies in Wales. [129680]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department holds information on Lords Lieutenant's expenditure for the financial years 1996–97 onwards. The total expenditure for each of these years is as follows:

	Expenditure
1996–97	20,277.19
1997–98	21,120.85
1998–99	18,500.45
1999–2000	[1]19,566.55
2000–01	[2]4,539.00

[1] This figure includes payments made by the Welsh Office to 30 June and by the Wales Office from 1 July.

[2] To date.

Information on expenditure prior to 1996 could only be obtained at a disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Adoption

Ms Buck: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement concerning his review of adoption of children from care. [130095]

The Prime Minister: I have today published a study from the Performance and Innovation Unit (PIU), which forms the first part of my review of adoption. Copies of the study have been placed in the Vote Office and the Libraries. I asked the PIU to provide an initial assessment of the main problem areas, identify options and make recommendations to the Government on the use of adoption for children in the care of local authorities. The report contains a range of options for promoting greater use of adoption, and for making it faster and more straightforward. To ensure that there is the fullest possible debate on this issue, the report is published for consultation. In the light of views expressed in consultation we will then publish a White Paper before the end of the year setting out the Government's new approach to adoption, and including proposals for new legislation, to be introduced next year.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Prime Minister (1) on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in the Cabinet Office have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code; [129149]

(2) how many times he has been consulted by Ministers under the procedures outlined in paragraph 109 of the Ministerial Code; on what occasions any such consultations took place; and if he will make a statement; [129182]

(3) what discussions he has had with the Deputy Prime Minister on Paragraph 109 of the Ministerial Code (a) with respect to his tenancy of a flat in Clapham and (b) other matters. [129236]

The Prime Minister: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption 2, Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Internet Broadcasts

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister how many weekly prime ministerial internet broadcasts he has given; on which dates each was available on the No. 10 website; how many hits each broadcast experienced during the week following its posting on the website; and for what reason he has discontinued his weekly internet broadcasts. [129223]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 July 2000]: There have been 14 broadcasts, all of which are still available on the website. They are:

30 June 2000—Economic Policy
19 May 2000—Sierra Leone
2 May 2000—Strategic Direction of Government
21 April 2000—Northern Ireland
14 April 2000—Russia
7 April 2000—New Deal for over-50s
31 March 2000—Health
24 March 2000—The Budget
17 March—Streamlining Public Services
10 March—Drugs
3 March—Mozambique
25 February—Health
18 February—Drugs
11 February—Education.

The broadcasts can be accessed in a number of different ways—either as a streamed file, a downloadable MP3 version or as a transcript. The streamed versions of the broadcasts have been requested nearly 37,000 times, an average of 254 requests per day, since the first one was posted on the site on 11 February. Downloads of the MP3 version and hits on the transcript page will be in addition to this figure, but the site statistics do not show how often these have been accessed. The site as a whole received over 37 million hits in the three months since it was re-launched on 11 February.

I will continue to regularly record broadcasts for the website. The latest broadcast, on economic policy, was published on the website on 30 June.

Lord Levy

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to increase the accountability to Parliament of Lord Levy. [129707]

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 5 July 2000, Official Report, column 218W.

Engagements

Mr. Gill: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 16 May 1998. [129738]

The Prime Minister: I was hosting the G8 Summit in Birmingham.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Former Civil Servants (Pensions)

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on outstanding pension commitments to former Rhodesian civil servants agreed at the time Zimbabwe became independent. [129136]

Mr. Foulkes: At Independence, the pension rights of both retired and serving public servants were preserved under the Zimbabwe Constitution, determined during the Lancaster House negotiations. The Government of Zimbabwe are responsible for the payment of pensions to former Rhodesian civil servants. That constitution guarantees the continued payment of pensions to former Zimbabwe public servants, wherever they reside. Occasionally, there have been delays in pension payments being made as a result of shortages in foreign exchange, but, these apart, the Government of Zimbabwe have consistently honoured their obligations. There is no provision in the Constitution to protect the value of externally paid pensions against the effects of fluctuating exchange rates.

EU Aid

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with European commissioners about the EU's delivery of aid to developing countries; and if she will make a statement. [129515]

Clare Short: I have frequent exchanges with Commissioners Nielson and Patten about EC aid to developing countries. It is in sore need of reform. We are working for full implementation of our detailed strategy (a copy of which is in the Library of the House) which requires the European Commission and other EU member states radically to improve the poverty focus and effectiveness of EC development assistance. There is a growing commitment to reform. The reduced number of Commissioners responsible for development, the improvements incorporated in the renegotiation of the Lomé convention and the recently published strategy for development are significant advances, but implementation of the promised reform remains to be achieved.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with her European counterparts regarding the provision of EU development aid to countries in conflict. [128712]

Clare Short: The general issue of the role of development assistance in countries in conflict has been discussed frequently, most recently at the informal meeting of European Community Development Ministers in Lisbon in January, which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State attended. Further discussion was also held during part of a seminar held in Paris, jointly hosted by the French and Portuguese Development Ministers, on 30 June. The position in a number of specific countries, notably Sierra Leone, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Ethiopia and Eritrea, was discussed at the meeting of the Development Council on 18 May.

All development programmes, including the European Community's, need to develop more effective methods for targeting development assistance to countries in conflict. The UK and other member states have urged the Commission to undertake work in this area. Provisions on the issue of peace-building and conflict prevention and resolution were included in the new EU-ACP Cotonou Agreement. The Commission are currently developing guidelines to help officials design programmes that address potential sources of conflict.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service Recruitment

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she will publish the Fifth Annual Civil Service Fast Stream Recruitment report. [129927]

Marjorie Mowlam: The annual Civil Service Fast Stream Report was placed in the Libraries of the House earlier today. It covers the year from 1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000, and reports the results of Fast Stream competitions completed during that period and action undertaken for future competitions.

The report shows that there has been progress in broadening the diversity of Fast Stream recruits. In particular, for the first time the Civil Service has reached parity in the numbers of successful men and women applicants to open Fast Stream schemes. The standard of entry to the Fast Stream Development Programme has remained consistently high. In line with the experience of other major employers, the Civil Service did not fill all its Fast Stream vacancies in 1999, with specialist areas a particular source of concern.

Constituency Statistics

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) of 28 June 2000, Official Report, column 564W, how many requests her Department has received from hon. Members for statistics compiled at constituency level since 1 May 1997; if she will state in each case (a) the name and party allegiance of the hon. Member, (b) the date the request was received, (c) the date the information was provided and (d) the subject matter; and what has been the total cost since 1 May 1997 of meeting such requests. [129723]

Mr. Stringer: The information is not held centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

TREASURY

Stamp Duty

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring forward the stamp duty relief for transfers of local authority housing stock, which was announced in the Budget, to include all such transfers made since the announcement. [130094]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I am pleased to say that measures will be brought forward in Report Stage of the Finance Bill to ensure that transfers of housing from local authorities to registered social landlords taking place after 21 March will benefit from the new exemption. This will apply whether or not the social landlords concerned are constituted as charities.

Transfers under the large-scale voluntary transfer programme offer benefits for tenants and the programme reflects the Government's commitment to generate private finance to repair and improve the condition of social housing. Bringing forward the extension of the Stamp Duty relief to the earliest possible date following the Budget announcement will help local authorities making transfers between 22 March and Royal Assent to the Finance Bill.

Local authorities who have made relevant transfers upon which Stamp Duty has been paid will be able to make claims to the Stamp Office for repayments as soon as Finance Act 2000 becomes law.

Spectrum Auction

Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if the receipts from the third generation mobile spectrum auction which have already been received are to be treated under resource accounting rules as capital receipts; [128068]

(2) if the future receipts from the third generation mobile spectrum auction are to be treated as capital receipts; [128069]

(3) if the future receipts from the third generation mobile spectrum auction are to be treated under resource accounting rules as an accrual at the time the obligation was secured. [128070]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 28 June 2000]: The Office for National Statistics (ONS) has provisionally decided to classify the receipts from the auction of licences for the third generation mobile spectrum as current receipts (rents) in the UK national accounts, and to accrue the receipts over the period of the licences, according to the treatment it sees as best fitting the principles of the European System of Accounts 1995 (ESA95). ONS are consulting Eurostat about the classification. The treatment of the proceeds under resource accounting will require an accruals, rather than a cash, basis of accounting for the receipts.

Fuel Duty

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with his European partners with regard to revenue loss as a result of differential road fuel duty rates between member states; and if he will make a statement. [128181]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 5 July 2000]: EU member states are free to set excise duty levels in accordance with an agreed structure and current UK policy on the taxation of road fuel is fully in accordance with the provisions of the relevant EC Directives.

Euro

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which foreign target group in the UK is to receive material as part of the Euro 2002 Information Campaign of the European Central Bank. [128136]

Miss Melanie Johnson: We understand from the European Central Bank that there are no plans at present to distribute Euro 2002 information campaign material within the UK.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) on how many occasions since May 1997

Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code; [129152]

(2) how many times Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 and 123 of the Ministerial Code; and on which occasions such advice was sought. [129173]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information".

Disabled Drivers

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce a tax allowance on petrol for disabled drivers who are dependent on their cars. [128873]

Dawn Primarolo: The Chancellor keeps all tax issues under review as part of the Budget process. Drivers who receive the higher rate mobility component of Disability Living Allowance can already get help leasing or buying a car from the Motability scheme. They also qualify for the Blue Badge scheme (formerly Orange Badge scheme) of parking concessions and are exempt from Vehicle Excise Duty.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

SMEs

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance his Department gives to help develop small and medium-sized business organisations in the Greater London area. [127866]

Ms Hewitt: The nine Business Links in London receive financial support from the DTI's Business Link core services budget to deliver a range of help to small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) across the Greater London area.

From next April, one New Business Link operation covering the whole of London will take over as the primary source of help to SMEs. My Department will be providing substantial funding for the new business support arrangements.

Lesotho

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 22 June 2000, Official Report, column 236W, on Lesotho, if he will list the payments by Her Majesty's Government in respect of loans underwritten through the ECGD to the companies listed. [128569]

Mr. Caborn: No claims payments have been made direct to the companies concerned as they are not the beneficiaries of the ECGD cover. ECGD's guarantee is given to the lending bank for any defaults arising under any loan agreement.

Only one of the loans listed has so far given rise to claims payments, namely the loan made by HSBC to finance the Cairo Waste Water project in Egypt. On a closer examination of records, it is regretted that the value of this loan was incorrectly shown as £32.0 million in the answer provided to my hon Friend's earlier question on 22 June 2000, Official Report, column 236W. The total value of this loan was, in fact, £142.8 million. Claims including interest of the value of £190.8 million have been paid to the lending bank following a series of defaults under this loan of which some £43 million has been recovered to date. The balance of the debt has been rescheduled under debt rescheduling arrangements with Egypt.

Post Office Counters

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will allow Post Office Counters to contract with parcel companies in the private sector. [129672]

Mr. Byers: This is a commercial matter for the Post Office.

Royal Mail

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the acquisitions made by Royal Mail in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000. [129674]

Mr. Byers: None.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128981]

Dr. Howells: The Department does not purchase vehicles. The primary purpose of the Department's policy on leased vehicles is to achieve value for money on official travel. There is no restriction on the make of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles that can be obtained through the Department's leasing arrangements.

Regional Aid Map

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the EU to approve a regional aid map for the United Kingdom. [129218]

Mr. Byers: In the near future.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129479]

Dr. Howells: The Department has not previously issued annual reminders to staff paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions but this policy is currently under review.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Police Authority

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland was appointed; what the term of his appointment is; how many official visits he made outside Northern Ireland in each year since his appointment; what expenses were reimbursed to him for (a) entertainment, (b) subsistence, (c) travel and (d) car mileage or the use of a vehicle; and what vehicle allowance was paid to him in each year since his appointment. [128360]

Mr. Ingram: The current Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland was appointed on 1 July 1995 on a 4-year contract. This contract was renewed on 1 July 1999 for a further 4 years.

The first table shows the number of official journeys made each year by the Secretary and Chief executive outside Northern Ireland since his appointment in July 1995 until 30 June 2000. The second table details expenses reimbursed to the Secretary over each financial year.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland is authorised to use fuel charge cards issued for the use of the (a) RUC and (b) Police Authority. [128362]

Mr. Ingram: Use of fuel charge cards issued to the Royal Ulster Constabulary is at the discretion of the RUC's Chief Engineer and the Head of Transport. The Police Authority is not in possession of fuel charge cards.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the terms of employment of the Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland provide for (a) use of official vehicles (i) on and (ii) off duty, or (b) reimbursement for mileage or the use of a vehicle and (c) a vehicle allowance. [128361]

Mr. Ingram: The Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland has access to official vehicles when on duty. The Secretary and Chief Executive is entitled to claim mileage allowance for the use of a private vehicle on official business in accordance with the Northern Ireland Civil Service Code.

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many firearms certificates have been withdrawn in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years and the current year; and how many (a) shotguns, (b) .22 rifles, (c) fullbore rifles and (d) handguns were affected by the withdrawal of certificates. [128613]

Mr. Ingram: The Chief Constable has advised that the information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Readily available information is set out in the table.

Armed Robberies

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each week in each RUC sub division in Northern Ireland since 1 January the number of armed robberies which have taken place and his estimate of the total sums of money and the value of goods stolen. [128615]

Mr. Ingram: The table shows the number of armed robberies recorded in Northern Ireland each month during the period 1 January to 28 June 2000 together with the estimated value of goods or money stolen. Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the circumstances of the road traffic accident involving an RUC vehicle driven by the Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland; what arrangements were made for the repair of the vehicle; and if he will make a statement. [129215]

Mr. Ingram: No official report has been received of any RUC vehicle being used by the Secretary and Chief Executive of the Police Authority being involved in a road traffic accident.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many of the written parliamentary questions tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April have not received substantive answers, excluding those not answered for reasons of (a) disproportionate cost, (b) information not available, not held centrally, or not held in the form requested and (c) commercial or other confidentiality. [127677]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 26 June 2000]: I assume the right hon. Member is referring to parliamentary questions where Ministers indicate in their response that they will write to hon. Members. If so, there have been 44 such cases out of a total of 1,044 parliamentary questions answered by my Department in the period in question. In 13 of these cases, I undertook to write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Millennium Commission.

National Lottery

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money is currently held in the National Lottery distribution fund which is not committed to projects. [128348]

Kate Hoey: As at March 2000, just under £200 million of the money held in the National Lottery Distribution Fund was not committed to specific projects. Nearly three-quarters of uncommitted funds are for the New Opportunities Fund (NOF), but NOF anticipate that all its funds will be committed during the course of this financial year.

Free Television Licences

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many households have been sent an application form concerning the availability, to people aged 75 and over, of free television licences; and at what total cost to the public purse; [128817]

(2) what has been the cost to the public purse of (a) printing expenses and (b) postage, of sending out communications publicising the availability of free television licences for people aged 75 and over. [128816]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The BBC is responsible for administering this scheme and has advised that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost and by diverting resources which would otherwise be devoted to the successful implementation of the scheme.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the administrative cost is, including postage, of informing people aged over 75 years about their entitlement to concessionary television licences; and if he will make a statement. [129035]

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households have been sent letters regarding the concessionary TV licence scheme for people aged over 75 years; how much the total cost was of printing and posting the letters; and how many replies have been received. [128531]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The BBC is responsible for administering this scheme and has advised that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost and by diverting resources which would otherwise be devoted to the successful implementation of the scheme.

Junior Sport

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support and assistance he will give to local cricket clubs in promoting junior cricket. [128832]

Kate Hoey: Junior cricket is eligible for funding from Sportsmatch, the Government's sports sponsorship incentive scheme. Since its inception in 1992, Sportsmatch has made 336 awards worth a total of over £2.08 million to grass roots and junior cricket applications in England, attracting a similar amount in commercial sponsorship.

Funding is also available to cricket through the Lottery Sports fund which has made 523 awards to cricket projects, worth a total of over £60 million, towards total project costs of over £106 million. One of the priorities of the Lottery Sports Fund is that projects should attempt to target young people.

Cricket is a sport selected by Sport England for a five year sports development programme aimed at young people. The programme is England-wide, delivered at local level and involves local clubs, local authorities, education services, schools and the England and Wales Cricket Board (EWCB) all working in partnership.

The England and Wales Cricket Board spends approximately 11 per cent. of the £26 million per annum it receives from broadcasting revenue for the development of cricket.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support and assistance he gives to local tennis clubs in order to promote junior tennis. [128834]

Kate Hoey: Junior tennis is eligible for funding from Sportsmatch, the Government's sports sponsorship incentive scheme. Since its inception in 1992 Sportsmatch has made 194 awards worth a total of over £1.15 million to grass roots and junior tennis applications in England, attracting a similar amount in commercial sponsorship.

Funding is also available to tennis through the Lottery Sports fund which has made 473 awards to tennis projects, worth a total of over £54 million, towards total project costs of over £92 million. One of the priorities of the Lottery Sports fund is that projects should attempt to target young people.

Tennis is also one of the nine sports selected by Sport England for a five-year sports development programme aimed at young people. The programme is England-wide, delivered at local level and involves local clubs, local authorities, education services, schools and the Lawn Tennis Association (LTA) working in partnership.

King Edward VII Convalescent Home

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the Edward VII convalescent home at Osborne will accept further patients after 31 October. [129233]

Mr. Alan Howarth: No. The King Edward VII convalescent home is due to close on 31 October 2000.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps are taken to publicise the widening of eligibility for admission to Edward VII convalescent home at Osborne to include non-commissioned ranks of the armed services under the Osborne Estate Order 1998. [129234]

Mr. Alan Howarth: No steps are currently being taken to publicise the widening of eligibility for admission because the convalescent home is due to close on 31 October 2000. Following the granting of the Osborne Estate Order 1998, the Civil Service Benevolent Fund, who have been managing the convalescent home on behalf of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, advertised the widening of eligibility to use the facilities at the home in a variety of publications. Additionally, they brought it to the attention of the Chief Welfare Officers of the armed forces and a number of Government Departments.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many of the convalescents at Edward VII convalescent home at Osborne were from (a) commissioned and (b) other ranks of the armed services in (i) 1998 and (ii) 1999. [129235]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information for the years requested is as follows:

London Health Expenditure

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure per head of population in each health authority area in London for each year from 1996–97 to 2000–01. [127010]

Mr. Denham: Expenditure per weighted head of population for 1996–97 to 1998–99 is shown for each health authority area in London in the table.

These figures are not comparable between years or between health authorities as a result of changes in accounting practice and other technical accounting differences.

Expenditure by health authority area for later years is not available.

Note:

1. Expenditure is taken from HA Annual Accounts which are prepared on a resource basis and therefore differ from cash allocations in each year. (These are not the total amounts spent on healthcare. General Dental Services expenditure is separately accounted for and cannot be analysed by health authority over the three years). Also, since 1997–98 drugs expenditure has been mainly accounted for by the Prescription Pricing Authority. For consistency, figures have been reduced by the amount of non-cash limited prescribing expenditure accounted for by the health authority in each year.

2. However, there are a number of other reasons why the figures shown cannot be directly compared between years and between health authorities. These will include:

(a) Non medical education and training expenditure (NMET): some authorities account for NMET on behalf of local consortia, and those HAs will have different levels of NMET funding over different years;

(b) The levels of non-recurrent allocations (such as strategic assistance) will have varied between years and authorities;

(c) The differential impact of cash limited prescribing, eg as a result of differential levels of general practitioner fundholding;

(d) Services (eg HIV/AIDS) that are accounted for on a district of treatment basis will distort the expenditure per capita figures which are based on resident populations;

(e) Changes in accounting policy over the years;

(f) There could also be different interpretations by auditors which may affect direct comparison; and

(g) Changes in the weighted population figures between years.

3. The expenditure per weighted head figures in the answer do not therefore reflect real changes in the resources available for spend on healthcare locally over the period or provide robust comparisons between HAs.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the written parliamentary questions tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April have not received substantive answers, excluding those not answered (a) citing disproportionate cost, (b) stating that the information is not available, not held centrally, or not held in the form requested and (c) citing commercial or other confidentiality. [128020]

Ms Stuart: Two written questions remain substantively unanswered for the period specified.

Guillain-Barre Syndrome

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the mortality rate for patients suffering from Guillain-Barre Syndrome admitted to National Health Service hospitals for treatment in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000; [122625]

(2) what proportion of patients suffering from Guillain-Barre Syndrome and being treated in National Health Service hospitals were admitted to intensive care units in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000; [122629]

(3) what assessment he has made of the adequacy of data collection in relation to the number of patients suffering from Guillain-Barre Syndrome who have been treated in National Health Service hospitals. [122630]

Mr. Denham: The table shows a mortality rate for patients with a primary diagnosis of Guillain-Barre Syndrome in National Health Service hospitals in England for the financial years 1996–97 to 1998–99. Data for 1999–2000 are not yet available. Information on admissions to intensive care units is not available.

In terms of data adequacy the Hospital Episode Statistics (HES) are compiled from data sent by over 300 NHS trusts in England. Every effort is made to minimise inaccuracies.

The figures for 1998–99 and 1997–98 are provisional, no adjustment have as yet been made for shortfalls in data (i.e. the data are ungrossed) but for 1996–97 figures are grossed for both coverage and unknown/invalid clinical data.

Hospital Episode Statistics, Department of Health

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to encourage clinical governance subcommittees of National Health Service trusts to raise awareness of Guillain-Barre Syndrome; [122626]

(2) what plans he has to encourage clinical governance groups within primary care groups to raise awareness of Guillain-Barre Syndrome, particularly among general practitioners. [122627]

Mr. Denham: Clinical governance sub-committees have been put in place to co-ordinate National Health Service organisations' clinical governance activity. They are accountable for ensuring that clinical services across the whole organisation are effectively managed and that the quality of all clinical services improves. There are no plans at this stage to encourage committees to focus on any particular condition.

Eye Tests

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on the frequency with which eye tests should be taken. [128726]

Mr. Denham: This is a matter of clinical judgment for optometrists and ophthalmic medical practitioners. In order to ensure probity, we have proposed that a requirement be introduced for a practitioner to give a reason when claiming for a National Health Service sight test at an interval of less than two years since the previous test. Officials will be meeting with representatives of the professions to discuss this proposal on 12 July.

Epilepsy

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to implement the Clinical Standards Advisory Group's report on epilepsy. [128807]

Mr. Hutton: Departmental officials have recently met with representatives from the Joint Epilepsy Council (JEC) to discuss the findings of the Clinical Standards Advisory Group report and take stock of recent service developments and medical research. As a result of this meeting, officials will be working with the JEC to establish the best way forward.

New Hospitals

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many new hospitals were opened in each year since 1979. [129036]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Eighty-seven major hospital developments (over £25 million at current prices) have taken place and become operational since 1980. Details are set out in the table. The low figure for 1999 is a consequence of the small number of major hospital developments which started during 1996 and 1997. This was due to all major developments having to test for private funding during this time.

Since 1 May 1997, 38 major hospital developments worth over £3.1 billion have been given the go ahead. The introduction of the private finance initiative into the National Health Service capital building programme will result in a dramatic increase in the number of major hospital developments in future years. The first of these developments, the new hospital at Carlisle, was officially opened on 16 June 2000.

Information collection began in 1980 and we therefore do not hold information for 1979.

NHS Pay Review Body

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when biomedical scientists will form part of the NHS Pay Review Body; and if he will make a statement. [129237]

Mr. Denham: Our proposals for modernising National Health Service pay, which were published in February 1999 in "Agenda for Change", include bringing some groups of highly qualified staff within the scope of the Nursing Pay Review Body (NRPB), without changing its fundamentally professional character.

Initial discussions with NHS trade unions on pay modernisation resulted in a Joint Framework of Principles and Agreed Statement on the Way Forward, which was published on 8 October 1999. This sets out the following starting point for more detailed discussions with trade unions on the qualifying criteria for groups to come within the scope of the NRPB:

> Professions with a minimum entry requirement of three years educational study (or equivalent) to diploma level or higher, in a health specific area (other than medicine or dentistry) and which are state registered and have a substantial majority of members employed in health care.
> Exceptions might be agreed for staff groups which met the majority but not all of these conditions.
> Staff groups which support professions added to the NRPB remit, and who have a direct connection with the transferred groups similar to that between nursing auxiliaries and registered nurses would also need to be considered for transfer.

The widening of the membership of the Review Body is conditional upon an agreement being reached in the current talks about pay modernisation.

Fluoridation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the cost was of the report his Department commissioned the National Health Service Centre for Reviews and Dissemination at the University of York to prepare, into the safety and efficacy of fluoride in drinking water; if the work being undertaken is (a) new research or (b) a review of existing research; and if animal testing forms a part of this research; [129659]

(2) when he expects (a) to receive and (b) to publish the report which his Department commissioned the National

Health Service Centre for Reviews and Dissemination at the University of York to prepare, into the safety and efficacy of fluoride in drinking water; and if he will make a statement on his policy regarding the fluoridation of drinking water. [129684]

Yvette Cooper: The contract for the review was for £79,648. The review has been considering existing research rather than undertaking new research. To structure its approach the centre has concentrated on primary research on the effect of fluoride on populations which have been exposed to fluoridated water. The report is due to reach the Department later this month and should be published shortly afterwards. We will take decisions on the way forward after having considered the report.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards the British Fluoridation Society; and what contributions were made to the Society by the Government in each year since 1975–76. [129658]

Yvette Cooper: The main role the Department funds the British Fluoridation Society to fulfil, is to collect and maintain evidence on the effects of fluoridation. Our support for the British Fluoridation Society since 1975–76 has been:

Year	Amount
1975–76	4,500
1976–77	5,500

Single European Currency

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what budget he has set for expenditure under the national changeover plan in anticipation of joining the single European currency; and how much has been spent to date; [129739]

(2) by whom the decision was taken to incur expenditure in NHS hospitals in anticipation of joining the single European currency; and on what date. [129740]

Ms Stuart: In his statement to the House in October 1997, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government would > begin to prepare ourselves so that, should we meet the economic tests, we can make a decision to join a successful single currency early in the next Parliament.

The National Health Service is carrying out a measure of pre-planning for the possible introduction of the euro as set out in the second Outline National Changeover Plan published on 9 March 2000. The costs of this ongoing exercise are contained within normal running costs and cannot be separately identified.

Children's Commissioner

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will appoint a commissioner for children; and if he will make a statement. [129441]

Mr. Hutton: We have no plans to appoint a children's commission for England, although as our response to the Waterhouse Report made clear, we are keeping this matter under review. In the meantime, we have already embarked on a major programme to improve children's services and strengthen the safeguards protecting children from abuse.

We consider that this ambitious legislative and policy programme which includes the Care Standards Bill, the Children (Leaving Care) Bill, the Protection of Children Act 1978, the £375 million Quality Protects programme and the new Children's Rights Director post within the National Care Standards Commission together amount to a step-change in the provision of safeguards for children.

Overdoses (Deaths)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died from overdoses of prescribed medication in the Northumberland health authority area in each of the last three years. [129011]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is not held centrally.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129103]

Ms Stuart: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

The number of New Dealers within the Department and its executive agencies as at 1 April 2000 represents 0.52 per cent. of total staff.

Cochlear Implants (Essex)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cochlear implants for children were undertaken in each of the last five years in (a) North Essex health authority and (b) Essex Rivers Healthcare Trust; and how many children were waiting for more than a year in each case. [125433]

Mr. Hutton: There were no cochlear implants for children treated in North Essex health authority or Essex Rivers Healthcare National Health Service Trust in the last five years. However, there have been seven cochlear implant operations for children resident in the North Essex health authority in the last five years carried out outside the area. Of these, no children waited over three months.

DEFENCE

Armoured Vehicles

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the Army's current inventory is of (a) Challenger I, (b) Challenger II and (c) Warrior vehicles; and how many are operationally available. [129132]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 6 July 2000]: The current inventories for these vehicles are (a) 414, (b) 250 and (c) 786. Information on availability is collated separately in respect of vehicles held by front-line Units and vehicles deployed on operations. The former category excludes certain training vehicles, vehicles in deep repair, vehicles used as reference vehicles and vehicles in storage (e.g. some 300 tanks being stored at Ashchurch as part of the withdrawal from service programme).

Vehicles held by front-line units on operations (measured against an immediate availability target only)

Vehicle type	Percentage operationally available
Warrior	96
Challenger I	No CRIs deployed on operations
Challenger II	87

Vehicles held by front line units (other than on operations)

Vehicle type	Percentage which could be fully operational within 24 hours
Warrior	88
Challenger I	98
Challenger II	89

Submarines

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the operational availability is of each of the Royal Navy's Fleet submarines. [129670]

Mr. Hoon: Of the Royal Navy's 12 Fleet (hunter-killer) submarines, six are operationally available and six are in refit, extended maintenance or repair.

Operational or engaged in preparing for service, trials or training

Sovereign
Superb
Splendid Trafalgar
Turbulent Triumph

Undergoing refit maintenance or repair

Sceptre
Spartan Talent
Tireless
Torbay
Trenchant.

The specific operational readiness of each submarine is classified for security reasons and is being withheld under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Otterburn Ranges

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the impact on army training of the delay in making improvements to the Otterburn ranges; and if he will make a statement. [129134]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 6 July 2000]: In 1995 my Department submitted a Notice of Proposed Development (NOPD) to the Northumberland National Park Association for the redevelopment of infrastructure at Otterburn Training Area (OTA). This redevelopment is essential to enable training of AS90 and MLRS units at regimental level. This remains an absolute requirement that cannot occur anywhere else in the UK. Since the NOPD was submitted our proposals have been thoroughly examined by two Public Inquiries (PI) and we are still awaiting the outcome.

As a result of our inability to develop OTA, AS90 and MLRS units have not been able to conduct the full range of special-to-arm training that is a necessary precursor to deploying with other formations on combined arms training. As a result, individual Brigades will not be trained sufficiently in all aspects of combined arms war fighting that would enable them to react to short notice operational deployments world wide, as envisaged under the Strategic Defence Review. This has direct consequence for our ability to meet readiness liabilities for the Joint Rapid Reaction Force (JRRF).

The results of the Public Inquiries are currently being considered by the Department for Environment, Transport and the Regions and I am hopeful that a decision will be forthcoming later this year. If our application is successful and allowing time for the necessary construction work on the training area, we expect that AS90 and MLRS units will be able to commence manoeuvre training at Otterburn in 2004.

RAF Feltwell

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 June 2000, Official Report, column 135W, regarding RAF Feltwell, when an official of his Department last visited RAF Feltwell. [129719]

Mr. Spellar: Officials from my Department visit daily.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 19 June 2000, Official Report, column 37W, regarding RAF Feltwell, how much notice it is necessary for RAF Commander Lakenheath to give prior to access to RAF Feltwell being granted by the US forces at the base. [129716]

Mr. Spellar: None.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 19 June 2000, Official Report, column 37W, regarding RAF Feltwell, if there are areas of RAF Feltwell from which RAF Commander Lakenheath is excluded; and on how many days in each of the last 12 months for which figures are available RAF personnel other than RAF Commander Lakenheath visited RAF Feltwell. [129717]

Mr. Spellar: The RAF Commander Lakenheath is not excluded from any area of RAF Feltwell. Records are not maintained in such a way as to identify separately all visits by RAF Personnel to RAF Feltwell.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 513W, regarding RAF Feltwell, if he will make a statement on the support function afforded to RAF Lakenheath by RAF Feltwell. [129718]

Mr. Spellar: RAF Feltwell provides support facilities such as accommodation, schooling and warehousing to RAF Lakenheath.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 June 2000, Official Report, column 135W, regarding RAF Feltwell, what plans Ministers from his Department have to visit RAF Feltwell. [129720]

Mr. Spellar: None.

RAF Lakenheath

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the operational purpose of RAF Lakenheath is; and how many (a) United Kingdom and (b) United States personnel are stationed there. [129682]

Mr. Spellar: RAF Lakenheath is a United States administered main operating base and hosts the United States Air Force's 48th Fighter Wing. 589 UK and 5,343 US personnel are stationed there.

Eurofighter

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department will derate, or otherwise downgrade, the performance specifications of the Eurofighter EJ200 power plants; and if he will make a statement. [128480]

Mr. Hoon: We are not planning any change in the performance specification of the EJ200 engine. However, for training purposes only, we are investigating the effect of limiting the thrust of the EJ200 engine fitted to Eurofighter. This, if implemented, should extend the engine life and reduce support costs. The change would be practically invisible to the pilot and have no effect on tactical training. During all operational flying full thrust levels will be available.

HMS Tireless

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he anticipates that the repairs to HMS Tireless will be complete. [129671]

Mr. Spellar: We anticipate that the repair to HMS Tireless will be completed in the autumn.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what work will be carried out on HMS Tireless; when it is due to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [129510]

Mr. Spellar: The repair work on HMS Tireless is a standard repair following a contained leak of coolant water in her reactor compartment. This work will be carried out in Gibraltar and completed in the autumn.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received on the repair of HMS Tireless in Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement. [129512]

Mr. Spellar: No representations concerning the repair to HMS Tireless have been made. However, the Chief Minister of Gibraltar continues to be fully briefed on this issue. He understands the reasons for carrying out the repair in Gibraltar and will continue to take a close interest in the safety aspects to ensure that no risk is posed to civilian or service personnel.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what additional safety guidelines have been issued to staff at HM Naval Base in Gibraltar in relation to the repair of HMS Tireless; and if he will make a statement. [129511]

Mr. Spellar: Stringent safety guidelines relating to nuclear safety and nuclear propelled warships are in place at all HM Naval Bases. Additional guidance relating to this repair has been issued to HM Naval Base Gibraltar.

Export Licences

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what export licences have recently been issued in respect of L3A1 CS irritant cartridges by SME industries in Malaysia. [128900]

Dr. Howells: I have been asked to reply.

The control of exports from Malaysia is a matter for the Malaysian Government. Any export of licensable goods from the UK to Malaysia would be subject to UK export controls. In addition, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 6 July 2000, Official Report, columns 246–49W.

Budget Allocations

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the budget allocation for the Defence Clothing and Textiles Agency is for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation. [125093]

Mr. Spellar [pursuant to his reply, 8 June 2000, c. 344–35W]: I can now advise that the budget allocation for the Defence Clothing and Textiles Agency for the financial year 2000–01 is £163.541 million. This was agreed on 26 June 2000.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Benefits (Medical Reports)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of applicants for (a) Disability

Living Allowance and (b) Attendance Allowance were refused allowances following an examining medical practitioner's report in each of the last five years. [129306]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

Decisions to refuse Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance following an examining medical practitioner's report expressed as percentages of all decisions on those benefits

Housing Benefit

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the occasions when he has used his powers under the Social Security Act 1992 (a) to require local authorities to improve administration of housing benefit and (b) to impose financial penalties on local authorities for failing to comply with a direction from him to improve housing benefit administration. [129468]

Angela Eagle: The Secretary of State has the power to require a local authority to achieve and to maintain specified standards of performance if, following a report by the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate (BFI), the authority fails to propose adequate remedies for any deficiencies identified by BFI.

Of the 64 reports published by the BFI, none have yet required the issue of a direction. My right hon. Friend remains ready to use his powers if appropriate.

State Pension

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 4, if he will set out the basis for his estimate that the Government are spending £2.5 billion more on pensioners than would have been spent by restoring the earnings link; and what the reasons are for the difference between this estimate and that given in his answer of 11 April, Official Report, column 144W. [129741]

Mr. Rooker: The assumptions underlying the estimate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave in his written answer on 11 April 2000, Official Report, columns 143–44W, are given in my written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 479W. The assumptions underlying the estimate given in my right hon. Friend's oral answer on 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 4, are the same.

The difference between the figures is due to the inclusion of estimated expenditure on free TV licences for those aged 75 and over in the latter estimate.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 480–81W, on the state pension, if he will estimate the cost of Option (a), linking the basic pension to earnings and introducing an age addition of £5 for pensioners aged 75 to 79 years and £10 for pensioners aged 80 years and above, on the basis that real earnings grow in line with the Government Actuary's Department's central assumption for long-term growth rates of real earnings. [129516]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

£ billion

	Gross	Net of means-tested benefits and income tax
2001–02	2.3	1.5
2002–03	2.9	1.9
2003–04	3.5	2.2
2004–05	4.2	—
2005–06	4.8	—

Notes:

1. Annual real earnings growth of 1.5 per cent. is assumed throughout the period in line with the Government Actuary's central assumption for long-term growth of real earnings.

2. It is assumed that the age addition is paid in full to basic State pension recipients and is not uprated. Figures include the cost of benefits whose rates are linked to the rate of basic Retirement Pension.

3. Figures are rounded to the nearest £0.1 billion and are in 2000–01 price terms.

4. Gross costs estimated by the Government Actuary's Department. Costs net of income-related benefit savings are estimated using the Policy Simulation Model. Income tax revenues estimated by the Inland Revenue.

5. Estimates of income tax revenues not available beyond 2003–04

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, for each of the last 12 months, in respect of the Minimum Income Guarantee, he will estimate (a) the number of applications, (b) the number of successful applications and (c) the average value of payments made. [129744]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Minimum Income Guarantee pensioners and average weekly amounts, Great Britain May 1999 to February 2000

Quarter	Number of claimants (thousand)	Average weekly payment
May 1999	1,624	45.30
August 1999	1,628	45.16
November 1999	1,626	45.03
February 2000	1,604	44.88

Notes:

1. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample and are therefore subject to a degree of sampling error.

2. Pensioners are defined as where the claimant, and/or partner are aged 60 or over.

3. Figure are rounded to the nearest thousand.

4. Figures include claimants who may be in Residential Care/Nursing Homes.

Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiries, May 1999–February 2000.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, for the Minimum Income Guarantee take-up campaign, he will estimate (a) the total administrative costs to date, (b) the administrative costs for the project team and teleclaims service, (c) the cost of the televised advertising campaign, (d) the total number of calls to the MIG claimline and (e) the number of claim packs issued, and of that number (i) the number of completed claim forms so far returned, (ii) the number of successful applications, (iii) the number of those successful claims that have so far been paid and (iv) the value of those claims so far paid. [129745]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

The total administrative costs, to the end of June, for the project team and teleclaims service is £2,639,236. The cost of the televised advertising campaign is estimated at £3,427,000 in total. To date the Minimum Income Guarantee claimline has received over 75,000 calls and from these calls over 35,000 claim packs have been issued.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Council Political Committee

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the terms of reference of the Political Committee of the European Council established under Article 25 of the Treaty on European Union; what is its membership; what opinions from it (a) have been requested by the European Council and (b) have been produced under its own initiative; and where each has been published. [128849]

Mr. Vaz: The Political Committee monitors the international situation in the areas covered by the common foreign and security policy and contributes to the definition of policies by delivering opinions to the Council at the request of the Council or on its own initiative. It also monitors the implementation of agreed policies. It consists of representatives of member states (usually the Political Director of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs) and of the Commission.

The Political Committee submits advice to the Council on all areas covered by the common foreign and security policy. It does not submit advice to the European Council.

Decisions taken by the Council on the basis of advice submitted by the Political Committee are published in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

Iranian Jews

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the conviction of members of the Jewish community in Shiraz, Iran. [129270]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 6 July 2000]: We are deeply concerned at the news of the sentences imposed on 1 July on 10 Jewish and two Muslim defendants tried for espionage in Shiraz. We and our EU partners have consistently raised our concerns about the conduct of the trial, in particular at its closed nature, despite earlier assurances to the contrary. We note that provision is made for appeal to the Shiraz Revolutionary Court within 20 days of sentencing, and if need be, to the Supreme Court. We will continue to follow proceedings closely and will register our concerns with the Iranian authorities.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) mobile telephones and (b) pagers are used by (i) the Minister for Europe and (ii) his officials; and what the cost was of (a) the mobile telephones and pagers and (b) calls made on the mobile telephones during the last year for which figures are available, identifying separately the figure for calls to non-UK telephone numbers. [129251]

Mr. Battle: It is imperative for the Minister for Europe to remain in close contact both at home and overseas. The Minister is provided with one mobile telephone. His officials have three. There is also a mobile telephone in the ministerial car. FCO mobile telephone line rental and call costs are at competitive commercial rates.

To provide details of the costs incurred would be in breach of commercial confidentiality.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) mobile telephones and (b) pagers are used by his Department; and what the cost was of (i) the mobile telephones and pagers and (ii) calls made on mobile telephones during the last year for which figures are available, identifying separately the cost for calls to non-UK telephone numbers and the persons to whom the facility is made available. [129252]

Mr. Battle: It is imperative for the FCO's staff to remain in close contact both at home and overseas. In the UK the FCO has 900 mobile telephones and 253 pagers. FCO mobile telephone line rental and call costs are at competitive commercial rates.

To provide details of the costs incurred would be in breach of commercial confidentiality.

Japanese Investment

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) which other Departments were sent copies of Sir Stephen Gomersall's telegram on Japanese investment in the UK; [129756]

(2) if he has ordered a inquiry into the leaking of Sir Stephen Gomersall's telegram on Japanese investment in the UK; [129742]

(3) if he will list the people in his Department who had access to the telegram on Japanese investment in the UK by Sir Stephen Gomersall; [129746]

(4) when his Department received Sir Stephen Gomersall's telegram on Japanese investment in the UK; and what action was taken after it was received. [129743]

Mr. Battle: I deplore the leaking of Sir Stephen Gomersall's telegram on Japanese investment in the UK.

Reports of this kind are routinely circulated to all Government Departments with an interest in the subject. This includes the Treasury, the Cabinet Office, the Department for Trade and Industry, the Invest in Britain Bureau (now Invest UK), British Trade International, the Ministry of Defence, the Department for International Development, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Scotland Office, the Northern Ireland Office and the Office of the Secretary of State for Wales. On the same basis, such reports are also widely circulated within the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Sir Stephen Gomersall's telegram was received in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 22 June 2000. It was then distributed in the normal way, through a mix of paper and electronic copies.

An inquiry into the leak has been launched.

EU Food Agency

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an EU food agency. [128508]

Ms Stuart: I have been asked to reply.

We have responded to the European Commission's White Paper on Food Safety which contains proposals to establish a European food authority. The submission of our response was announced via a Food Standards Agency press release of 1 June. The response has been placed in the Library of the House and is also available on the Food Standards Agency website at www.foodstandards.gov.uk/pdf—files/response.pdf.

The Commission is now considering all the comments it has received from member states and is awaiting the opinion of the European Parliament. The Commission has indicated its intention to come forward with firm proposals by late October.

SCOTLAND

Drugs Misuse

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the application of the Government's national policy on drugs in Scotland. [128584]

Dr. Reid: Action in Scotland against drugs misuse is being taken forward by the Scottish Executive within the common UK framework established by the 1998 White Paper, "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain" (Cm 3945). Scotland's drug strategy is set out in "Tackling Drugs in Scotland: Action in Partnership" which was launched in March 1999. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Flax and Hemp

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made to date in the negotiations to reform European support arrangements for flax and hemp. [125072]

Ms Quin: There have been lengthy discussions of the flax and hemp reform proposals at official level, but no discussion as yet at ministerial level.

The proposals were due to be discussed at the May Agriculture Council—and then the June Agriculture Council—but on both occasions they were removed from the agenda because the European Parliament had not provided its opinion. The Parliament's opinion was finally delivered on 6 July, clearing the way for discussion at the forthcoming Agriculture Council to be held on 17–18 July.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the number and nature is of the responses he has received as a result of his paper of 8 June on Review of Separation Distances for GM Crops; and if he will place copies of the responses in the Library. [126087]

Ms Quin: At the time of writing 36 responses to the consultation letter have been received expressing a range of views. Copies of the responses will be placed in the House Libraries after the end of the consultation period, unless respondents specifically ask for their comments not to be made public.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the parties consulted regarding the review of separation distances for GM crops announced on 8 June. [126096]

Ms Quin [holding answer 15 June 2000]: The review consultation document has been sent to the following organisations.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the proposal to add GM maize Chiodon LL to the NIAB approved list; and what plans he has to hold further consultations on this proposal. [127796]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford, (Joan Ruddock) on 22 May 2000, Official Report, columns 383–84W.

As required by the Seeds (National Lists of Varieties) Regulations 1982 (as amended), each of the 227 parties who have submitted formal written representations under regulation 21(2) have been supplied with copies of all of the written representations made. In view of the wide interest in the proposed decision, Ministers have agreed that all the parties who submitted such representations should be given an opportunity to comment, by 31 July, on the other representations made. No fees will be charged for making such further representations.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to review the fee for challenging the addition of a variety to the National Institute for Agricultural Botany approved list. [127795]

Ms Quin: The National Institution for Agricultural Bottany's recommended list is funded by industry and is not part of the statutory process of considering varieties for addition to the National List.

Fees for all National List services, including fees for making written representations and requesting a hearing, are reviewed at least once a year. The next review will start this autumn.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his inquiries have established the separation distance used between GM and non-GM crops in the production of the recently contaminated Advanta seeds from Canada. [127219]

Ms Quin [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The separation distances used between GM and non-GM crops in the production of the recently contaminated Advanta seeds are still under investigation by the Canadian Authorities. The results of these investigations are not yet available.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the contracts between his Department and the Central Science Laboratory that are connected with GMOs. [127220]

Ms Quin [holding answer 27 June 2000]: At present CSL are contracted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to undertake two GM-related research projects. One is a desk modelling study to assess the risks to the agricultural environment from the release of GM crops. The other is a review of the consequences for agriculture of the introduction of GM crops.

CSL are also contracted to provide advice on the plant health and agronomic aspects of GMOs.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will publish the findings of the inquiry into the causes of the Advanta seeds contamination incident. [127217]

Ms Quin [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The possible causes of the Advanta seeds contamination continue to be investigated by the Canadian authorities. The results of their investigations are not yet available the Department.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 357W, on what occasions in the last 12 months the Government have received information on GM seed contamination incidents from EU member states; and what information was received. [126818]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 19 June 2000]: At the meeting of EU and EEA/EFTA seed certification agencies, on 2–5 May this year, Greece reported an incident involving the suspected adventitious presence of GM seed in conventional cotton seed.

Information on the recent discovery of GM rapeseed in conventional rapeseed has been shared between the affected member states.

Following reports in the French press last week that the French authorities have discovered low levels of GM presence in conventional maize seed imported into France, we contacted the French authorities, who confirmed on 30 June that they had indeed found some GM seed in conventional maize seed, which has been sown in South West France. Further information now indicates that they have found three different modifications in a number of varieties of forage maize imported into France by the company Golden Harvest. The French authorities have not yet confirmed which varieties of maize seed are involved, but have confirmed that sweetcorn varieties are not affected by their current investigations. We are seeking further information from them on the varieties concerned. However, as the varieties concerned are cultivated in Southern France, it is possible that they would be unsuitable for cultivation in UK conditions.

The GMs found in maize samples by the French authorities are BT 176 and BT 11, and one further, as yet unidentified, modification. BT 176 is insect resistant and has Part C consent within the EU under Directive 90/220 for import, food and feed use, and for cultivation. BT 11 is insect resistant and has Part C consent for import and use in animal feed. Pending further information from the French authorities, my Department, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and the Food Standards Agency are considering what the implications would be should further investigations indicate that affected seed might have been sown in the UK.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his Ministry was informed of the contamination of seed by GM seed in crops planted before this calendar year. [126630]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Member to the information given by my right hon. Friend the Minister in the debate on 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 493.

Milk

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with the main supermarkets on the price of milk; and if he will make a statement. [126956]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend the Minister and his fellow Ministers have regular meetings with various organisations concerned with the dairy industry, including the main supermarkets. The price of milk has been one of a number of issues discussed.

Pig Farmers

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the number of pig farmers that (a) are eligible and (b) will participate in an outgoers scheme. [129399]

Ms Quin [holding answer 6 July 2000]: In general terms, all pig producers who can show they were involved in commercial pig breeding in June 1998 are eligible to take part in the outgoers element of the Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme. There may, however, be further conditions applied as a result of the recently concluded consultation exercise on this part of the scheme and by the terms of the European Commission's clearance document. No formal estimate on the number of pig farmers likely to take part has been made.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what criteria he has established for eligibility for a pig farmers' outgoers scheme; and when these will be announced. [129397]

Ms Quin [holding answer 6 July 2000]: As things stand, the eligibility criteria for the outgoers element of the Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme is that applicant must be able to show they were involved in commercial pig breeding in June 1998, that they have pig breeding facilities to destroy or dismantle and that they are prepared to enter into binding undertakings to cease pig production for a minimum of 10 years. These criteria may, however, change as a result of the recently concluded consultation exercise on this part of the scheme or to comply with the views of the European Commission. The final terms of the scheme will be announced following European Commission clearance.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received regarding an outgoers scheme for pig farmers; and if he will make a statement. [129400]

Ms Quin [holding answer 6 July 2000]: We have received a number of representations from hon. Members of this House and others regarding the outgoers element of the Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme (PIRS). This part of PIRS has also just completed its consultation period and responses to that consultation are being assessed, pending clearance of the scheme by the Commission.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Football Hooligans

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list those football hooligans who (a) are Category C hooligans and (b) have (i) restriction and (ii) banning orders against them; [128149]

(2) how many football hooligans have been added to the Category C list in each year; [128148]

(3) how many Category C football hooligans there are in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland. [128150]

Mr. Straw: The National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) maintains lists of convicted or suspected hooligans, but does not apply the term "Category C" to individuals on those lists. The individuals currently subject to Restriction Orders or other category of football banning orders have been placed in the Library.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes remained unsolved in the Metropolitan police area on Monday 26 June; and if he will make a statement. [128275]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from the Metropolitan police that the information requested is not yet available for Monday 26 June; but that on the latest Monday for which the information is available, 32,303 crimes of all types were classified as unsolved.

Asylum Seeker Vouchers

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to allow shops which accept asylum seeker vouchers to give change. [128882]

Mrs. Roche: We remain of the opinion that the "no change" policy is an essential part of our strategy. It is designed to be a disincentive to those who intend using the asylum process for economic migration. We are giving further consideration to increasing the flexibility of the present voucher scheme by providing more low denomination vouchers given to asylum seekers.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been waiting (a) six to 12 months, (b) 13 to 18 months and (c) more than one and a half years, for the Criminal Cases Review Commission to allocate their case to a case review manager; and if he will make a statement. [128608]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that, at the end of May, the total number of eligible cases awaiting allocation to a case review manager was 899. The kind of breakdown requested is not readily available from the Criminal Cases Review Commission's current management information system, though it will be from a new system that is expected to be in use by the end of August.

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what effect the recent increase of case review managers for the Criminal Cases Review Commission has had on the waiting time for allocation to a case review manager; and if he will make a statement. [128607]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is not yet possible to say. The Commission was notified at the end of March that it would be given additional funding for 2000–01, and allowed to increase its complement of case review managers from 40 to 50. I understand that the Commission has recently completed a recruitment exercise, but that the successful applicants have not yet all taken up post, and further recruitment will anyway be necessary to bring the number of case review managers up to complement. The impact of these additional staff on the waiting time for the allocation of cases will also depend on the nature of the cases to be allocated to them, and the rate of receipt of applications.

Asylum Seekers

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applicants whose cases fall to be considered under concessions announced in the White Paper on Asylum and Immigration, published in 1998, have not received a decision on their case. [128763]

Mrs. Roche: As at 30 June, outstanding cases are 1,250 (plus 50 pre-1993 cases).

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if those asylum applicants whose cases fall to be considered under concessions announced in the White Paper on Asylum and Immigration, published in 1998, will be notified of a decision by the end of July. [128762]

Mrs. Roche: The Integrated Casework Directorate aims to clear such cases by the end of July, subject to timely receipt of requested information and the case being clearly identified as falling for consideration under the White Paper criteria. Any cases which come to light beyond that date will be given priority criteria in Liverpool.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason the remaining cases held in Croydon of asylum applicants whose claim falls to be considered under the concession announced in the White Paper, have been transferred to the Asylum Arrears Group at the Nationality Directorate in Liverpool; and what effect this has had on the time taken to make decisions on those claims. [128730]

Mrs. Roche: Sharing the load of such cases among a greater number of caseworkers was seen as the best means of ensuring prompt resolution. There was also an operational requirement to provide appropriate work for a growing casework unit in Liverpool.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code. [129163]

Mr. Straw: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Custody

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women have been given a sentence of immediate custody by the courts in the Greater London area in each of the last three years. [129193]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Available information, taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Databases, is given in the table.

CS Sprays

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces in England and Wales do not hold stocks of CS sprays; how many make it their policy not to use CS sprays; and if he will make a statement. [129248]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Three police forces in England and Wales do not use CS spray: Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire and Sussex. The remaining 40 forces will hold stocks of CS spray for issue to their officers.

Firearms

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of unlicensed shotguns held in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [129454]

Mr. Charles Clarke: So far as I am aware, no reliable estimate exists of the number of unlicensed shotguns in the United Kingdom.

Young Offenders (Barnet)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average length of time was from arrest to sentence of persistent young offenders at the magistrates courts in Barnet in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [129278]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 6 July 2000]: The average time from arrest to sentence for persistent young offenders sentenced at Barnet magistrates court is estimated to have been 100 days in the period April 1999 to March 2000. This estimate is based on data collated by the Lord Chancellor's Department. It is calculated from the average time from charge to sentence for persistent young offenders sentenced at Barnet magistrates court between April 1999 and March 2000 and on the police force level results of a survey on the average time between arrest and charge for persistent young offenders dealt with in 1999. The figure excludes any cases that were dealt with at Barnet magistrates court but were committed to the Crown Court for trial or sentence. It is based on only 19 sentencing occasions and therefore should be interpreted cautiously.

Lords Lieutenant

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money his Department has spent in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available on (a) Lords Lieutenant and (b) their deputies in England. [129678]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Expenditure incurred by the Home Office in support of Lords Lieutenant in each of the last 10 years was:

No expenditure is incurred on Deputy Lieutenants.

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were employed by Cleveland Constabulary in each of the last five years. [129519]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library an analysis of how the Youth Justice Board plans to spend the budget and Development Fund set out on page 77 of the Home Office Annual report 1999–2000. [129523]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An analysis will be placed in the Library on Wednesday 12 July.

Research and Statistics

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of his Department's expenditure on the Research and Statistics Service supports (a) the preparation and publication of statistics and (b) research. [129530]

Mr. Straw: My Department's Research, Development and Statistics Directorate (RDS) conducts a wide range of social research, development and statistics work, often using multidisciplinary teams working on a range of statistical and research outputs and for this reason details of expenditure cannot be broken down in the way requested. The available information on RDS expenditure as a whole for the 1999–2000 financial year is shown in the table:

Research, development and statistics expenditure: 1999–2000 financial year

[2] RDS received a total of £454,021 in receipts in 1999–2000, which is excluded from this total.

In addition, a number of other areas of the Department undertake research, including the Fire Research and Development Group, which spent £542,998 (including £42,456 VAT recovered) on fire research in 1999–2000 in addition to pay-running costs of £761,787 in support of fire research. The Animal Procedures Committee plan to spend £295,000 on research and the Committee of Inquiry into Hunting with Dogs has spent £225,000 (35 per cent. of the total inquiry expenditure).

Mr. Charles Clarke: Around £7.5 million was spent on grants and evaluation under the Crime Reduction Programme in 1999–2000. Planned expenditure for 2000–01 is £160 million. The programme covers a variety of crime reduction initiatives, including Closed Circuit Television (CCTV) in public areas, Reducing Burglary and Targeted Policing Initiatives and schemes to cut vehicle and property crime, youth crime, offender reconviction rates and violence against women.

Carers Grant

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Carers Grant is additional to the amount county councils have already spent on respite care; how much Kent County Council will receive from the Carers Grant; and if he will make a statement. [126247]

Mr. Hutton: The carers special grant is allocated to local authorities to stimulate the diversity and flexibility of provision that enables carers to have a break from caring. Services funded in this way must be additional to any breaks services previously provided.

Kent County Council received a carers special grant of £530,713 in 1999–2000 and £1,264,352 in 2000–01.

These figures are in addition to the figure of approximately £197 million and £207 million which Kent received for the provision of personal social services, in 1999–2000 and in 2000–01 respectively, through the standard spending assessment. This money can also be spent on services which benefit carers.

Correspondence

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter from Mrs. F. Butler of Augustine Road, Sheppey, dated 3 April. [128473]

Ms Stuart: A reply was sent to Mrs. Butler on 7 July.

Care Accommodation

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were living in care accommodation under the provisions of the care in the community legislation on 1 May. [128875]

Mr. Hutton: Data are not currently held in the form requested. However, the table shows the number of places or registered beds available for people with mental health problems in residential homes or private nursing homes, hospitals and clinics.

Macular Degeneration

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the speed of onset and progression of age-related macular degeneration; [128724]

(2) what guidance he has issued on the assessment of treatment options for age-related macular degeneration; and if he will make a statement; [128725]

(3) how many cases of age-related macular degeneration can be treated by photodynamic therapy per annum; [128727]

(4) if he will refer Visudyne to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence; [128728]

(5) what assessment he has made of the efficacy of Visudyne following the publication of the two year clinical trial data; [128729]

(6) what estimate his Department has made of the possible cost of treating age-related macular degeneration with Visudyne; and if he will make a statement; [128780]

(7) what steps he has taken to promote the use of Amsler grid tests with GPs to test for age-related macular degeneration; [128781]

(8) what plans he has to promote the increased use of Amsler grid tests in GP surgeries; [128782]

(9) if he will make a statement on referral protocols for age-related macular degeneration and Visudyne. [128783]

Mr. Denham: It is estimated that age-related macular degeneration (AMD) affects one in 100 people over the age of 75, with some 500,000 people affected overall. There are two major types of AMD: wet and dry. Some 20 per cent. of patients have 'wet' AMD which is sometimes susceptible to laser treatment. Visudyne is a light-activated compound which has been used in a trial of an alternative photodynamic therapy. Visudyne has not yet been approved for use here or in the other countries of the European Union, but the EU Commission is expected to make a final decision on the approval of an application in the next few months. Visudyne is also among the topics we are considering for appraisal by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) during the remainder of the current year and in later years. We will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Consideration of the need to review arrangements for screening, including wider use of Amsler grid tests, would follow any consideration by NICE.

NHS Hearing Aid Services

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the NHS hearing aid services pilot project. [128909]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) on 6 June 2000, Official Report, columns 143–44W.

Beta Interferon

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people with (a) relapsing remitting

MS and (b) secondary progressive MS receive beta interferon in each health authority area in England. [128697]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available at the level of detail requested. However, we estimate that between 1,700 and 1,800 people in England are currently receiving beta interferon on the National Health Service.

Dental Services

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what additional funding has been provided since 1997 to secure provision of NHS dental treatment in Devon and Cornwall; [129207]

(2) what percentage of the £60 million extra funding for NHS dentistry announced earlier this year (a) has gone and (b) will go towards improving NHS dental treatment in (i) Cornwall and (ii) Devon; [129208]

(3) what plans he has to provide additional funding for the provision of NHS dental treatment in Devon and Cornwall. [129206]

Mr. Hutton: We have already made good progress towards improving access to dental services in Cornwall and Devon. Investing in Dentistry grants amounting to £1,095,165 have been approved in the area in return for promises of up to 110,200 new National Health Service registrations. Since 1998, a dental access centre pilot has been operational in Cornwall and the NHS Executive is currently working with North East Devon and South West Devon Health Authorities to develop two further dental access centres.

We have accepted in full the recommendations of the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body, which include an annual £17 million scheme to reward the loyalty and commitment of NHS dentists in England.

The NHS Executive wrote on 16 May to all health authority chief executives asking them to tell us whether more needs to be done to improve NHS dentistry in their locality and inviting ideas for potential funding.

Further initiatives to improve access to services will form part of our plans for modernising NHS dentistry, which will be published this summer in conjunction with the National Plan for the New NHS.

Ultrasound

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average waiting time was for a non-urgent NHS patient to receive an ultrasound examination for a possible thrombosis in each (a) London hospital and (b) NHS region for each of the years (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [129238]

Mr. Denham: The data requested are not collected centrally. We take the issue of delays in diagnosis very seriously. Through such initiatives as the national booked admissions programme, the cancer services collaborative, action on cataracts and action on orthopaedics, we are encouraging hospitals to streamline their services so that tests are carried out, and a diagnosis made, as quickly as possible and with the patient making the minimum number of visits to hospital.

Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what payments were made to (a) the Chief Executive and (b) Deputy Chief Executive of Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust upon their resignations; [129415]

(2) what salary and other remuneration is paid to the former Chief Executive of Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust in his new employment with Avon Health Authority. [129408]

Ms Stuart: The severance arrangements agreed between the former chief executive and deputy chief executive and Plymouth Hospitals National Health Service Trust are a confidential matter between the individuals concerned and the trust.

Avon Health Authority has engaged the former chief executive for a year to develop a strategic framework for acute services in Avon. He is being employed on normal NHS terms and conditions.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public; [129633]

(2) how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129627]

Ms Stuart: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 439W. The Department's Public Enquiry Office has an automated call handling system that uses touch tone telephone steering. Callers without a touch tone telephone will be automatically diverted to a public enquiry office adviser.

Coronary Services (Coventry)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money has been allocated to coronary services in the Coventry area in the last three years. [129446]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is in the table.

Teenage Pregnancy

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress made on his Department's national publicity campaign to tell young people they can talk to health professionals about sex and contraception in confidence; and what funding has been allocated to the campaign. [129253]

Yvette Cooper: Our media campaign on teenage pregnancy will begin in autumn 2000, following a period of research into promising approaches by similar campaigns elsewhere. Levels of funding for this current year are to be decided, and for future years will depend on the outcome of the Spending Review.

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many local co-ordinators for teenage pregnancy have been established since the publication of the Social Exclusion Unit report "Teenage Pregnancy", in June 1999. [129256]

Yvette Cooper: Every area in England now has a local teenage pregnancy co-ordinator, jointly nominated by the local authority and health authority. In total there are 141 co-ordinators, with some working to social services boundaries and some to health authority boundaries, depending on local circumstances.

Tranquilliser Addiction

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide funding (a) under section 64 and (b) generally for the Council for Involuntary Tranquilliser Addiction. [128329]

Yvette Cooper: Although project funding has been provided in the past, the Department has no current plans to fund this organisation under the section 64 scheme or generally in this financial year. The very high level of demand for cash limited funds has resulted in many worthy applications having to be rejected. This does not prelude the Council for Involuntary Tranquilliser Addiction from seeking funding in future years.

The problems of dependence upon tranquillisers have been recognised for many years. In 1994, the Department issued copies of "Guidelines for the Prevention and Treatment of Benzodiazepine Dependence", published by the Mental Health Foundation, to all health authorities and recommended their use by general practitioners. Various treatments may be offered in general practice or by the specialist mental health services for those who have developed dependence upon tranquillisers.

Dentists (Pensions)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy towards the pension fund contributions paid by the Treasury for NHS contracted dentists where the agreed increase in payments is phased. [129981]

Mr. Denham: Contributions towards the National Health Service pension scheme are based on actual levels of pensionable remuneration. Therefore, where increases have been phased in the past, the amounts paid by way of contributions into the pension scheme by both the employer and employee have been based on the actual pensionable remuneration that was paid.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

National Audit Office

37. Mr. Gray: To ask the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission what assessment he has made of the resources available to the National Audit Office; and if he will make a statement. [128234]

Mr. Sheldon: It is the main concern of the Commission to ensure that the Comptroller and Auditor-General has the right resources to undertake his work. The Commission last met on 2 December 1999 to consider the Supply Estimate for the National Audit Office for 2000–01. The Commission took account of the growing work load of the National Audit Office and recommended additional funding for 2000–01 as a result.

While the Commission will continue to monitor the situation, I am satisfied that, at present, the current level of funding for this work is adequate and that, were the Comptroller and Auditor-General to need more staff or other resources in the future, he would request extra funding from this House when compiling his annual Supply Estimate.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Conservation Trust

32. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what support is given by the commissioners to the work of the Church Conservation Trust; and if he will make a statement. [128228]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The work of the Churches Conservation Trust is jointly funded, 30 per cent. by the Church of England and 70 per cent. by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

The Church's share of the Trust's budgeted expenditure for the three years beginning on 1 April 2000 is £3.8 million. This will be met partly from a share of the sale proceeds of redundant churches and partly from the Church Commissioners' own funds.

Over 330 redundant churches of historic and architectural interest are now maintained by the Churches Conservation Trust, many opening for occasional acts of worship. A full list is available from their offices at 89 Fleet Street.

Church Repairs

33. Miss McIntosh: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what recent representations he has received calling for reduced rates of VAT on church repairs; and if he will make a statement. [128230]

Mr. Stuart Bell: I am hopeful that with the persistence of those hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), we shall achieve our goal—that is, reduced rates of VAT on church repairs.

The Church continues to make representations on this issue to the Government and has briefed members of the General Synod informally during their current meeting in York.

Redundant Churches

35. Mr. Paterson: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will make a statement on the steps the commissioners take to involve congregations in the disposal of Church property declared redundant by the Church authorities. [128232]

Mr. Stuart Bell: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer I gave him on 12 June 2000, Official Report, column 494W, in which I explained that the procedure for settling the future of redundant Church of England churches gives priority to dioceses seeking and achieving suitable alternative uses.

Church Buildings

36. Mr. Pike: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, how many church buildings were sold or otherwise disposed of in 1999; and to what uses these buildings have been put. [128233]

Mr. Stuart Bell: During 1999 the future of 16 redundant churches was settled by appropriation to alternative uses—six for community purposes, five for residential use, two by other Christian congregations, and three for, respectively, arts purposes, as a restaurant and as a shop.

Stipends

Mr. Swayne: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what proportion of stipends new incumbents may expect to be met by current congregations. [128231]

Mr. Stuart Bell: In 1999, some 68 per cent. of the national stipends pay bill, excluding the stipends of Bishops, archdeacons and cathedral clergy, was financed by giving. However, the proportion will vary from parish to parish. A large part of the remainder of the bill is met by allocations from the Commissioners, individual grants, fees and glebe and trust income.

Bishops

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what percentage of the Church Commissioners' (a) total and (b) discretionary expenditure was spent on bishops' emoluments, in each year from 1979 to date. [129657]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The costs of bishops' stipends, administrative support (including staff salaries) and (for diocesan bishops) housing are met by the Commissioners. While the level of that support varies between individuals according to their particular resource needs arising, inter alia, from the nature of their ministry, we none the less meet those needs in full, subject to our guidelines and budgetary procedures. It is therefore not possible to isolate a discretionary element in our provision.

Our spending on bishops expressed as a proportion of the Commissioners' total expenditure for the years 1979–99 is:

Year	Proportion percentage
1979	5.9
1980	5.8
1981	6.5
1982	6.6
1983	6.6
1984	6.1
1985	6.0
1986	6.2
1987	5.9
1988	5.8
1989	5.8
1990	6.2
1991	6.8
1992	7.2
1993	7.4
1994	7.9
1995	8.7
1996	9.3
1997	10.2
1998	9.3
1999	9.5

From 1990 the Commissioners took on full funding responsibility for suffragan bishops' working costs. The rising proportion during the years in question also partly arises from factors such as developments in IT.

The expenditure of the Church of England as a whole was £760 million in 1999; the Commissioners' spending represented 2 per cent of that sum.

Rents

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, how much rent is paid by Lady Brentford in respect of her occupancy of the cottage in the grounds of Lambeth Palace. [129831]

Mr. Stuart Bell: It is not our practice to disclose rents paid by individual tenants. Nonetheless, the rent has been set at a market level on the basis of comparable evidence.

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, how much rent is paid by Ruth Davy in respect of her occupancy of the Old Palace at Canterbury. [129824]

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many times Ministers in her Department have sought the advice of the Permanent

Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 and 123 of the Ministerial Code; and on which occasions such advice was sought. [129176]

Clare Short: Neither I, nor my Under-Secretary of State have sought advice from the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances described.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in her Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code. [129165]

Clare Short: There have not been any occasions when I or the Under-Secretary of State have made a declaration of interest.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 408W, on St. Helena, if she will make representations to the Government of St. Helena about publishing the report on the feasibility of an airstrip. [129214]

Clare Short: This is a matter for the Government of St. Helena.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of her Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129484]

Clare Short: The Pay and Personnel Agency (PPA), which is an Agency of the Ministry of Defence, has been the payroll provider for the Department for International Development since October 1995.

The PPA relies upon checking systems at the employee's place of work, the Agency pay office and within computer systems to identify and act upon any changes of circumstances which affect the continuing payment of reduced rate National Insurance contributions. These systems were subjected to an audit in March 1998 by Inland Revenue and Department of Social Security personnel, which included a 100 per cent. check of all staff then paying reduced rates of contributions. No problems were identified with the systems operations.

It is not the current practice of the PPA or DFID to write annually to officers paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Shoreditch Magistrates Court

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to renovate and use the former Shoreditch Magistrates Court in Old Street; and if he will make a statement. [129247]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor's Department has no plans to make use of the former magistrates court building in Old Street. This building is owned by the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police Service. It is part of the Inner London Courthouse estate, which will be transferred to the Greater London Magistrates Courts Authority on 1 April 2001.

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what discussions he has had with English Heritage about the future use of the former Shoreditch Magistrates Court in Old Street. [129246]

Jane Kennedy: I have had no discussions with English Heritage on the future use of Old Street Magistrates Courthouse.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many times ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 and 123 of the Ministerial Code; and on which occasions such advice was sought; [129179]

(2) on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code. [129153]

Mr. Byers: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to require the renewables obligation on electricity suppliers to be met by renewable energy generated solely within the United Kingdom by 2010. [129221]

Mrs. Liddell: The renewables obligation will require licensed electricity suppliers to supply electricity generated from renewable sources of energy to their customers in Great Britain. Suppliers will be free to purchase this electricity in a competitive market. The Government expect that suppliers will purchase the bulk of their renewable electricity from within the United Kingdom, but it will of course comply with the requirements of European law on access for imported electricity.

Letters and Packets

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 13 June 2000, Official Report, columns 595–96W, on letters and packets, if he will list, in respect of each change in weights of letter post made under Directive 97/67 of 1997 and its predecessors, the (a) reasons for such change and the amount concerned, (b) date of its coming into force, (c) consideration by Parliament and (d) Minister of the Crown who gave consent to the directive and changes arising from it, giving the reasons for any such changes. [129596]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Directive 97/67 was the first Postal Services Directive passed by the European Commission. It has no predecessors. A memorandum setting out how the Government intended to implement each of the requirements of the EU Directive, including draft postal services regulations, was published for consultation on 8 July 1999. Subsequently, the Postal Services Regulations (S.I. 1999/2107) transposed the Directive into United Kingdom law and amended the Postal Privilege (Suspension Order) 1981/1483 to include the words > either weighs not less than 350 grams or.

This had the effect of adding a weight threshold of not less than 350 grams to the existing £1 price threshold in order to be compliant with the Directive. The price threshold was already within the limit required by the Directive of five times public tariff for an item of correspondence in the first weight step of the fastest standard category. The Statutory Instrument was laid before Parliament on 27 July 1999 and came into force on 1 September 1999. The Minister responsible for postal issues at that time was my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry.

Post Office Network

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to pay subsidies to post offices before 2003. [129417]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 6 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to my statement and subsequent exchanges on 28 June 2000, Official Report, columns 907–20 and the PIU report also published on 28 June, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House and the Vote Office.

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to ensure that each sub-post office will be entitled to offer the full range of Post Office and contracted Government services subject to the commercial decisions of the sub-postmaster involved. [128753]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In his statement on 28 June 2000, Official Report, columns 907–20, on the Post Office network, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a range of proposals and measures designed to modernise and sustain the post office network. Among them were proposals to develop new areas of business facilitated by the installation of a modern on-line computer system in every office throughout the country. Certain services are likely to remain restricted to a proportion of the network because of the client's requirement for cost-effectiveness in selecting channels for the delivery of their services.

Universal Bank

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Universal bank will be required to provide banking services to any applicant irrespective of financial status. [128752]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Post Office is developing plans, in conjunction with the high street banks, for the Universal Bank. It is intended that the Universal bank should cater for as wide a range of customers as possible, bringing many more people into the financial mainstream.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the services of the proposed Universal bank in sub-post offices will differ from those provided by the Alliance and Leicester Girobank. [129988]

Mr. Byers: Alliance and Leicester Girobank offer a full range of banking services. The Universal bank is intended to cater for a wide range of people currently outside the financial mainstream and will therefore offer basic bank accounts without overdraft or borrowing facilities.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he proposes to publish a business plan for the Universal bank in sub-post offices. [129987]

Mr. Byers: The business plan for developing and operating a Universal bank service at post offices will be a commercially confidential document.

Benefit Payments (ACT)

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if claimants who wish to receive their benefits in cash, and who have no other bank account, will be required to open a new Universal bank account under the Government's proposals for switching benefit payments to ACT. [129605]

Mr. Alan Johnson: From 2003, the normal method of paying benefits and pensions will be directly into bank or building society accounts. Those who wish to collect their benefits in cash from the post office after 2003 will still be able to do so.

The establishment of the Universal bank will provide the means for any recipient to have an account for benefits to be paid into, and accessed across a post office counter using a card rather than a benefit book. However, we also recognise that there may still be a small number of people and payments which the Benefits Agency will be unable to pay by ACT. For these, we are considering what alterative simple money transmission system, which could be accessed by post offices, may be commercially available.

Small Businesses

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to help small businesses minimise the impact of regulations dealing with (a) parental leave and (b) working time regulations. [129950]

Ms Hewitt: Officials consulted widely with business and business organisations, and implemented parental leave regulation with a light touch to ensure that they were fair to both employers and employees. To help people understand and adapt to the new regulations, the Department of Trade and Industry has produced clear and detailed guidance material. My right hon. Friend is leading a review of maternity pay and parental leave, and it will consider as part of its remit whether it is possible further to simplify legislation in this area.

The Working Time Regulations implemented the Working Time Directive in the UK so as to balance the proper protection of workers with minimising burdens on business. The 1999 amendments to the Regulations both simplified the record-keeping requirements and provided for the provision of statutory guidance.

Guidance on both parental leave and working time is available in hard copy or on the DTI internet site www.dti.gov.uk/er

Horizon Project

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the decision by the Post Office to write off the cost of the Horizon Project was taken in the knowledge of the Government's plans for a Universal bank in sub-post offices. [129986]

Mr. Byers: The Post Office decision was taken solely in the context of Financial reporting Standard 11.

Euro Policy

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department was made aware of the leaking of the document from the head of the Invest in Britain Bureau relating to the Government's euro policy; and if he will take steps to establish how this document was made public. [129443]

Mr. Byers: On 2 July. An investigation is under way.

Foreign Investment

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the trend in the level of foreign direct investment into the UK since January 1999. [129445]

Mr. Caborn: On 5 July. Invest UK (formerly the Invest in Britain Bureau), announced at its Annual Review another record year for attracting inward investment projects into the UK. Between 1 April 1999 and 31 March 2000. Invest UK recorded 757 inward investment decisions to locate in the UK by foreign-owned companies, with some 52,783 associated new jobs over the next three years.

Figures published by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) on 29 June showed that at the end of the first quarter 2000 Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) stock in the UK had risen to £252.4 billion—up 23 per cent. compared with a year earlier.

Arms Sales

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements apply to end users of armaments (a) sold and (b) transferred by the United Kingdom to Saudi Arabia; and if he will make a statement. [129308]

Mr. Hoon: I have been asked to reply.

Most defence exports to Saudi Arabia are organised under Government-to-Government arrangements. I am unable to disclose specific details of these arrangements under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, but I can say that it is normal practice to include a clause in the Memoranda of Understanding which prohibits the transfer of material to third parties without the approval of the UK Government.

For exports not covered by Government-to-Government arrangements, the risk of diversion to third parties is taken into account in considering export licence applications.

DEFENCE

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98720]

Dr. Moonie: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to her by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 255–56W. In addition, the Ministry of Defence, spent in 1997–98 £174,836 and in 1998–99 £179,707, on transport services for Ministers.

Queen Mother (100th Birthday)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much public money has been spent on commemorations for HM Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother's 100th birthday. [127909]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 28 June 2000]: The main event to mark Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother's 100th Birthday will be a Service of Thanksgiving to be held at St. Paul's Cathedral on 11 July, and a Pageant to be held on Horse Guards on 19 July. Events to mark Her Majesty's Birthday on 4 August have yet to be announced.

Significant costs are likely to arise only from the Pageant on 19 July, which is being funded primarily from private sources. There will be some additional incidental costs borne by the Ministry of Defence. The actual additional cost of this, and of the other events, could be identified only when they have taken place.

I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the Commissioner of Police for the City of London that no identifiable costs have yet been incurred by the Metropolitan police service and the City of London police.

Costs to the Royal Parks Agency as a result of the Pageant will be identifiable only following the event.

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the impact of his proposals for DERA on the number of staff employed by private companies at the DERA base at West Freugh. [128284]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which Sir John Chisholm, Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, DERA give him on 29 June 2000, Official Report, column 593W.

Under our current proposals, we envisage that the capabilities provided by West Freugh will form part of the NewDERA company. It is, therefore, likely that the DERA staff at West Freugh would transfer to the private sector. The status of other staff at DERA West Freugh will continue unchanged.

We are confident that our proposals will secure a long-term future for both NewDERA and those elements to be retained within the Ministry of Defence, which should have a positive impact on job prospects. In addition, the new freedoms proposed for NewDERA will open up a range of commercial opportunities not previously available and help secure jobs in the longer term.

No final decisions on the PPP will be taken until all the inputs received during the consultation exercise, which ended on 9 June, have been fully analysed. We hope to be in a position to make an announcement on the way ahead for DERA before the summer recess.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many departmental telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by interactive voice response systems; [127399]

(2) how many agencies of his Department use interactive voice response systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public; [127407]

(3) how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public; [129631]

(4) how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129629]

Dr. Moonie: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Former Civil Servants

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the posts assumed by the 14 officials who have notified his Department that they have taken up appointments in the private sector. [129012]

Dr. Moonie: The information requested is as follows:

Information about applications approved by the Prime Minister under the rules on the acceptance of outside appointments by Crown servants is published in the annual reports of the Advisory Committee on Business Appointments.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to amend the rules that apply to senior officials from his Department joining private sector companies. [129014]

Dr. Moonie: The rules on the acceptance of outside appointments are set out in the Civil Service Management Code and apply to Crown servants in all Government Departments. The Defence Secretary has no plans to propose any changes to them.

SA80 Rifle

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 23 June 2000, Official Report, column 319W, if the modified SA80 rifle will be added to the NATO Nominated Weapons List. [128771]

Dr. Moonie: In 1997, the SA80 was suspended from the NATO Nominated Weapons list, the list of those weapons used for testing ammunition that is seeking NATO qualification. Once modified, the SA80 will be re-assessed and should be re-admitted to this list.

Defence Housing Executive

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when empty Defence Housing Executive accommodation in Leeming will be placed on the market; and if he will make a statement. [129096]

Dr. Moonie: Twenty empty properties in Leeming Village were handed back to the owners, Annington Homes Ltd. (AHL), on 26 June. It is, of course, for the owners to decide how to dispose of these properties but they are likely to be sold privately through a nominated agent. It is probable that 10 of the remaining properties in Leeming will be part of a future release but they are currently subject to planning and approval processes and a number of them are occupied.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128984]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence does not operate an approved list of manufacturers of cars or commercial vehicles. The supplier is normally selected through competition. The Department's policy is to seek the best value for money and this will determine whether we purchase or lease vehicles in specific cases. However, management of cars and commercial vehicles is not core MOD business and as a consequence the Department is actively pursuing the provision of vehicle and support services through a competitively let Private Finance Initiative contract. It will be for the contractor to determine the type and mix of vehicles to provide the necessary service.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code; [129159]

(2) if he will list the occasions since May 1997 on which Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in paragraphs 118, 121 or 123 of the Ministerial Code; [129106]

(3) if he will list the occasions since May 1997 on which Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in paragraphs 118, 121 or 123 of the Ministerial Code. [129178]

Dr. Moonie: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Married Quarters (Arborfield)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason surplus married quarters at Arborfield were not disposed of on the open market; and if he will make a statement. [129245]

Dr. Moonie: The properties at Arborfield were included in the sale, on a 999 year lease, of most of the Service Families Quarters in England and Wales to Annington Homes Ltd. (AHL) in November 1996. At that time there was a requirement for the properties to house Service families and they were underleased back from AHL. The properties have since been declared surplus to Service requirements and, under the terms of the sale agreement a total of 105 have been handed back to AHL. The option of sale on the open market is therefore a matter for the owners, AHL.

Cyber-warfare

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the proposed cyber-warfare unit, identifying its proposed size and detailed costs. [129283]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 6 July 2000]: There are no plans to establish a cyber-warfare unit in the Ministry of Defence.

Church Fenton Airfield

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what environmental appraisal has been conducted regarding his Department's plans to secure planning permission for housing on Church Fenton airfield. [129815]

Dr. Moonie: To date it has been premature to discuss the issue of environmental appraisals with Selby District Council (SDC). The Ministry of Defence, or the site's eventual developer, will, prior to the submission of any planning application(s), liaise with SDC over the provision of an Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) for those aspects of the development for which one may be required under planning/environmental legislation.

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what environmental and conservation bodies have been consulted by his Department in connection with its plans to secure planning permission for housing on Church Fenton airfield. [129814]

Dr. Moonie: Under the Town and Country Planning legislation it is the duty of the local planning authority (LPA) to consult with environmental and conservation bodies, where necessary, over any applications for development. It is not known what consultations Selby District Council have undertaken in respect of RAF Church Fenton. It would be premature for us to initiate these discussions as our plans are being tested at the Local Plan Inquiry.

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations his Department has had with local parish councils regarding his Department's proposal to secure planning permission for housing on Church Fenton Airfield. [129830]

Dr. Moonie: Under the Town and Country Planning Acts it is an obligation of the local planning authority (LPA) to consult with the parish councils once they receive a planning application for redevelopment. In August 1998, my Department submitted an application for redevelopment of part of the Church Fenton site and the LPA should have consulted the parish councils. Their response is not known. We subsequently agreed to hold any decision on that application in abeyance until the result of the current Local Plan Inquiry was known. As for our submissions to, and appearance at, the Local Plan Inquiry, the local parish councils would have been part of the LPA's consultation process throughout the preparation of the plan. However, they were also specifically advised of our proposals by letter from our planning consultants in early June of this year.

Departmental News Director

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what civil service grade is held by the Director of News, Mr. Martin Howard; what civil service post was held by Mr. Howard prior to his appointment as Director of News, who the previous holder of the position of Director of News was; and what Mr. Howard's job description is as Director of News. [129829]

Dr. Moonie: Mr. Martin Howard is a member of the senior civil service. His previous appointment was in the Ministry of Defence as Head of the Overseas Secretariat. The previous incumbent of the post of Director of News was Ms Oona Muirhead, also a senior civil servant. The role of Director of News is to act as the official spokesman of the Ministry of Defence and to identify media opportunities for promoting the key themes of the Defence Mission proactively, effectively and consistently.

Journalists (Meetings)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the journalists he has had meetings with at his Department since December 1999; and on what dates these meetings were held. [129828]

Mr. Hoon: I have been interviewed by the following journalists and broadcasters at the Ministry of Defence since December 1999:

Interviewer	Date
Ian Kirby (News of the World)	6 January 2000
Alex Nicholl (Financial Times)	1 March 2000
Peter Ryan (Economist)	2 March 2000
Lucy Jackson (British Forces Broadcasting Service)	21 March 2000
News piece (BBC TV News)	23 March 2000
Anita Anand (Zee TV)	4 April 2000
Richard Norton-Taylor (The Guardian)	17 April 2000
Tim Sebastian (BBC Hardtalk)	8 May 2000
Jon Craig (Express on Sunday)	5 July 2000

Interviewer name not recorded

In addition, I have had a number of door-step interviews at the MOD with various different broadcast news teams, particularly during May and June when a large number of British troops were deployed to Sierra Leone.

I have also hosted the following press conferences to which a wide range of journalists and broadcasters have been invited:

Press conference subject	Date
Announcement of Eurofighter missile and heavy lift aircraft procurement decisions	16 May 2000
Launch of Defence Estates Strategy	7 June 2000

Military Aircraft Accidents

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many accidents there were in which deceased aircrew were found guilty of gross negligence in aircraft that were not fitted with cockpit voice recorders and flight data recorders since 1980; and what proportion of accidents involving military aircraft this represented. [108491]

Mr. Spellar [pursuant to the reply, 7 February 2000, c. 31W]: I regret that there was an error in the information given. The answer provided was based on an examination of aircraft summaries rather than the original Board of Inquiry reports.

We have now completed a detailed check of the Board of Inquiry reports of the military aircraft accidents from 1 January 1980 to 31 December 1999. There were 486 aircraft accidents and a further 51 personal injury cases involving aircraft within this period. Of the 486 accidents, 317 occurred in the first 10 years. In 20 of the accidents, findings for gross, culpable or serious negligence were made against deceased aircrew in aircraft not fitted with cockpit voice recorders and accident data recorders; 16 of the cases occurred in the first 10 years.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Tax Credits

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many households would be taken off (a) Housing Benefit and (b) Council Tax Benefit in each tenure category if a flat rate housing allowance was introduced for recipients of Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Persons Tax Credit at (i) £10, (ii) £15, (iii) £20, (iv) £25 and (v) £30 per week. [125412]

Angela Eagle: Precise estimates cannot be made because of the uncertain behavioural effects that would result from the introduction of such an allowance. However, we estimate that introducing a flat rate housing allowance of £30 per week for all recipients of the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) would move some claimants off Housing Benefit (HB) in Great Britain in a full year. Assuming that eligible rent in Housing Benefit is reduced by the amount of the housing allowance, the estimated numbers moving off benefit is dependent on the way in which the extra income is treated in the assessment of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit (CTB). The following table gives estimated results based upon either disregarding the housing allowance as income so that claimants do not lose in net income terms, or counting the housing allowance as income so that claimants actually lose in net income terms:

Estimated number of claimants who would be taken-off benefit in 2000–01 under the proposed £30 housing allowance

Thousand

	Housing Benefit	Council Tax Benefit
Housing allowance disregarded	140	0
Housing allowance assessed as income	170	90

Notes:

1. Estimates are based on the Family Resources Survey.
2. There is currently no administrative data to link WFTC receipt with HB or CTB, so estimates based solely on household survey data should be treated as illustrative only.
3. This household sample does not have an adequate sample size or the necessary information on disability to be able to produce corresponding estimates for Disabled Persons Tax Credit. The reduction in the number of recipients of Housing Benefit as a result of introducing the allowance for recipients of Disabled Persons Tax Credit is, however, likely to be small.
4. Some cases taken-off Housing Benefit may also be among those taken off Council Tax Benefit, so totals cannot be summed.
5. Separate estimate for each tenure category are not available.

Housing Benefit

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what would be the gross and net costs of introducing a flat rate housing allowance to single people under retirement age currently in receipt of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit if such an allowance was set at (a) £10, (b) £15, (c) £20, (d) £25 and (e) £30; how many people would be entitled to such an allowance and how many people would be taken off Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit completely in each category (a) to (e); [125413]

(2) if he will estimate the net costs of a flat rate housing allowance, assuming savings on Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit, if such an allowance was set at (a) £10 per week, (b) £15 per week, (c) £20 per week, (d) £25 per week and (e) £30 per week. [125410]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available as introducing a flat rate housing allowance would need to be considered in the context of the employment tax credit. As set out in chapter 3 of the Treasury paper "Tackling Poverty and Making Work Pay—Tax Credits for the 21st Century", we will extend the principle of the Working Families Tax Credit to people without children. The detailed design parameters of the new credits have yet to be finalised.

Pensions

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of people who will be without any pension entitlement on retirement in (a) 2000 and (b) each five year period thereafter to 2050; and if he will make a statement. [127837]

Mr. Rooker: We are working towards a system which will ensure that no one will retire without a pension entitlement.

Minimum Funding Requirement

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 28 June 2000, Official Report, column 533W, on the minimum funding requirement, which organisations he will be considering representations from; when he will make public the report from the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries; and if he will make a statement. [129213]

Mr. Rooker: We intend to publish the report from the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries alongside a consultation document on any proposals for change arising from the review of the minimum funding requirement. We will consider all representations that we receive in response to the consultation.

Disability and Carers Benefits Directorate

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the practice of the Director of the Disability and Carers Benefits Directorate in replying to letters from hon. Members writing on behalf of constituents; and if he personally signs such replies. [130008]

Mr. Bayley: When letters are received from hon. Members, acknowledgements are issued on the day of receipt with a commitment to respond fully within 10 working days. This is in line with the Secretary of State's targets for answering correspondence.

The Director of the Disability and Carer Benefits Directorate personally signs replies unless he is unavailable. A nominated deputy will then reply on his behalf.

Family Credit

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes have taken place in staff and premises since the ending of family credit; and what future changes are planned. [130007]

Angela Eagle: Family Credit was centralised in the North West. Working Families Tax Credit replaced Family Credit from 5 October 1999. At the time, the majority of staff transferred to the Inland Revenue and they continued to use the same premises.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what average time was taken from receipt of application to payment of benefit for family credit; and what was the average number of cases outstanding over the last year of its operation. [130004]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Information on clearance targets

Percentage

Target	Achievement against target (April 1999 to September 1999)
60 per cent. of applications settled within 13 working days	83.7
95 per cent. of applications settled within 42 working days	98.9
90 per cent. of "express" applications settled within five working days	90.1

The average number of Family Credit cases outstanding in Great Britain during year ending September 1999 was 42,000.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on (a) the level of farm gate milk prices and (b) the milk industry, since the breaking up of Milk Marque. [126932]

Ms Quin: The Government recognise the considerable problems currently facing the dairy industry, where a combination of factors have reduced milk prices and had a consequential effect on incomes in the sector over the past two years. It is difficult to predict how the creation of the Milk Marque successor companies will affect milk prices in the longer term. Much will depend on the way in which the new companies are run as well as other factors, such as the sterling/euro exchange rate. It should also be noted that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has announced that the successors to Milk Marque will be able to become involved in processing.

Organic Farmers

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact of Government regulation on Britain's organic farmers. [127167]

Mr. Morley: The Government seek to minimise regulatory burdens where possible and consults the industry on their impact. Standards for organic farming are contained in Regulation (EEC) No. 2092/91. Additionally, the private sector bodies that certify organic farmers are able if they wish to impose standards which go further, and some do. Rigorous production controls are important if public confidence in organic food is to be maintained. It is for producers to decide with which certifier they wish to register.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129044]

Mr. Morley: MAFF is responsible for reporting on the PFI/PPP contract let by the Environment Agency in respect of the Pevensey Bay Sea Defences.

The information requested is as follows:

(a) Date of Commencement—1 June 2000

(b) Contract Value—No private sector capital expenditure will be made throughout the life of the contract.

(c) Subject to refinancing—No

(d) Is there a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing?—No

Crop Contamination

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will compensate organic farmers whose crops and organic status are at risk from contamination by GMOs. [128594]

Mr. Morley: No. Any issue of liability in these circumstances would be a private law matter between the farmer and the person who caused the problem, and farmers would have to take advice on their individual circumstances.

Rod-caught Fish

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the number of angler-caught (a) salmon, (b) grilse and (c) sea trout caught in England in each of the last five years; and what his estimate is of the number of each of these three categories of fish taken by seals in English waters in each of these years. [128827]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The table sets out the figures for rod-caught salmon, grilse and sea trout caught in England in the last five years. The figures include fish caught and released.

Declared rod catch for English waters

Year	Salmon[1]	Grilse[1]	Sea trout
1995	3,202	8,658	16,581
1996	4,066	7,910	16,562
1997	2,441	6,984	16,228
1998	2,152	10,619	23,911
1999[2]	2,686	6,449	22,209

[1] Numbers of salmon and grilse estimated from age/weight keys and the size distribution of fish caught in principal salmon rivers

[2] Provisional figures

No estimate is available of the number of these species of fish taken by seals in English waters. The predominant species targeted by seals are known to be cod, whiting and sandeels. Nationally, salmon, grilse and sea trout form a very small part of seal diet.

Drift Net Fishery

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what his estimate is of the number of (a) salmon, (b) grilse and (c) sea trout taken by the North East drift net fishery in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and what his estimate is of the number and percentage of these fish which were bound for Scottish rivers, indicating also his estimate of the number and percentage which were bound for the River Tweed and its tributaries. [128826]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The table sets out the figures for salmon, grilse and sea trout taken by drift nets in the North East coast fishery in each of the last five years.

Year	Salmon	Grilse	Sea trout
1995	19,101	28,904	29,521
1996	7,465	7,707	13,225
1997	6,305	12,936	12,387
1998	5,985	11,343	11,339
1999	8,523	16,289	15,059

No precise estimates are available for the proportion of these fish that were bound for Scottish rivers or the River Tweed and its tributaries. However, a joint MAFF and Scottish Office report on "Salmon Net Fishers" (1991) estimated that 80 per cent. of the salmon and grilse taken by the total North East coast fishery in 1987–88 were bound for Scottish rivers and that 40 per cent. were bound for the Tweed. The "Report of the Technical Working Group on the English North East Coast Salmon Fishery" (1997) suggested that up to 50 per cent. of the sea trout caught in the North East coast fishery may be bound for Scottish rivers, the majority of these to the Tweed. Based on the above approximate percentages, the estimated numbers of salmon, grilse and sea trout caught in the North East coast fishery in the past five years that were bound for Scottish rivers and the River Tweed and its tributaries are given in the table.

Year	Salmon	Grilse	Sea trout

1995	15,281	23,123	14,761
1996	5,972	6,166	6,613

1998	4,788	9,074	5,670
1999	6,818	13,031	7,530
River Tweed and its tributaries
1995	7,640	11,562	14,761

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which overseas countries supplied the United Kingdom during the last 12 months with (a) beef and (b) lamb for human consumption; what quantities were imported; and if he will make a statement. [129504]

Ms Quin: The table lists the countries supplying beef and lamb products to the UK, for human consumption, from May 1999-April 2000 as recorded by the Overseas Trade Statistics.

Over-30-months Scheme

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the process of rendering animal carcases in destroying prions. [129646]

Ms Quin: The UK has evaluated historical rendering practices by jointly funding, along with the European Commission and European Renderers Association, research work on the effectiveness of rendering systems in inactivating both sheep scrapie and BSE. Both studies have subsequently been published as indicated below, and resulted in consequential changes to European legislation on processing standards.

Organophosphates

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research his Department has evaluated into the effect of the use of the organophosphate pesticide chlorpyrifos on the health of children; what uses are authorised; and at what thresholds. [129993]

Ms Quin: Both the UK and EU systems for regulating pesticides contain routine review programmes of older pesticides to ensure they meet current safety standards. Chlorpyrifos is presently under-review in both the UK and EU review programmes. Both reviews have required the submission of data and research studies by companies wishing to support the compound.

For the UK review 171 toxicology and metabolism studies relevant to the risk posed by chlorpyrifos to the health of people, including children, have been submitted. The Government's scientific evaluation of these studies is currently being examined by the independent experts of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides (ACP) and the Food Standards Agency. Once the Committee's review has been completed, in line with normal practice, a detailed evaluation document listing the studies evaluated and setting out the assessment made by the ACP will be made publicly available.

The European Commission has yet to reach a decision on the European status of chlorpyrifos. The initial evaluation of the safety of the compound carried out by Spain for the Commission is currently being peer reviewed by the relevant experts in the EU member states. The European Commission's review report on chlorpyrifos will be made available to the public once a final decision on the EU status of chlorpyrifos as a pesticide has been taken.

I will write to the hon. Member with the details of the crops, maximum individual doses and maximum number of treatments for those products containing chlorpyrifos approved for use in agriculture, horticulture and amenity use and place copies of my letter in the House Libraries.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much Forestry Commission land has been sold in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [R] [128043]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 28 June 2000]: The subject of the question relates to matters undertaken by Forest Enterprise. I have asked its Chief Executive, Dr. Bob McIntosh, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Bob McIntosh to Mr. Colin Breed, dated July 2000:

I have been asked to reply to your question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about the areas of Forestry Commission land sold in each of the last 10 years.

The following table shows the areas, in hectares, of both forest land and other land sold by the Commission throughout Great Britain.

To year ending 31 March	Forest Land	Buildings and other land	Total
1990	5,559	2,292	7,851
1991	4,770	2,658	7,428
1992	6,263	648	6,911
1993	6,827	3,762	10,589
1994	14,419	531	14,950
1995	10,014	794	10,808
1996	8,217	871	9,088
1997	9,605	1,237	10,842
1998	10,756	1,886	12,642
1999	4,261	1,493	5,754

The Government stopped the large scale sales of forest land by the Commission when they took up office in May 1997. The Commission may now only sell agricultural land, land associated with houses and other buildings, unplantable land and relatively small and isolated blocks of forest land which do not make a significant contribution to its objective and which are surplus to its requirements. The Commission may also sell areas for development where this is in the public interest. Areas of forest land which are important for public access will not be sold unless an access agreement is in place.

Most of the sales in 1997 and 1998 were agreed before May 1997.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129049]

Mr. Hain: The FCO has three significant PFI contracts:

Lease Plan Cars (Public Private Partnership PPP deal)—lease and operate vehicle fleet—value dependent on the number of posts taking up lease-plan option—1996. The lease-plan deal is a PPP arrangement and is not structured in the manner of a standard PFI contract.

Minerva—record retrieval software—value £1.62 million (net presentive value n.p.v.)—1997. The Minerva contract has not been subject to re-financing.

FTN—FCO telecommunications network—value £106 million (n.p.v.)—May 2000.

Berlin—build and operate new Embassy—value £49.8 million (n.p.v.)—June 2000.

Both the Berlin and FTN contracts have only recently commenced.

The FCO does not have a "claw-back" entitlement built in to existing PFI contracts.

BBC World Service

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the BBC World Service online website and its development. [129602]

Mr. Hain: The BBC World Service websites currently receive about 25 million page impressions and audio listens a month. We support the World Service's ambition to develop its online services further, including in some vernacular languages into fully multimedia sites. Provision for the development of such services has been included in the FCO's bid on behalf of the World Service under the 2000 Spending Review.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129640]

Mr. Battle: None.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129622]

Mr. Battle: Two.

Moluccas

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek the establishment of an international fact-finding mission to undertake an impartial investigation into the atrocities in the Moluccas. [129456]

Mr. Battle: We have been deeply disturbed by reports of escalating violence in Maluku. But a solution cannot be imposed from outside. Diplomatic efforts are now focused on pressing the Indonesian Government to take urgent and effective action. I discussed the issue with the Indonesian Ambassador on 3 July. The Head of the Diplomatic Service raised our concerns directly with President Wahid in Jakarta on 4 July. We and others are continuing to urge the Indonesian authorities to redouble their efforts.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Government of Indonesia in respect of the intimidation of Moluccan Christians. [128332]

Mr. Battle: We have been deeply disturbed by reports of escalating violence in Maluku. I discussed the issued with the Indonesian Ambassador on 3 July. The Head of the Diplomatic Service raised our concerns directly with President Wahid in Jakarta on 4 July. We and others are continuing to urge the Indonesian authorities to redouble efforts. The UK has seconded a specialist to work with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to establish mechanisms for managing the international humanitarian response. UNDP dispatched a Humanitarian Co-ordinator on a one week needs assessment visit to Maluku on 9 July.

European Regulations and Directives

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 15 June 2000, Official Report, column 701W, on European directives and regulations, how access to the Celex Database can be obtained; and from what source the information it contains originates. [129610]

Mr. Vaz: Access to the Celex Database can be obtained either by CDROM or via the internet. The information contained in the Database is provided by the European Commission and originates primarily from the Official Journal of the European Communities.

Iran

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to Iran regarding the verdict in the trial of the Jews from Shiraz. [129495]

Mr. Hain: We have made clear to the Iranian authorities our deep concern at the verdicts and sentences passed on 10 Jews and two Muslims on 1 July. We have done so through a public statement issued on 1 July, and on 5 July, both through our Ambassador in Tehran, and here with the Iranian Ambassador to London.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Iranian Government on human rights in that country; and if he will make a statement. [129514]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We and our EU partners regularly press the Iranian authorities over our concerns about certain human rights issues in Iran. On each of the three occasions that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has met his Iranian counterpart Dr. Kamal Kharrazi, human rights have featured prominently in their discussions. I too discussed our concerns with Deputy Foreign Minister Sarmadi during his visit to the UK in March.

In addition, we regularly raise our concerns through our Ambassador in Tehran and the Iranian Ambassador to London.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what talks he has had with human rights organisations regarding the sentencing of the Iranian Jews convicted of espionage. [129675]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We have maintained regular contact with a number of concerned organisations, including the Board of Deputies of British Jews and the Inter-Parliamentary Council Against Anti-Semitism on this case.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to visit Iran. [129676]

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contact he has had with other EU Governments regarding the sentencing of the Iranian Jews for espionage. [129677]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We and our EU partners have been in regular contact throughout the detention and subsequent trial on espionage charges of the 13 members of the Shiraz Jewish community and eight Muslims. A statement expressing the deep concern of all EU member states at the sentencing of 10 of the Jewish defendants and two of the Muslim defendants was issued shortly after the verdicts were announced on 1 July.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Iranian Government following the sentencing of the Iranian Jews. [129715]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We have made clear to the Iranian authorities our deep concern at the verdicts and sentences passed on 10 Jews and two Muslims on 1 July. We have done so through a public statement issued on 1 July, and on 5 July, both through our Ambassador in Tehran, and here with the Iranian Ambassador to London.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Pakistan concerning the timetable for the return to democracy. [129592]

Mr. Hain: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) on 27 June 2000, Official Report, columns 446-47W.

Charter of Fundamental Rights

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his role in formulating the first draft of the Charter of Fundamental Rights at the start of the German Presidency of the Council of Ministers; and if he will deposit the text of that draft in the Library. [129821]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) (the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office) gave him on 17 June 1999, Official Report, column 226W.

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 6 December 1999, Official Report, column 405W.

India

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Indian Government concerning the recent violence against Christians in India. [129661]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised our concerns over attacks on religious minorities with the Indian Home Minister, L. K. Advani, during this visit to London in June. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary also discussed freedom of religion with the Indian Minister for External Affairs, Jaswant Singh, during his visit to India in April. We will continue to make our concerns known.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received of attacks on Christians and their places of worship in (a) Uttar Pradesh, (b) Andhra Pradesh, (c) Karnataka and (d) Goa in India. [129520]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We are aware of attacks on Christians in India, including the murder of a Brother George Kuzhikandham in Uttar Pradesh and the bomb attacks on churches in Karnataka, Goa and Andhra Pradesh in June. We regularly raise our concerns over incidents of religious intolerance with the Indian Government. We will continue to monitor the situation closely.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the Bill in Uttar Pradesh introducing restrictions on the use and construction of places of worship in India; and what representations he has made to the Indian Government. [129710]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We are aware of the Uttar Pradesh Religious Places Bill. Although we have not discussed the Bill with the Indian Government, we have regularly raised our concerns over incidents of religious intolerance in India. The Indian authorities can be in no doubt about our commitment to freedom of religion and the rights of minorities.

Security and Defence Policy

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Council's legal opinion on whether the Cologne and Helsinki councils' decisions regarding security and defence policy require treaty amendments. [129924]

Mr. Vaz: The Presidency report to the Feira European Council on strengthening the common European security and defence policy took note of the opinion of the Council Legal Service. The Government joined other member states in adopting the report by consensus at the Feira European Council. The issue of Treaty change will continue to be examined between the Feira and Nice European Councils.

Currency Transactions

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the 24 Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly on Social Development, with particular reference to the conclusions concerning the possible taxation of international currency transactions. [129286]

Mr. Hain: The Special Session of the General Assembly, following up the World Summit for Social Development, protected the commitments made by governments in Copenhagen five years ago and identified some new, forward-looking initiatives. One such initiative is an analysis of proposals for developing new and innovative sources of funding for social development.

EU Accession

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited each of the states currently engaged in accession negotiations with the EU. [129781]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary last visited the following countries currently engaged in accession negotiations on the dates shown:

Country	Date
Bulgaria	19–20 October 1998
Czech Republic	27–28 November 1997
Estonia	26 July 1999
Hungary	26 November 1997
Poland	28 November 1997
Romania	21–22 October 1998
Slovakia	6 March 2000
Slovenia	23 November 1998

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary also visited Turkey, which is a candidate for EU membership, on 18–19 November 1999. He plans to visit Hungary on 25 July and the Czech Republic on 26 July. Of the other countries in negotiation for EU membership, I myself have just returned from a visit to Malta on 5–6 July and plan to visit Latvia and Lithuania in the autumn. I have also visited Hungary on 18–19 October and Poland on 19–20 October last year.

Animal Experiments

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to consult British embassies about animal experimentation overseas. [129780]

Mr. Hain: Our Embassies continue to monitor the development of science policy in their host countries. I have no plans to consult Embassies about animal experimentation overseas.

Euro (Leaked Telegram)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Ministers in his Department were informed of the leaking of the telegram from the British Ambassador to Japan on the Government's euro policy; and if he will take steps to establish how this document was made public. [129442]

Mr. Battle: Ministers were first informed of the leak in the late afternoon of Monday 3 July. An inquiry is under way.

Financial Bodies

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total cost to public funds so far of Her Majesty's Government participation in the (a) Financial Action Task Force and (b) Financial Stability Forum. [126755]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

Her Majesty's Government have, since 1997, paid £75,429.87 in subscription towards the UK's membership of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF). The subscription for 2000 is approximately £25,000. Information for previous years is not readily available. FATF meetings are attended by officials from HM Treasury, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Home Office, HM Customs and Excise and the Financial Services Authority. Details of costs incurred from travel and accommodation resulting from participating at FATF meetings could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Costs incurred by Her Majesty's Government to date in participating in the Financial Stability Forum, consisting of travel costs, accommodation costs, and subsistence are £23,677.59. These costs were incurred in attending the three meetings of the Financial Stability Forum, and also through HM Treasury's participation in the Financial Stability Forum's working group on Offshore Centres.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Roads and Highways SSA

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the standard spending assessment relating to roads and other highways for each English county for (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99, (d) 1999–2000 and (e) 2000–01 (i) in total cash terms and (ii) as a percentage of the standard spending assessment; and if he will make a statement. [125719]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information has been placed in the Library.

GMOs

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the current contracts between his Department and the Central Science Laboratory that are connected with GMOs. [128066]

Mr. Meacher: The Department does not as such have any contracts with the Central Science Laboratory because they are an Agency of Government and Government cannot enforce a contract with themselves. CSL are, however, currently working for my Department on three projects:

Project

1. Research to assess possible environment risks of GM plants grown in containment.
2. Monitoring gene-flow within the fields of the farm-scale evaluations and to neighbouring crops.
3. Inspection and enforcement relating to the deliberate release and marketing of GMOs.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129101]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Since the New Deal programme commenced, the number of people recruited through New Deal DETR (Central) is 14 and its executive agencies is 23. This represents 0.3 per cent. and 0.1 per cent. of the total staff respectively. The number of New Deal staff in DETR (Central) and its executive agencies shown as a percentage of posts at a level recommended for New Deal staff is 1.5 per cent. and 0.5 per cent. respectively.

The Department is actively looking to increase these numbers by further recruitment exercises in the coming months.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the cost of consultants employed by each of the regional development agencies to date; and what is the projected expenditure over the next two years. [128899]

Ms Beverley Hughes: In 1999–2000, the first full year of the RDAs' operations, the estimated expenditure on directly-employed consultants was less than 1 per cent. of their total budget, as follows:

One NorthEast	910
Northwest Development Agency	1,960
Yorkshire Forward	1,040
East Midlands Development Agency	1,550
Advantage West Midlands	950
East of England Development Agency	350
South East Development Agency	680
South West Development Agency	290
Total	7,730

Estimates for expenditure on consultants for 2000–01 and 2001–02 are not available.

Migration

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the proportion of the demand for new housing which arises from population migration (a) between the English regions and (b) from London to other parts of the South East. [128866]

Mr. Raynsford: No explicit estimates are made about the proportion of the demand for new housing that arises from population migration. Trend-based household projects are just one of the considerations taken into account. These are derived from trend-based population projections that contain assumptions about inter-area migration. The migration assumptions are set out in Table 6 of the Office for National Statistics 1996-based Sub-national population projections, England, Series PP3 No. 10, published by TSO.

However, this publication does not include information on migration flows between specific areas. The Office for National Statistics has therefore provided the additional information on projected migration in relation to the South East Planning Region, given in the table.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128987]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department's purchasing policy is based on achieving best value for money, taking into account whole life cost and quality. In determining what represents best value for money, the leasing option is considered.

The Department does not have an approved list of manufacturers of cars and commercial vehicles. It uses various supply and leasing contracts awarded by itself and other Government Departments as a result of competitive tender processes appropriate to the value of each contract.

The Department also makes use of the Government Car Service (GCS).

Marine Pollution

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the matters discussed and decided upon at the OSPAR meeting on Control of Marine Pollution in the North East Atlantic, held in Copenhagen on 26 to 30 June; and if he will place in the Library a report of the meeting. [128861]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 3 July 2000]: At its annual meeting in Copenhagen last week, the OSPAR Commission adopted, by consensus, a programme for more detailed work on the implementation of the OSPAR Commission's strategy on radioactive substances. This provides for the adoption of national plans, the submission of detailed forecasts of how the elimination or reduction of radioactive substances from both nuclear and non-nuclear sources will be achieved, in order to meet the OSPAR 2020 goal on radioactive discharges, emissions and losses, and to enable the Commission to develop a collective oversight of progress towards this goal.

The OSPAR Commission finalised a first and essential step in the implementation of its long-term strategy on hazardous substances. As a result, twelve new hazardous substances were added to the OSPAR List of Chemicals for priority action.

The Commission also adopted several measures to control chemicals from both offshore and land-based sources, including the setting of a new international standard for the regulation of the use and discharge of offshore chemicals and drilling fluids.

Under the strategy to combat eutrophication, the OSPAR Commission agreed which areas of the North East Atlantic do not present eutrophication problems, adopted on a trial basis guidelines for evaluating nutrient inputs to the sea, and put in hand work on comprehensive assessments of the areas where there are, or may be, eutrophication problems.

The Commission adopted and launched the Quality Status Report on the whole of the North East Atlantic, the "QSR 2000". This report, together with reports covering the five regions of the OSPAR maritime area, is the first review of the health of the North East Atlantic in such detail.

The OSPAR Commission also finished reviewing its working methods and established a new organisational structure, to keep the effective implementation of its five long-term strategies and the effective follow-up to the QSR 2000.

Twelve OSPAR states adopted a decision requiring a review of nuclear processing in preventing accidental pollution. Although the UK drew attention to its recently published draft national discharge strategy, all the OSPAR states except France supported the decision, and the UK and France abstained.

I am arranging for copies of the Summary Record of the Commission's meeting to be placed in the Library when it becomes available.

Connex

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the dispute affecting Connex's trains on its ability to meet agreed performance targets. [129305]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director is responsible for monitoring the performance of train operating companies. He publishes the results of his monitoring in his "On Track" report, available in the House Library. This shows that the punctuality and reliability of Connex services has been affected by the dispute. The report also explains that incentives are given to operators to handle disruptions in a planned way.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will provide local authorities with the detailed arrangements for creating arm's-length companies and for raising levels of investment in their housing stock. [129260]

Mr. Raynsford: We outlined in the Housing Green Paper proposals to allow authorities which have set up arm's-length companies to manage their housing stock and demonstrate high standards to invest more of their rental income in their stock. As the Green Paper promised, we will be working with the Local Government Association and others to work up the proposals in greater detail over the coming months. We will consult on our proposals later this year and have guidance in place in the early part of 2001.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how long it will take local authorities to invest in their housing stock through the creation of arm's-length companies; what assessment he has made of the contribution this will make in tackling the investment backlog in local authority housing within five years; and if he will make a statement. [129259]

Mr. Raynsford: The additional resources to be made available for authorities which have set up arm's-length companies to manage their housing stock and demonstrate high standards will be announced as part of the Spending Review. We expect that the first year in which the new regime will operate will be 2002–03. In the meantime, authorities considering this option will need to undertake detailed preparation to enable them to meet the demanding criteria which will apply. Our overall aim, set out in the Housing Green Paper, is to ensure that all social housing reaches a decent standard within 10 years.

Light Railway Systems

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to fund (a) tram and (b) light railway systems as part of urban regeneration schemes; and if he will make a statement. [129307]

Mr. Hill: Tram and light rail systems can have an important role to play in delivering integrated transport in major conurbations. Decisions on whether to provide central Government support for tram and light rail systems are taken on a case-by-case basis on the merits of the particular scheme. Where systems cannot be funded entirely from local sources or by the private sector, promoters must demonstrate that their scheme provides good value for money and forms an essential part of a local transport plan, and that the objectives of that plan cannot be met in other ways. In the Department's appraisal process, the wider economic impacts of a particular scheme, including any regeneration benefits are considered.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129642]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Touch tone telephone steering systems are used in a number of the Department's agencies, to a varying degree. These are:

The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA)—approximately 343 lines

The Driving Standards Agency (DSA)—up to 300 lines

Vehicle Inspectorate (VI) are piloting a national number in Scotland that is likely to be rolled out nationwide in October 2000

Vehicle Certification Agency (VCA)—5 lines available

Highways Agency—the Information line, which can handle up to 15 calls simultaneously.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129624]

Ms Beverley Hughes: DETR(C) have four telephone lines available to members of the public which offer the opportunity to redirect their call using a touch tone system. These are:

The Mobility Unit—to order literature about disabled access

Orange Badge System—to order leaflets and application forms

Biotechnology Unit—to request information about the public register

Vehicle Import Advice Line—to request booklets.

Rights of Way

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what additional funding he will make available to local authorities for work on the rights of way network consequent upon the Countryside and Rights of Way Bill. [129402]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 6 July 2000]: Local authorities will be properly and reasonably funded for additional rights of way tasks. The funding expected to be required as a result of the Countryside and Rights of Way Bill is identified in the explanatory notes that accompany the Bill as between £12 million and £19 million per annum. We shall determine the exact sums to be made available in the next three years in the light of the outcome of the current spending review.

Animal Rendering

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what environmental controls are applicable to the process of rendering animal carcases; and which organisation is responsible for them. [129647]

Mr. Hill: Animal rendering plants are regulated by local authorities under the air pollution control regime established by Part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Where aqueous discharges arise the discharges are regulated by the Environment Agency under the Water Resources Act 1991.

Animal rendering plants will be subject to integrated pollution control under the Pollution Prevention and Control Act 1999 when it applies as set out in the draft Pollution Prevention and Control (England and Wales) Regulations 2000. It is envisaged under the regulations that local authorities will be the regulators, subject to the Environment Agency having power to specify emission limit values or conditions to prevent or reduce emissions into water.

Planning

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress he has made in determining the division of responsibilities for planning matters between (a) county and unitary councils, (b) district councils and (c) the proposed South Downs National Park. [129685]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We have asked the Countryside Agency to look at the detailed arrangements for handling planning matters for the proposed new National Park in the South Downs. They have established a working group who are now examining options for the division of responsibilities between existing authorities and any new National Park Authority. The Agency will be consulting locally on these options before advising Ministers on what they consider to be the most appropriate arrangements.

Coastal Resorts

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent steps his Department has taken to (a) help regenerate coastal resorts and (b) improve bathing water quality. [129951]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We are continuing to address the needs of disadvantaged areas, including coastal resorts, though our regeneration programmes. Recent steps include:

Running Round 6 of the Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) where 20 per cent. of new SRB resources are targeted on areas, including coastal towns, which are outside the most deprived districts. Bids for resources are currently being considered for schemes commencing summer 2000 onwards. Round 2 of the New Deal for Communities (NDC) also includes assistance to some coastal towns;

Enabling more coastal resorts to be eligible to receive European Structural Funds. The 2000–06 Objective 1 programmes for South Yorkshire, Cornwall and Merseyside are expected to be formally approved shortly. The Commission formally approved the Objective 2 map for 2000–2006 programmes on 30 March. This includes more coastal areas than before. The Objective 2 programmes are currently under negotiation and we expect them to be approved before the end of the year;

Securing substantial additional investment by water companies to raise bathing water compliance with the normal EU quality standard to 97 per cent. by 2005 and to help more resorts reach the higher standard needed to gain 'Blue Flag' status.

EU Flags

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers are available to local authorities to restrict the flying of EU flags on public buildings. [129757]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The European flag may be flown provided planning permission for the flagstaff has been granted and express consent to fly the flag (under the separate arrangements for control of advertisements) has been given by the local planning authority. A Crown body that wishes to undertake development that would otherwise require planning permission, or express consent to display an advertisement, follows the non-statutory arrangements set out in part IV of DOE Circular 18/84. On 29 June I announced proposals to amend the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1992. One of the proposed amendments is to allow the European flag to be flown from a flagstaff without having to apply to the local planning authority for permission to do so. National flags already benefit from this exemption.

Affordable Homes

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimates he has made of the number of new affordable homes required to meet demand; what plans he has to increase the provision of affordable houses; and if he will make a statement. [129796]

Mr. Raynsford: While the Government have from time to time commissioned studies of the extent and nature of housing need to inform our views on the requirement for affordable housing in England, we believe that neither national nor regional estimates can adequately reflect the wide diversity of needs and priorities which exist at the local level. For these reasons the Government believe that local authorities are best placed to carry our robust assessments of housing need in their areas.

This Government are already making available an additional £5 billion for investment in housing over the life of this Parliament. Much of this is spent on tackling the repairs backlog, but local authorities are able to use these resources to invest in additional affordable housing, where this best meets local needs and priorities. In addition, local authorities have powers to require affordable homes to be provided as part of new developments.

Future levels of provision to fund affordable housing will be announced on completion of the Spending Review.

First Place Housing

Sir David Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason First Place Housing of Tavistock Street, Dunstable have been refused a further grant from his Department; and if he will make a statement. [129312]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 7 July 2000]: My Department offered First Place Housing a grant this year towards the costs of their outreach service. They decided however to forgo this grant and discontinue this area of their work. First Place Housing then bid for a grant under the new Special Innovation Fund. The Fund was significantly oversubscribed and we had to make some very tough choices, which has led to a large number of organisations being disappointed—many of which, like First Place Housing, had submitted proposals for worthwhile projects.

Houses (Multiple Occupancy)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to introduce compulsory licensing for homes in multiple occupancy. [129531]

Mr. Raynsford: We plan to introduce a licensing system for houses in multiple occupancy as soon as Parliamentary time can be found for the necessary primary legislation.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many homes in multiple occupancy there are in (a) Coventry, (b) the West Midlands and (c) the UK. [129532]

Mr. Raynsford: Information given to my Department by local authorities indicates that there are 1,000 houses in multiple occupation in Coventry, and 15,441 in the West Midlands. The English House Condition Survey indicates a figure of 525,000 for England. My Department does not hold information concerning houses in multiple occupation in Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland.

Household Statistics

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the projected number of households in each five year period for each county and metropolitan area between 1996 and 2021, assuming zero net internal migration. [129751]

Ms Beverley Hughes: This information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on (a) the scale of net regional population migration assumed in its projected level of household formations proposed for the current trend of draft regional planning guidance and (b) the assumed scale of migration underlying the figures published by the Office for National Statistics in the sub-national population projections; [129749]

(2) what scale of net regional population migration is assumed in the projected level of household formation proposed for the current round of draft regional planning guidance (a) in each of the eight English regions and (b) for the spatial development plan for London. [129748]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Household projections are just one of the considerations taken into account in determining likely housing requirements. No explicit assumptions about population migration are made in considering draft regional planning guidance.

One of the inputs into the household projections is the sub-national population projections. These contain assumptions about inter-area migration. The migration assumptions for each area are set out in Table 6 of the Office for National Statistics 1996-based Sub-national population projections, England, Series PP3 No. 10, published by TSO.

This publication does not include information on migration flows between regions. The Office for National Statistics will be making some additional information available on these flows, shortly. I will write to my hon. Friend once this statistical information has been derived.

Rail Freight

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what will be the (a) initial and (b) longer-term cargo-deck heights on the sprinter trains proposed by the winner of the recent rail freight competition; and if the layout of their longer-term sprinter-train design has been finalised. [129997]

Mr. Hill: The deck-height of the Railtrack MPVC (multi-purpose vehicle container) used in the trials is 120 mm and of the intermediate container flats 100 mm. Further development of the Multi-Purpose Vehicle into a freight Multiple Unit will be on the basis of a 1100 mm deck-height.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the target date is for having new road-rail equipment and systems in-service to allow containers arriving at docks to reach their final destinations by rail. [129998]

Mr. Hill: 9' 6" deep sea containers can be conveyed on most rail routes today. The shadow Strategic Rail Authority is developing a routing and gauge enhancement strategy with Railtrack intended to permit the carriage of 9' 6" high ISO containers on the network in the forecast over the next 20 years. The implementation of the various stages of this plan will be flexible.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what will be the maximum cargo height on the piggyback trailer systems that have been proposed by the winner of the recent rail freight competition. [129996]

Mr. Hill: The maximum cargo-height will be 3.4 m permitting the conveyance of the semi-trailer of 9' 6" ISO containers in the wagon pockets or a C45 Swapbody over SB1-c cleared routes. SB1-c is Swapbody clearance agreement version c. This is an agreement between freight operators and the Channel Tunnel operators concerning maximum dimensions for swapbody containers which will be conveyed through the channel tunnel and also on such internal rail lines within Great Britain as have been cleared to that standard.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for which loading gauges the piggyback trains that have been proposed by the winner of the recent rail freight competition will be suitable. [129999]

Mr. Hill: The piggyback trailer on the multi-modal wagon will conform to the Railtrack W6A loading gauge, enabling it to run over most of the rail network.

Transport Council

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the outcome of the Transport Council held in Luxembourg on 26 to 27 June; and what plans there are to make EASA a European Community agency. [130000]

Mr. Hill: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 5 July 2000, Official Report, columns 181–83W to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), which described the outcome of the Council. There was a debate on the establishment of a European Aviation Safety Authority, at the end of which the Council asked the commission to produce a formal proposal for a community agency.

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the software that failed at West Drayton Air Traffic Control Centre on 17 June was installed; and if he will make a statement. [130009]

Mr. Hill: The software which failed on 17 June was a Flight Data Processing System known as the National Airspace System (NAS). The current software version was introduced in January 2000, with an interim upgrade in April 2000. In addition to this, the system's database and configuration parameters are modified each month. Until June this year, this software version had continued the excellent track record of reliability established by the NAS system in recent years.

The failure was cleared by reverting to a previous version of the software and as an additional precautionary measure a system message was input which actively prevented the system from exercising the faulty code sequence. Subsequently a permanent software design solution was devised, tested, and successfully installed. This has enabled National Air Traffic Services Ltd. (NATS) to restore capacity levels in the key Scottish sectors which carry a substantial amount of North Atlantic traffic.

EU Galileo Project

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the share of the capital cost of the EU Galileo project that will fall to the UK taxpayer; and if he will make a statement. [129994]

Mr. Hill: The costs of the Galileo project would depend on decisions taken by the Council of Ministers on the project later in the year. The Government have not made an independent estimate of the costs, but the European Commission's current estimate of the capital cost is 3 billion euro for the period 2000–08, of which an estimated 1.25 billion euro would be provided by member states through European Community Programmes and the European Space Agency (ESA). The UK makes its contributions to the EU budget as a whole, not to specific programmes. We estimate that the UK share of the EU budget is around 18 per cent. The UK is contributing about 7 million euro to ESA's work on the definition phase of Galileo. A decision on whether to proceed to the development phase of Galileo may be taken by the December Transport Council. No decision has yet been made as to the UK's contribution to ESA's share of the development costs.

Rail Safety

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to include the safety issue of gaps between railway station platforms and trains, in the criteria for obtaining future train operating franchises. [129435]

Mr. Hill: The Deputy Prime Minister has asked the Franchising Director to evaluate bids for replacement franchises against the following criteria: commitment to secure better performance and customer services, the extent to which extra or earlier investment can be secured, the extent to which passengers will be given a greater voice in the level and standard of services, and value for money to the taxpayer. The Franchising Director will look to bidders to provide better access to the network, particularly for those with limited mobility and disabilities. Bidders will be encouraged to consult interested stakeholders, including local authorities and Rail Passengers' Committees, giving them the opportunity to raise issues which they would like to see addressed.

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to ensure that warning signs are provided at stations where there is a large gap between the railway station platform and the train. [129436]

Mr. Hill: Railtrack, as infrastructure controller, is responsible for the safe operation of its platforms. The Health and Safety Executive's (HSE's) Railway Inspectorate (HMRI) publish "Railway Safety Principles and Guidance" which, among other things, sets acceptable stepping criteria between trains and platforms. In areas where there is a large gap between the railway platform and the train, warning notices reading 'Mind the Gap' with hatching along the platform edge, or other agreed measures such as public announcements, may be required.

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in how many railway stations there is distance between the platform and the train which exceeds 250 mm vertically, 275 mm horizontally and 350 mm diagonally. [129437]

Mr. Hill: The records held by the Health and Safety Executive's (HSE's) Railway Inspectorate (HMRI) are insufficiently detailed to provide information on locations where gaps may exceed particular dimensions. However, Railtrack have acknowledged that at 76 per cent. of their 2,454 stations there are one or more platforms that do not comply with the specifications for acceptable stepping criteria between trains and platforms as set out in HMRI's "Railway Safety Principles and Guidance". Railtrack is developing a strategy of identifying and dealing with these on a prioritised basis. HSE is monitoring progress.

Flood Defence

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the (a) percentage and (b) actual increase in the amount of money provided by the Department for Flood Defence to Devon county council through the standing spending assessment in each of the last three years. [130001]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The changes in Flood Defence Standard Spending Assessments for the last three years for Devon county council are as follows:

£ million

Year	Percentage change in SSA	Actual change in SSA
2000–01	+3.1	0.108
1999–2000	+1.7	0.059
1998–99[1]	−31.6	−1.567

[1] As from 1 April 1998 Devon CC area was reduced following the creation of Plymouth and Torbay unitary authorities. If the 1998–99 Flood Defence SSAs for Plymouth and Torbay are added to the 1998–99 Devon CC figure then the results would be (a) -0.7 per cent.

(b) -£0.037 million.

Radon

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assistance his Department is giving to householders and local authorities in areas where the radioactive gas radon is a problem. [130214]

Mr. Meacher: Following the success of three pilot studies to encourage and assist householders to carry out radon remedial works, I am pleased to announce that we are embarking on a new programme in partnership with 31 local authorities from the areas most affected by radon.

The radon measurement programme, carried out by successive Governments since 1987, has meant that every home in England with a greater than 5 per cent. probability of being above the radon 'Action Level' has been offered a Government-funded radon test. In total, some 40,000 homes have now been found to be above the radon Action Level. However, only 10–20 per cent. of these households have taken any action to reduce radon levels in their homes. Radon is a naturally occurring, radioactive gas. Without proper action to lower levels in the home it can add to the risk of lung cancer.

To encourage action, DETR, with the support of the Department of Health, has been working in partnership with Derbyshire Dales, Cherwell and Mendip district councils in pilot studies to encourage and assist householders to carry out remedial work. In this new approach the local authority has been the main point of contact with householders, supported in the background by Central Government Departments.

The pilot studies have been very successful both in terms of the numbers of householders seeking advice and the numbers that have subsequently gone on to carry out remedial work. I should like to pay tribute to the enthusiasm, commitment and hard work of the three local authorities involved.

The 31 local authorities listed in the table, which all have areas within their districts with notable levels of radon, responded to the Department's invitation to work in partnership with us to extend the approach used in the pilot studies to other parts of the country.

In order to assist these authorities, and other with a radon problem, we have produced a "Good Practice Guide" based on the lessons learned and the experience gained in the pilot studies. This guidance has been made available in draft to all of the authorities involved in the new programme, and is being published today. I have arranged for copies to be deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

Competitiveness

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the recent report by Cardiff University on the effect of the Government's regional development policies on competitiveness differentials between regions. [129834]

Ms Beverley Hughes: A central plank of the Government's economic policy is to improve the competitiveness of our regions. That is why we set up the Regional Development Agencies (RDAs), to address the disparities which had been allowed to grow within and between the regions under the previous administration. The RDAs have made an excellent start—securing thousands of jobs, as well as providing new work sites, promoting regeneration and reclaiming derelict sites. We are also looking to strengthen their role as economic drivers, and have embarked on a package of measures to ensure our regions have the skills and knowledge needed to compete successfully in the modern global marketplace.

Advantage West Midlands

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure the effective management of Advantage West Midlands; and if he will make a statement. [129783]

Ms Beverley Hughes: On Friday 30 June, the contract of Advantage West Midlands' Chief Executive, Tony Cassidy, was ended by mutual consent.

To ensure effective management, Advantage West Midlands will now seek to recruit a replacement. They have also arranged for the post to be filled on a temporary basis by John Edwards, Regeneration Director of Advantage West Midlands, and previously Chief Executive of the Rural Development Commission.

The Chief Executive of any non-departmental public body (NDPB) is accountable to the board. The position of the Chief Executive, and of any employee of an RDA, is an internal matter for that RDA.

I am confident that the Board and the Chairman are working in the best interests of the West Midlands.

WALES

Motor Industry

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he is pursuing to safeguard jobs in the motor components industry which may be under threat from the sale of Rover; and if he will make a statement. [121727]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I remain in close contact with all stakeholders to ensure Welsh interests are considered.

The acquisition of Rover by the Phoenix consortium, which plans to maintain volume car production of existing models at Longbridge offers a welcome outcome for suppliers of the motor components industry.

The Wales Task Force has prepared a study on the possible impact on the Welsh automotive industry and is also undertaking a long-term strategy to improve competitiveness of the industry over the next five years. This was considered by the Economic Development Committee of the National Assembly for Wales on 6 July, who gave their approval. The Welsh Task Force will now concentrate on implementing the recommendations made in the report, through the establishment of a Project Management Board.

NHS Waiting Lists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning NHS waiting lists, with particular reference to those waiting over a year; and if he will make a statement. [126974]

Mr. Hanson: Both I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State meet regularly with the Assembly First Secretary and the Assembly Health Secretary to discuss the Health Service in Wales.

The subject of waiting lists is, of course, of concern to us all and is therefore often included in our conversations.

In March, the Government announced an additional £1,299 million for Wales over four years as a consequence of increases in the NHS budget for England. The Assembly has decided this will all be spent on health in Wales and has invested £40 million from this year's allocation to help reduce waiting lists and address emergency pressures. In addition, they have recently set strict targets for Health Authorities to meet.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which companies or partnerships have seconded staff to his Department since May 1997; how many have been seconded; and who pays for seconded staff. [128469]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department has paid for three secondees since May 1997, one from Chestertons Property Consultants, one from Eversheds, and one from King Sturge.

Information is not held centrally on secondees in all instances where their company continues to fund the employee themselves. There have been two secondees from Barclays Bank, and one from BT, where those companies have paid for their own staff, but there may be others who have not been recorded centrally.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code. [129162]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

New Deal

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the New Deal for lone parents; and if he will make a statement. [129502]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular discussions with the First Secretary on a range of UK Government policies including the New Deal.

The New Deal for Lone Parents was piloted in Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan from July 1997 and implemented countrywide in October 1998. To the end of March 2000, about 10,800 lone parents in Wales had attended an initial interview. More than 10,000 of these (93 per cent.) agreed to participate in the scheme, which provides advice and guidance on finding and retaining suitable work.

To date, some 3,600 lone parents in Wales have secured jobs through the New Deal.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Lone Parents

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent measures have been introduced to help lone parents achieve a better balance between work and family life. [127244]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 29 June 2000]: The Government's work-life balance campaign was launched by the Prime Minister on 9 March. Work-life balance describes any set of policies and practices that both help people to achieve better balance between work and their lives outside work and benefit the business.

The campaign aims to increase the number of employers who adopt work-life policies and practices. By introducing flexible working policies employers can increase job opportunities and recruit from a wider pool, especially from those with caring responsibilities, such as lone parents, or those with disabilities.

The discussion document "Changing Patterns in a Changing World" describes how we will take the campaign forward in partnership with an alliance of 22 leading businesses committed to promoting the business benefits of work-life balance. Our campaign builds on and complements the work of the National Work Life Forum.

Last month we invited employers to apply for our new £2.25 million Work-Life Balance Challenge Fund. Successful applicants will receive free consultancy advice about implementing flexible policies which improve both their business and help their employees balance work and the rest of their lives.

New Deal

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many participants from Dumfries and Galloway in (a) the New Deal for 18–24 year olds and (b) the New Deal for 25 year olds and over have returned to (i) Jobseeker's Allowance, (ii) other benefits and (iii) unsubsidised employment through the New Deal. [128468]

Ms Jowell: Latest figures to end April 2000 for the categories requested in Dumfries and Galloway are set out as follows. However, they are expressed as leavers from New Deal rather than returners as everyone starting either of the New Deals is already claiming Jobseeker's Allowance. We cannot therefore describe them as returning to other benefits or unsubsidised employment.

Leavers	New Deal 18–24	New Deal 25+
Jobseeker's Allowance	178	446
Other benefits	116	71
Unsubsidised employment	379	68

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people are eligible for the guaranteed minimum take home pay of £170 per week under the New Deal for the over 50s (a) nationally, (b) on Teesside and (c) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128638]

Ms Jowell: New Deal 50-plus is a major new programme of personal advice, support and financial help for people over 50 who are looking for work. The programme is aimed at unemployed and economically inactive people in receipt of benefit for six months or more and their dependent partners. The table shows those people who are directly eligible for New Deal 50-plus. However, in addition dependent partners of these benefit recipients will also be eligible, as will be men aged 60–65 receiving National Insurance credits automatically.

The £170 minimum income guarantee applies to those people going into full-time work and additionally receiving the Employment Credit of £60 per week. It is not possible to say how many people will be eligible for the Employment Credit but our assumption is that about 90 per cent. of those that apply will be eligible.

Income Support, Jobseekers Allowance, Incapacity Benefit and Severe Disablement Allowance recipients aged 50 or over with a current claim duration of six months or more, as at February 2000

1. Numbers marked ' 'are based on very few sample cases and are subject to a high degree of sampling error. These figures should be used as a guide to the current situation only.

2. Income Support figures exclude claimants who also receive IB/SDA.

3. IB and SDA figures exclude those persons receiving National Insurance Credits only.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many young people have found (a) non-subsidised jobs and (b) education, training or work experience through the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds, (i) nationally, (ii) on Teesside and (iii) in the constituency of Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East; and if he will make a statement. [128641]

Ms Jowell: The latest information, to the end of April 2000, is shown in the table. This sets out the number of unsubsidised jobs taken by young people through the

New Deal and those who have benefited from education, training or work experience opportunities on the New Deal options.

New Deal for Young People

Great Britain	191,360	168,900
Teesside	3,914	4,083
Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East	468	550

We are on target to meet our manifesto commitment to help 250,000 young people into jobs through the New Deal. At the end of April we had reached a total of 216,200.

Jobcentres

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the estimated capital value of jobcentre sites in the United Kingdom. [129087]

Ms Jowell: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. John Bercow, dated 10 July 2000:

As the Employment Service is an executive agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning the estimated value of the Jobcentre sites in the United Kingdom. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The network of roughly 1000 Employment Service Jobcentres operates in a mixture of freehold and leasehold premises. All Jobcentres in freehold and long leasehold property are subject to a rolling programme of professional valuation. The results of this are collated annually and shown as 'Land and Buildings' in the Employment Service Annual Report and Accounts. The latest audited accounts are for the year 1998–99. These show the total value of Employment Service Land and Buildings as at 31 March 1999 to be just under £122m.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what guidance he issues to Jobcentres about preventing persons not lawfully entitled to work in the United Kingdom having access to their services; and if he will make a statement; [128921]

(2) what checks Jobcentres are required to undertake (a) generally and (b) prior to reference to an employment agency in order to ensure that persons seeking employment are allowed to work in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [128924]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. David Lidington, dated 10 July 2000:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about ensuring that persons seeking employment in the United Kingdom are entitled to do so.

Permission to work in the United Kingdom is a matter for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate of the Home Office. While Jobcentres do have advice available to them on which groups of jobseekers from outside the UK are entitled to work in the UK, it would not be practical for them to undertake nationality checks given the fact that they make some 20 million job submissions annually. It is the responsibility of employers to ensure that jobseekers have permission to work.

Employment Service guidance to Jobcentres states that non-EEA (European Economic Area) jobseekers are not entitled to obtain work in the UK without a work permit. It advises staff to pass inquiries to the Immigration and Nationality Directorate. Similarly, vacancies advertised via the Employment Service website carry a statement which makes clear that the vacancies are not open to non-EEA jobseekers.

I hope this is helpful.

Examination Scheduling

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has made to awarding bodies concerning the scheduling of GCSE and A level examinations after the summer half-term break. [128633]

Mr. Wicks: The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority and the awarding bodies have recently reviewed the arrangements for GCSE and AS/A level examination timetables. We have agreed their proposals which take effect from 2001, re-scheduling some of the major entry GCSE subjects, English literature and geography, to after the summer half-term, maximising study and preparation time. The timetable for the new AS/A level examinations caters for an increased number of papers and although slightly longer than its predecessor has approximately the same number of written papers scheduled in May.

Medical Schools

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what resources and money are being made available to widen access to medical schools to ensure that students from all economic groups can enter the profession. [128803]

Mr. Wicks: Medical students, in common with other students, benefit from a range of government policies to widen access to higher education: £74.6 million for Access Funds in the academic year 1999–2000; a further £42 million a year from 2000–01 to broaden the social profile of entry into higher education; and from 2001–02, non-repayable Opportunity Bursaries of up to £1,000 for students from disadvantaged backgrounds. In addition, some medical schools have special schemes to encourage a wide range of potential students to study medicine.

Folklore

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the universities which teach (a) an undergraduate and (b) a postgraduate course in folklore; and how many students were on each course for the last year for which figures are easily available. [128878]

Mr. Wicks: The information is not available centrally.

Child Care

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many net child care places were created in the financial year 1999–2000 in (a) the parliamentary constituency of Birkenhead and (b) the parliamentary constituencies in the Wirral. [128911]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The number of child care places created are as follows:

(a) Constituency of Birkenhead: 49 net places

(b) Constituencies of the Wirral: 368 net places

The figure for Birkenhead does not include child minder places as these are not broken to constituency level. A proportion of the 120 net child minder places in the Wirral area may be in the constituency of Birkenhead.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list new children places created in each early years development and child care partnership in 1999–2000. [129991]

Ms Hodge: Early years development and child care partnerships have reported that by end March 2000 they had created some 140.000 new child care places. These 140.000 new places have not only replaced those closed due to turnover during the year, but have added more than 74.000 to the stock of child care places across England, providing child care for over 141.000 extra children. Attached is a breakdown of the number of new child care places created by early years development and child care partnerships in 1999–2000.

Sex and Relationship Guidance

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects his Department's sex and relationships education guidance to be published. [129976]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment published the sex and relationship education guidance on Friday and sent a copy to each Member of Parliament. It will be a significant step forward in supporting schools, teachers and governors to deliver effective sex and relationship education. It is underpinned by the Personal, Social and Health Education framework and the National Healthy School Standard. This fulfils a commitment in the Government's Teenage Pregnancy Report to issue new guidance on sex education as part of our drive to tackle teenage pregnancy. Copies are available in the Library.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sports and Arts

4. Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if primary schools will be able to apply for funding under the space for sports and arts scheme. [128198]

Kate Hoey: Yes; the SSA scheme will make an important contribution to improving sporting facilities in primary schools.

World Cup (Television Coverage)

17. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Broadcasting Act 1989 with regard to television coverage of the 2002 and 2006 football world cup finals tournaments. [128213]

Janet Anderson: In 1998 I extended the list of events protected under Part IV of the Broadcasting Act 1996 to cover all matches in the FIFA World Cup final tournament. Under the terms of that Act, as amended by the Television Broadcasting Regulations 2000, live television coverage of the event must be offered on fair and reasonable terms to broadcasters who meet the qualifying conditions as set out in those regulations and listed in the Independent Television's Code on Listed Events. These broadcasters are currently BBC 1, BBC 2, Channel 3 (ITV) and Channel 4.

Concessionary Television Licences

19. Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he will take to ensure that pensioners aged over 75 years who get free television licences are able to receive terrestrial television channels free of charge. [128215]

Janet Anderson: People aged 75 years or over who receive free television licences from 1 November this year will have free access to analogue terrestrial television services and to any free-to-air digital services, in exactly the same way as other viewers.

Football Facilities

20. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to increase investment in local football facilities. [128216]

Kate Hoey: The Government will shortly announce full details of the Football Foundation, a new partnership body including the Football Association, the FA Premier League and Sport England. All three partners will contribute to the Foundation's income, which will include 5 per cent. of the FA Premier League's next broadcasting contract and substantial Lottery funding.

The Foundation will fund community and education initiatives and will continue the stadium safety work of the Football Trust. The greater part of its income, though, will go to funding the sport at the grass roots, including the provision of facilities and coaching.

Physical Education

21. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he last discussed physical education in schools with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. [128217]

Kate Hoey: I talk regularly to DfEE colleagues about physical education in schools and the Government's strategy for sport. The last time I discussed this with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was on 4 July 2000.

Lottery

22. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement about the criteria taken into consideration in determining awards from national Lottery funds. [128218]

Mr. Chris Smith: The criteria vary from distributor to distributor and from funding programme to funding programme. They are based on the National Lottery Financial and Policy Directions which I have issued to Lottery distributors, and also on distributors' own policies and strategic plans.

25. Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to ensure that funding from the national lottery fund is targeted at the communities with greatest social and economic need to promote participation by young people in performing music. [128221]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The National Foundation for Youth Music, an independent charitable body, was set up by the Department using £30 million in Arts Council Lottery funds to provide and facilitate opportunities for young people to access music making. The Foundation has a key aim to reach young people who are currently deprived of access, improving provision to geographical regions and areas of special need where there are few opportunities for music making.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the criteria for the awarding of funds from the Heritage Lottery Fund. [128214]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Heritage Lottery Fund's criteria for assessing applications under particular schemes are set out in guidance notes in their application pack. The HLF's current Strategic Plan also sets out the four main priorities for allocating grant funding. They are heritage conservation, national heritage, local heritage and heritage education and access.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what estimate he has made of the annual costs to local authorities and other public bodies directly arising from applications to Lottery funding bodies; [129535]

(2) what estimate he has made of the annual costs to charities and other voluntary organisations directly arising from applications to lottery funding bodies. [129537]

Kate Hoey: None. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has, however, directed the independent Quality Efficiency and Standards Team (QUEST) to look at the cost to all applicants of making applications for lottery grants, and consider how these costs could be contained without compromising the demands of proper accountability in decisions about how to spend public money. The first phase of QUEST's report, which focuses on applications for lottery grants of up to £100,000, will be published shortly. The second phase, dealing with applications for grants of £100,000 plus, will be published later in the year.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the number of Lottery awards given to (a) the North West, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland. [128830]

Kate Hoey: The following table shows the number of awards in the North West, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland since the start of the Lottery, according to my Department's National Lottery awards database.

Location	Number of awards
North West	3,827
Scotland	8,991
Wales	5,525
Northern Ireland	1,339

Millennium Dome

23. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the financial situation of the Millennium Dome. [128219]

Janet Anderson: The New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) current business plan is based on 6 million revenue-generating visitors. Should visitor numbers fall below this level the business plan will need to be reviewed. Details of the business plan are commercially confidential. NMEC's most recent budget, contained within the business plan, is as follows:

Project Lifetime Expenditure

Dome structure and associated infrastructure—£271.2 million

Set-up costs, staff, accommodation, IT, legal and corporate services—£55.4 million

Commercial, communications and marketing—£42.7 million

Exhibits and attractions—£240.2 million

Operations and running costs in year of operation—£104.6 million

National Programme: projects (£37.3 million) and programme support (£9.9 million)—£47.2 million

Project Lifetime Income

Millennium Commission Grant—£525 million

Commercial income—£86 million

Sponsorship income—£123 million (excludes sponsorship by Ford and BT who have designed, built and funded their zones)

Legacy: sale of Dome—£30.0 million (as budgeted prior to the Legacy competition commencing. Original 1997 budget provision of £15 million was on the basis that the Dome would remain on-site for one year only)

Total budget is £758 million plus an additional £3 million granted by the Millennium Commission to enhance marketing of the Millennium Experience.

Films (Children)

24. Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to encourage the British film industry to make more films aimed at children. [128220]

Janet Anderson: The Film Council's Lottery Strategy, published in May, recognises the need to broaden the range of films on offer to the British public. Its £5 million per year script development fund will seek to develop films for the broadest range of audiences, including children. The Council has also announced that it will allocate £1 million of lottery funds to offer children and young people the opportunity to try film-making.

Amateur Sports Clubs

26. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what financial assistance is available to amateur sports clubs; and if he will make a statement. [128222]

Kate Hoey: Financial assistance is available to amateur sports clubs from a number of sources including: the Lottery Sports Fund; local authorities; governing bodies of sport who distribute income including exchequer funding from Sport England, through their own grant schemes; Sportsmatch; commercial sponsorship; the European Union Social Fund; the Foundation for Sport and the Arts (FSA); and other trusts and foundations with sport-related purposes.

Football Clubs

27. Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to encourage football supporters to have greater influence in the running of their clubs. [128223]

Kate Hoey: The Government believe that groups of supporters can take a responsible role in the running of football clubs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the Supporters Direct Initiative in January. In shadow form, this is already providing advice to groups of supporters wishing to form shareholding trusts. The Government will make a detailed announcement concerning the operation of the Supporters Direct Unit shortly.

Football Coaches

28. Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the activities of the Football Foundation will be directed to expanding the activity of qualified football coaches in primary and secondary schools. [128224]

Kate Hoey: The Government will announce details of the Football Foundation shortly. It will be for the Foundation's Board to decide on funding priorities. However, it is envisaged that the greater part of the Foundation's income will be used to develop the sport at the grass roots. The Government expect that this will involve funding for the provision and improvement of playing facilities, equipment and high quality coaching for local football clubs and schools.

Libraries (New Books)

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the investment in new books made each year by library authorities since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [128199]

Mr. Alan Howarth: In 1997–98 and 1998–99 expenditure by library authorities on books was £1.51 per person. In 1999–2000, the last year for which we have information, the estimated expenditure by library authorities on books was £1.59 per person. This is slightly less than 10 years ago when the figure was £1.73. I have proposed the inclusion of a book expenditure standard in the draft public library standards, which I published in May for wide consultation.

Digital Television

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the number of households which will be able to receive digital television within the next two years. [128209]

Mr. Chris Smith: Information available from the Independent Television Commission indicates that, with appropriate receivers, most homes in the UK are able to receive digital television now through terrestrial, satellite or cable delivery platforms.

Free Television Licences (Christchurch)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many pensioners in the Christchurch constituency will be eligible to receive free television licences from November. [125967]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 15 June 2000]: Exact figures on the number of households which will benefit from the concession are not available. However, as indicated by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 176W, the 1991 Census New Parliamentary Constituency Monitor, published by the Office for National Statistics, shows the population of the Christchurch constituency as 80,938, of which 5.3 per cent. were men aged 75 and over and 8.4 per cent. were women aged 75 and over.

Free Television Licences (Warrington, North)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will estimate the number of pensioners in Warrington, North constituency who will be eligible for free television licences. [127315]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 26 June 2000]: Exact figures on the number of households which will benefit from the concession are not available. However, the 1991 Census New Parliamentary Constituency

Monitor, published by the Office for National Statistics, shows the population of the Warrington, North constituency as 94,645, of which 1.8 per cent. were men aged 75 and over and 3.5 per cent. were women aged 75 and over.

Disabled People (Access)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action he is taking to facilitate access for disabled people to new buildings funded by the national lottery. [129310]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 6 July 2000]: We have encouraged lottery distributors to promote access for all sections of society to the benefits of lottery funding. All lottery distributors take access for disabled people into account when considering grant applications for capital projects.

World Cup Bid

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the total costs incurred on (a) travel, (b) entertainment and (c) wages, salaries and pensions in connection with the England 2006 World Cup bid; and if he will make a statement. [129709]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 7 July 2000]: It will be for the Football Association to decide whether to publish details of total expenditure on the 2006 bid. However, Sport England has committed £3.14 million of lottery funding to supporting the bid, and details of the uses to which that money has been put—including the funding of a proportion of the bid team's staff costs—will appear in Sport England's Lottery Annual Report. Travel and entertainment expenditure has not been funded using lottery money as it is specifically excluded from Sport England's funding agreement with the FA.

Cultural Services

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what guidance he has issued to local authorities on the priority they should attach to cultural services. [128202]

Janet Anderson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State published draft Guidance on Local Cultural Strategies for all local authorities in England in June last year. This Guidance emphasises the importance of cultural services in improving the quality of life for all. A major theme of the Guidance is how cultural services can contribute to wider aims such as tackling social exclusion, encouraging healthier lifestyles and stimulating a commitment to lifelong learning.

In February we sent all local authorities a mid-term progress report on the experiences of 14 authorities who have been piloting the Guidance. Responses from some 300 local authorities indicated that 85 per cent. of them were developing or had developed a cultural strategy. That represents approximately two-thirds of local authorities in England, which is very good progress.

PRIME MINISTER

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Prime Minister what were the total costs of the Social Exclusion Unit in 1999. [126797]

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office spent £1,570,000 on the Social Exclusion Unit in the financial year 1999–2000. In addition, the pay and associated costs of a number of staff were borne by other Government Departments to the estimated sum of £214,000; and for parts of the year, some secondee, adviser and research costs have been supported by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, the Improvement and Development Agency, National Westminster Bank, the Housing Corporation and Kent County Constabulary.

Ministerial Residences

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 50W, if those Ministers having the use of grace and favour residences are required to use the additional cost allowance towards the costs incurred within these properties. [126331]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 20 June 2000]: The costs of maintaining official residences are met by the Government. Ministers occupying official residences are not entitled to claim on London properties the Parliamentary additional cost allowance. Nor are they entitled to the Parliamentary London supplement paid to other Members of Parliament who live in London.

Crime Summit

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he received from (a) the chief constables attending the Crime Summit on 3 July and (b) other chief constables regarding the Government's proposals on spot-fines for anti-social behaviour. [129367]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 July 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

Strategic Communications Unit

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) of 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 455W, regarding the Strategic Communications Unit, for what reasons the number of permanent civil servants has increased from four to nine since January 1998. [129722]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 7 July 2000]: At the time of its creation in January 1998 the Strategic Communications Unit had six civil servant posts and two special adviser posts, though not all the posts were filled immediately. Since then, three new civil service posts have been created to run the Number 10 website.

Appointments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the positions to which he is entitled to appoint individuals. [129683]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 7 July 2000]: I have listed the appointments that I make as Prime Minister. For some of the bodies listed the appointments are made by the Prime Minister in accordance with statute or by convention. For others, principally the museums and galleries, the appointments are made by the Prime Minister in accordance with the relevant charter or articles of association. In general these are made after consulting the relevant departmental Ministers.

Waiting Lists (Mid-Essex)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 5 July, if he will review the Mid-Essex waiting list figures; and if he will make a statement on trends in Mid-Essex waiting lists since 2 May 1997. [129977]

The Prime Minister: I have written to the hon. Member today. A copy of my letter has been placed in the Library.

On-the-spot Fines

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he had with chief constables in advance of his speech detailing proposals for on-the-spot fines for anti-social behaviour made on 30 June. [129978]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Regional Affairs Committee

Mr. Loughton: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on her plans for the Regional Affairs Committee. [129833]

Mrs. Beckett: I hope that the Committee will be established in the near future and will meet before the end of the Session.

CABINET OFFICE

Ministerial Group on Rural Affairs

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many times the Ministerial Group on Rural Affairs has met since it was created; who was in the chair for each meeting; who attended each meeting; and if she will make a statement. [128056]

Marjorie Mowlam: It is established practice under exemption two of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information not to disclose information relating to the proceedings of Cabinet Committees. A statement on the Government's policy on rural areas will be made when our Rural White Paper is published.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to her answer of 11 January 2000, Official Report, column 134W, on secondments, if she will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into her Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128241]

Mr. Stringer: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. Before an Interchange can occur, all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

The secondees to the Cabinet Office between May 1997 and December 1999 as listed in the answer of 11 January 2000, Official Report, column 134W, worked in a variety of jobs from Cabinet Office Band B2 (broadly equivalent to Higher Executive Officer) to the Senior Civil Service. They worked in a wide range of areas, many of them concerned with the Modernising Government initiative, where we are keen to benefit from best practice from all sections of the economy.

I am not prepared to identify individual secondees by name or job title. Secondees are employed on the basis that they can contribute valuable expertise and good practice to the Civil Service, and on the basis that no conflict of interest arises. Where appropriate, their names are published in directories such as the Civil Service Year Book, as are those of permanent staff. But they are not separately identified as being on secondment.

Media Monitoring Unit

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the cost of the Government Information and Communication Service Media Monitoring Unit was for (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99. [128462]

Mr. Stringer: The Media Monitoring Unit (MMU) operated as a pilot between December 1997 and March 1998. The MMU's set-up and running costs for this period were absorbed by a wide range of Departments. This information is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost. In the 1998–99 financial year, the total cost of the unit was £478,878. These costs were recovered from a large number of Departments out of their existing funds.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the PFI contracts entered into by her Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if her Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129055]

Mr. Stringer: There are no such contracts.

Anti-drug Strategy

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what was the total amount spent on the Government anti-drug strategy in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01; and what is the planned expenditure for 2001–02. [128396]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Each year the Government spend in the region of £1.4 billion on anti-drugs activities. For the present strategy, "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain", the 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review settlement provided an additional £217 million of resources for three years, 1998–99 to 2000–01. Spending for the financial years 2001–02 to 2003–04 is being considered as part of the current Spending Review which will be announced shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Summit

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the (a) agenda and (b) minutes of the crime summit held at 10 Downing street on Monday 3 July; and if he will make a statement. [129294]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 6 July 2000]: The crime seminar on 3 July brought together senior officers of police and others with expertise in tackling violent crime and disorder. The senior officers of the five Metropolitan forces outlined their plans for using their share of the additional £20 million to tackle robbery, which I announced in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Ms McCafferty) on 15 June 2000, Official Report, column 714W.

In the general discussion which followed, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I underlined our real determination to tackle violence and the culture of disorder. Those present agreed on the need to ensure that the police had sufficient powers to deal effectively with drunken, loutish, anti-social behaviour. The chief officers present were broadly supportive of the idea of fixed penalty fines. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister concluded that the Home Office should work closely with the Association of Chief Police Officers and others to work up this and other options for tackling disorder in the coming weeks. The Home Office has continuous discussions with Chief Constables about measures to deal with anti-social behaviour.

Brixton Prison

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to market-test Brixton prison. [130212]

Mr. Boateng: Last November, I announced in the wake of serious concern about conditions at Brixton prison, that it must be regarded as a failing institution and that there must be rapid and fundamental improvement. I made it clear that unless big improvements were made quickly, Brixton could be subject to market testing. It is now over eight months since then, and progress at the prison has been kept under close review.

I am not satisfied with the rate of progress being made, nor that the necessary improvements will be in place within 12 months. In particular, there has not been adequate improvement in compliance with standards, the quality of regime remains poor, there are serious concerns about commitment to equal opportunities within the prison, costs remain high, and there is a lack of commitment to changes to free up resources to improve the regime. This judgment, accepted by the Director General, has been confirmed in a recent visit by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons, who found that although certain improvements have been made in many areas, basic conditions, including cleanliness in the health care centre, were still unacceptable.

I have, therefore, reviewed the position and am clear that I would be failing in my public duty to all those at the prison—staff and prisoners alike—if we did not set a new path for the establishment. The Director General agrees with me that there should be a market test of Brixton prison. The new management team will be responsible for quickening the pace of improvement and for putting together an in-house bid, which will be judged alongside bids which will be invited from private sector operators.

Police Forces (Expenditure)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the expenditure was (a) in total and (b) per head of population (i) in each police force in Great Britain and (ii) in total in (1) 1979, (2) 1987 and (3) each year since 1992; and what was the real terms change for each year. [126229]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 19 June 2000]: Tables showing the information for England and Wales have been placed in the Library. Net revenue expenditure figures are in cash terms and are taken from the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy Police Statistics. The percentage changes are in real terms (1998–99:100). Final data for 1999–2000 are not yet available.

Departmental Fees

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor) of 27 January 2000, Official Report, column 229–30W, what assessment he has made of the extent to which the increase in revenues attributable to the subject access under the Data Protection Act 1998 relates to changes in the practice of enforced subject access; if he will introduce legislation to modify section 75(4) of the Data Protection Act 1998 thereby making enforced subject access an offence as soon as the Criminal Record Certificate and Enhanced Criminal Record Certificate are available; and if he will make a statement. [129185]

Mr. Straw: It is not possible to say what proportion of subject access requests made to police records are enforced. We have no plans to amend section 75(4) of the Data Protection Act 1998. Criminal Convictions Certificates also need to be available before enforced subject access can be made an offence. The target date for making those Certificates available is July 2002.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 and 123 of the Ministerial Code; and on which occasions such advice was sought. [129174]

Mr. Straw: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by his Department, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Department has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129051]

Communications Data

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce an amendment to the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill to prohibit the subsequent disclosure of communications data which have legitimately been obtained under the powers granted by the Bill, by virtue of the application of the non-disclosure provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998 or by the application of powers in other legislation which could result in statutory demands for communications data; and if he will make a statement. [129210]

Mr. Straw: We do not consider it necessary to amend the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill further as my hon. Friend suggests. The law enforcement, security and intelligence agencies are already subject to restrictions on the degree to which they may share data by the terms of the Data Protection Act 1998 or under the statutory restrictions placed on them by the Security Service Act 1989 and the Intelligence Services Act 1994.

The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill substantially enhances the existing safeguards which surround the obtaining of communications data by placing on a statutory basis proper levels of authorisation, considerations of necessity and proportionality and independent oversight by the Interception Commissioner.

Home Detention Curfews

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners convicted of robbery were released on the Home Detention Curfew scheme on (a) 19, (b) 20, (c) 21, (d) 22 and (e) 23 June; and what was the sentence (i) received and (ii) served in each case. [128920]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Fourteen prisoners convicted of robbery were placed on the Home Detention Curfew scheme on the dates in question. The breakdown of their release dates, and of the sentence received and served in each case, is given in the table.

Date released	Number released	Sentence received	(days) Sentence served
19 June	6	1,096	529

Prisons (Visitor Centres)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons have a staffed visitors' centre; and of these how many are funded by the prison. [129199]

Mr. Boateng: In 1993, when prison establishments were last surveyed, there were 81 visitors' centres. We estimate that about 90 Prison Service establishments now have a visitors' centre. Many of these receive funding from the establishment, although exact figures are not available. We are obtaining more precise information in a further survey as part of a review of visits policy.

Prison Strip Searches

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors to each prison were strip searched in (a) 1998, (b) 1999 and (c) 2000 to date. [129195]

Mr. Boateng: The number of strip searches carried out on visitors to prisons each year is not recorded. Visitors are strip searched only when there is reasonable cause to suspect that they are carrying a firearm or a controlled drug, and a full rub down search has failed to reveal the item.

Anti-social Behaviour

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many young persons aged under 18 years have been made subject to an anti-social behaviour order; [129264]

(2) what estimate he has made of the cost of obtaining an anti-social behaviour order. [129241]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As I said in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 296W, we are aware of at least 27 anti-social behaviour orders made against people under the age of 18.

The costs quoted in the Financial and Explanatory Memorandum for the Crime and Disorder Bill assumed an average additional cost of £600 per anti-social behaviour order. This took account of offsetting savings. We have not assessed the cost of making an order since then.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the compatibility of (a) spot-fines for anti-social behaviour and (b) the enforcement mechanism for spot-fines for anti-social behaviour proposed by the Prime Minister in his announcement of 30 June with the European Convention on Human Rights; and if he will make a statement. [129375]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 6 July 2000]: Any new measures would, of course, have to comply with the European Convention on Human Rights, in particular the right under Article 6, to a fair trial. Resource implications, the arrangements for handling money and the safety of police officers would also be primary considerations. The Government have no plans to decriminalise anti-social behaviour that currently constitutes an offence in England and Wales.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the cost of training police officers in the use of spot-fines for anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement; [129369]

(2) what plans he has for police forces to retain the funds levied by way of spot-fines for anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement; [129374]

(3) what estimate he has made of the cost to the police of enforcing spot-fines for anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement; [129370]

(4) what assessment he has made of the impact on social exclusion of the imposition of spot-fines for anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement; [129373]

(5) what research his Department has conducted on the increased risk to police officers of (a) violence associated with refusal to pay spot-fines for anti-social behaviour and (b) carrying large amounts of cash obtained from spot-fines for anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement; [129366]

(6) what plans the Government have to make spot-fines for anti-social behaviour (a) criminal and (b) civil penalties; what standard of proof will be employed; if their imposition will be recorded on criminal records; and if he will make a statement; [129371]

(7) what discussions (a) he, (b) Ministers in his Department and (c) officials in his Department had with (i) chief constables and (ii) other police officers regarding spot-fines for anti-social behaviour prior to the Prime Minister's announcement of 30 June; what representations were received; and if he will make a statement; [129364]

(8) what plans the Government have for spot-fines for anti-social behaviour to be enforced (a) in addition to and (b) instead of criminal proceedings; and if he will make a statement; [129372]

(9) what plans the Government have to decriminalise acts of anti-social behaviour that currently constitute criminal offences; and if he will make a statement; [129368]

(10) what recent research his Department has conducted in relation to introducing powers for the police to impose spot-fines for anti-social behaviour. [129365]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 6 July 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the use of anti-social behaviour orders in Wales. [129836]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is for the police and local authorities concerned, in Wales as in England, to apply to the courts for an anti-social behaviour order if they consider it appropriate in order to protect their local communities. Anti-social behaviour orders (ASBOs) provide an effective weapon to tackle such behaviour. Over 80 ASBOs have been made in the past year in a variety of English local government areas. I very much hope that the new guidance we have recently issued will help to increase their use further still, including in local government areas within England and Wales in which no such orders have as yet been made.

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been made to date in Wales. [129837]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the response I gave to him on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 295W.

Cheryl Hartman

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the means by which the parents of Cheryl Simone Hartman were informed of her death in Holloway prison on 18 June. [129262]

Mr. Boateng: I was very sorry to learn of the death of Cheryl Hartman at Holloway prison. Both I and Martin Narey, the Director General for the Prison Service, take deaths in custody very seriously indeed. I would like to pass my condolences on to Ms Hartman's family on behalf of myself and Martin Narey.

I was disappointed to learn that Ms Hartman's family had been notified of her death by telephone. The Prison Service is aware of the need for sensitivity in notifying the next-of-kin about the death of a loved one in prison custody. Accordingly, such notification should normally be done by a prison governor and the chaplain or, where there are geographical constraints, by the police.

There may be some exceptional occasions when contact by telephone is the most appropriate method of notification, but I would normally expect a personal call to be made. In this instance, I understand that the Duty Governor took the view that, to ensure that Ms Hartman's mother was notified quickly he should do so by telephone. In addition, he was also under the impression that the police would make personal contact, but in the event they did not.

I understand that Martin Narey has written to the family to apologise for the Prison Service's handling of this matter. I would also like to take this opportunity to apologise to Ms Hartman's family for the way in which they were treated by the prison authorities.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many lorry drivers were convicted of bringing immigrants into the country in the year before the coming into force of the Carriers' Liability (Clandestine Entrants and Sales of Transporters) Regulations 2000. [129393]

Mrs. Roche: During 1999, the number of those convicted of offences committed under section 25 of the Immigration Act 1971, for knowingly facilitating the entry of either an illegal entrant or an asylum applicant, was 153.

The number of those convicted who were employed as lorry drivers is not recorded centrally, and data relating to convictions in 2000 are not yet available.

Emergency Services (Fuel Costs)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each (a) police and (b) fire authority in England and Wales, the amount of their budget for the last financial year that was spent on road fuel for police and fire vehicles. [129391]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 3 July 2000, Official Report, column 69W.

Detainees (Mental Illness)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that all custody officers (a) ask detainees questions to determine their mental state and (b) receive training in recognising mental illness. [129587]

Mrs. Roche: It is not the function of detention custody officers to determine a detainee's mental state. However, it is part of their function to refer any health concerns about a detainee to the medical team located at the Centre. Detainees are offered full medical screening on arrival at a Detention Centre and this includes mental health screening. Qualified medical staff are on duty during the day and an on call system operates at night.

The level of Health Care at Detention Centres is comparable to that in a local General Practice.

Detainees are referred for specialist treatment, including psychological counselling, in the same way as any other NHS patient.

Detention Custody Officers will receive suicide awareness and first aid training as part of their training programme.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129638]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 466W. In addition, most of Her Majesty's prisons and some of the smaller offices of the other agencies of my Department have an "automated attendant" facility. This enables the caller to use the telephone keypad to select the required extension, where direct dialling-in to the extension is not available, or to speak to an operator. No central records of these facilities are kept.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129620]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 467W. In addition, some of the smaller offices in my Department have an "automated attendant" facility. This enables the caller to use the telephone keypad to select the required extension, where direct dialling-in to the extension is not available; or to speak to an operator. No central records of these facilities are kept.

Prison Ships

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison ships are in use in the UK; and how many inmates were held on these ships on 1 July. [129455]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service for England and Wales currently has one floating facility, Weare prison, moored in Portland harbour, Dorset.

On 1 July, 359 adult males were held by the prison, the certified normal accommodation for which is 400.

Humberside Police Force

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the additional 5,000 police he recently announced are serving in the Humberside police force. [129609]

Mr. Straw: The Crime Fighting Fund will allow police forces in England and Wales to recruit 5,000 officers over and above the number they had otherwise planned to recruit: 3,000 in 2000–01 and 2,000 in 2001–02.

Humberside have been allocated 74 additional recruits from the Crime Fighting Fund: 47 in 2000–01 and 27 in 2001–02. Nineteen of the Crime Fighting Fund recruits for 2000–01 have been recruited so far and are presently serving in Humberside police.

Child Detainees

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each institution which has received children under a detention and training order since the introduction of such orders. [129701]

Mr. Boateng: The Detention and Training Order may be served in a number of different types of institution: young offender institutions; secure training centres; and places in local authority secure units. Generally, in the case of boys, those who are aged 15 to 17 will serve their sentence in a young offender institution, and those aged 12 to 14 in secure training centres or local authority secure units, except where individual assessment recommends otherwise. This reflects the Youth Justice Board's placement strategy, a copy of which is in the Library.

Placements of boys aged 15 to 17 to a young offender institution should be made to those comprising the new distinct estate for boys: Ashfield; Brinsford; Castington; Feltham; Hollesley Bay; Huntercombe; Lancaster Farms; Onley; Portland; Stoke Heath; Thorn Cross; Werrington; and Wetherby. The new estate comprises juvenile-only establishments and juvenile units in young offender institutions.

The Government have decided that young women aged 15 to 16 should be placed in non-Prison Service accommodation, as should those aged 17 years, as spaces become available. In the interim, 17-year-olds on remand will continue to share facilities with adults due to their small numbers, and those who are sentenced with other young women under 21 in enhanced young offender units in womens' prisons at: Brockhill; Bullwood Hall; Drake Hall; Eastwood Park; Holloway; Low Newton; New Hall and Styal.

Community Safety Partnerships

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which (a) organisations, (b) individuals and (c) projects have benefited from his Department's expenditure on community safety partnerships in (i) 1999–2000 and (ii) 2000–01. [129527]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 requires local authorities and police jointly to develop and implement strategies to reduce crime in their area. The main additional source of Home Office funding for partnerships is the Crime Reduction Programme, details of which are contained in the reply my hon. Friend the Minister of State, gave on 7 July 2000, Official Report, columns 359–60W. The Home Office also has in place a programme of research, consultancy support, training and seminars to help partnerships achieve real reductions in crime and disorder.

Grants

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisations and individuals received grants and payments in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01 for services in support of the work of (i) the Probation Service and (ii) local authority social services departments; and how much money was paid in each such grant. [129521]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: Information relating to organisations and individuals receiving grants and payments in support of the work of the Probation Service is not available for 1999–2000 or 2000–01. I will write to the hon. Member with details of the figures for 1998–99 and place a copy of the information in the Library. The matter of payments to local social services is one for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy objective of his Department's annual payment to the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders. [129528]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The Home Office funds the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NACRO) in pursuit of Home Office objectives in the prevention of crime, the resettlement of offenders, the prevention of reoffending, the delivery of justice fairly and equally to all and the promotion of the confidence of all communities in the criminal justice system. This includes projects in crime prevention, research and evaluation, offender employment and housing. NACRO also pursues work for the Prison Service in areas of resettlement, race and women's issues.

Reoffenders

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the reoffending rates following participation in an accredited programme run by the probation service in England and Wales were in each of the last three years; what were the reoffending rates for those sentenced to a probation order in the same period; and if he will make a statement. [129316]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The Joint Prison Probation Accreditation Panel first met to consider applications in December last year. To date the Panel has granted provisional accreditation to one community-based offender programme. It is likely that a further seven offending behaviour programmes will be considered for accreditation when the Panel next meets in September. There are no reconviction or reoffending rates available from the programme, as it has not been running long enough to provide the necessary data. Arrangements are in place for the evaluation of the programmes.

The reconviction rates of those offenders sentenced to a probation order in the last three years—available data are: 59 per cent. for 1994, and 60 per cent. for 1995 and 1996.

The work of the Accreditation Panel will promote the use of evidence-based practice, which the probation service is working towards.

Voluntary Sector Funding

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisations were paid grants in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01 (i) to assist work in support of the voluntary sector, (ii) to promote voluntary activity and community development and (iii) to support innovative projects; and how much money was paid in each such grant. [129526]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The information covers grant programmes whose primary purposes are to promote voluntary activity and community development and to assist work, including innovative projects, in support of the voluntary sector. Some organisations receive grants for different purposes and those amounts are shown separately. The tables have been placed in the Library.

Prisoner Repatriation

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many foreign prisoners serving sentences in England and Wales were repatriated in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [129313]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The information requested is given in the table:

	Number
1997	17
1998	42
1999	22

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many British nationals who were sentenced abroad were repatriated to serve out their sentences in England and Wales in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement. [129314]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The information requested is given in the table:

	Number
1997	34
1998	27
1999	11

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications were made in each of the past three years for repatriation for foreign prisoners in England and Wales; how many of those applications were (a) refused and (b) discontinued; and if he will make a statement. [129315]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The information requested is given in the table:

	1997	1998	1999
Applications	127	157	193
Refused	36	49	45
Discontinued	38	34	16

Applications refused or discontinued may not have been submitted in the year they were determined.

Rape

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his response is to the report of the Working Party on Rape submitted to the United Kingdom Programme Action Committee of Soroptimist International; and if he will make a statement. [129287]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The report of the Working Party on Rape of the United Kingdom Programme Action Committee of Soroptimist International is an interesting and useful contribution to the discussion on the law on rape and the treatment of rape victims in the United Kingdom. It was submitted to the review that was considering the law of sex offences in England and Wales and contributed to their work.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals (a) have been convicted of a football-related offence and (b) had an international banning order placed upon them; and what reasons the courts have given, under the terms of the Football (Offences and Disorder) Act 1999, for not imposing banning orders in each case since 26 September 1999. [129779]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Thirty-three individuals have had International Football Banning Orders imposed under the terms of the 1999 Act. I regret that the other information requested is not available, but information on all football-related convictions will be collected by the National Criminal Intelligence Service from the beginning of the next season.

Prisoner Releases

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners convicted of grievous bodily harm have been released earlier than their normal parole date in the last 12 months. [129980]

Mr. Boateng: Prisoners serving four years and over are eligible for parole at the half way point in sentence under a system of discretionary conditional release. Section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 allows for release from prison at any time on compassionate grounds in exceptional circumstances. In the last 12 months, one prisoner serving a sentence for inflicting grievous bodily harm has been released on compassionate grounds prior to his parole eligibility date.

Prisoners serving under four years are not subject to parole but are released automatically at the halfway point in sentence. The majority of such prisoners are eligible for consideration for the Home Detention Curfew (HDC) scheme which provides for their release up to 60 days before their automatic release date. Full details of those released under the HDC scheme since its introduction in January 1999 are given in the reply by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on 3 July 2000, Official Report, columns 58–59W.

Child Curfew Orders

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many child curfew orders have been issued under the provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. [129979]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No applications have been received from local authorities to establish child curfew schemes under section 14 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Following consultation with local authorities and the police the Government are considering what improvements might be made to the provisions to ensure that they are able to contribute effectively to local partnership efforts to tackle anti-social behaviour.

Sex Education

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of young offenders' institutions in the United Kingdom offer parenting and sexual health classes; and if he will make a statement. [129255]

Mr. Boateng: All Prison Service establishments in England and Wales must offer a social and life skills programme as part of the Prison Service core curriculum. The social and life skills programme includes units on healthy living, parentcraft, family relationships, sexual health and relationships education. Governors of prisons and young offender institutions order a range of units from education contractors. It is not possible to say what percentage of young offender institutions offer parentcraft and sexual health and relationships education as no information is held centrally on the particular units ordered by individual establishments.

Young offender institutions in Scotland and Northern Ireland are a matter for the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively.

Police Recruits

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take action to reduce variation between police forces in the medical standards which they require of newly recruited officers. [129990]

Mr. Charles Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is taking action to review recruitment procedures to ensure non-discriminatory practices and to publish national recruitment standards, including medical standards. My officials are working with police representative organisations to meet this deadline.

TREASURY

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to announce the outcome of Spending Review 2000. [130215]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I will make a statement to the House on Tuesday 18 July.

European Single Currency

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the costs of converting to the euro for (a) Government Departments, (b) the private sector and (c) the economy as a whole. [129594]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Should the UK decide to join the euro, the costs of a changeover would depend on the detailed approach taken.

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which advertising agency has been tasked with the euro preparation work commissioned by his Department; what is the length of the contract; when the work will start and finish; what is the value of the contract; and what plans he has to launch new euro campaigns. [128805]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Treasury does not have an advertising agency appointed for business euro preparations work.

Fuel Taxation

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reduce fuel taxation in order to reduce the current average price of fuel to March 2000 levels. [129272]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 6 July 2000]: I have no plans to do so. Decisions on the appropriate levels of fuel duties are set on a Budget by Budget basis, taking account of the Government's economic and social objectives as well as the UK's environmental commitments.

Correspondence

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will reply to the question from the hon. Member for Christchurch tabled on 8 June about council tax and pensioners (ref. 125925) and 9 June about pensioners in Christchurch (ref. 125976). [129118]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Both questions have been answered.

Unemployment

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the unemployment rate in each of the 20 largest metropolitan boroughs is and what it was in May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [129112]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Tim Loughton, dated 10 July 2000:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question about the unemployment rate in each of the 20 largest metropolitan boroughs.

The ONS preferred measure of unemployment is the International Labour Organisation (ILO) unemployment rate, derived from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). However, LFS estimates are not available for single months.

The ONS also publishes a monthly count of claimants of unemployment-related benefits. The claimant count consists of all people claiming Jobseeker's Allowance or National Insurance credits at Employment Service local offices. They must declare that they are out of work, capable of, available for and actively seeking work during the week in which the claim is made.

Claimant count rates by local area on the unadjusted basis can be obtained from the Nomis database at the House of Commons Library.

Population Statistics

Mr. Curry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his latest estimate is of the population of the 20 largest cities in the UK; and what was the population of the same cities (a) two, (b) five and (c) 10 years earlier. [128867]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Curry, dated 10 July 2000:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question about the twenty largest cities in the UK. (128867)

I have given my reply in the attached table in terms of the twenty largest local authorities in the UK rather than cities as official population estimates are produced for local authority areas, not cities. ONS produces annual mid-year population estimates for the local authorities in England and Wales. The local authorities in England and Wales are the unitary authorities, district, borough councils and London boroughs. The population estimates used for each of the years given in this answer are in terms of the local authorities as their boundaries were defined in 1998. This has been done so that comparisons can be made between years without confusion due to the local government reorganisation that took place between 1996 and 1998.

The General Register Office for Scotland and the Northern Ireland Statistics Research Agency produces the population estimates for the local authorities in Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively. The mid-98 population estimates from these sources have been used with the estimates from England and Wales in order to identify the twenty largest local authorities in the UK in mid-98.

The mid-98 population estimates have been used for this answer as these are the most recent population estimates for England and Wales; the mid-99 estimates are due to be published in August 2000.

Mortgages

Ms Abbott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent consultations he has had with (a) the Financial Services Authority, (b) the Department of Trade and Industry, (c) the Office of Fair Trading, (d) the European Commission and (e) consumer groups about the definition of a mortgage; and if he will list the (i) consumer groups and (ii) others he is consulting about the definition of a mortgage. [129263]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer my hon. Friend to the announcement made on 27 January 2000, Official Report, columns 262–64W, of the Government's decision on the regulation of mortgages.

That decision was the outcome of a consultation exercise that gathered a great deal of evidence, including that from borrowers and consumer groups, about what can go wrong with mortgage lending.

The proposals announced by the Government were designed specifically to address these problems and put the consumer in control.

Following the announcement of the Government's decision, the Treasury has received helpful views on the definition of a mortgage, and is also drawing on the expertise of the Financial Services Authority and other Government Departments. The Government will consult on any proposed legal definition at the appropriate time.

Severn Bridges Tolls (VAT)

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about EU proposals to impose VAT on tolls for the Severn Bridges. [129269]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are awaiting the judgment of the European Court of Justice, due on 12 September, on whether or not VAT should be levied on toll charges. An appropriate announcement will be made when this judgment has been studied.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129478]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue Guide to Employers states that employers may consider it worthwhile to have arrangements in place to issue a periodic reminder to married women employees for whom they hold a certificate of election, advising them of the need to tell the employer if their marriage ends by divorce or annulment or that they are no longer entitled to pay reduced rate National Insurance contributions. All of my Departments with such employees follow this advice either by an annual notice in their staff bulletins or in individual letters issued annually.

IR35

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last revised the expected revenue yield from IR35; and what the revised estimate is. [129733]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Member to Table A2.1 of this year's Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Children's Tax Credit

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families he expects to benefit from implementation of the Children's Tax Credit in (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom. [129925]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that about five million families in the UK will benefit from the introduction of the Children's Tax Credit, of which about 400,000 are in Scotland.

Redundancy Pay

Paddy Ashdown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons money received on redundancy as pay in lieu of notice and holiday pay is treated for tax purposes as income for the tax year in which it is paid, in circumstances where it relates to a period of time within the following tax year; and if he will make a statement. [128182]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 July 2000]: The earnings of all employees and directors, including money received on redundancy as pay in lieu of notice and holiday pay, are taxed in the year in which they are received instead of the year for which they were earned. This way of taxing earnings was introduced in the 1989 Budget in order to simplify the method of assessment. There are no current plans to change this treatment.

Tax treatment of redundancy payments

Payments made solely to compensate for an individual being made redundant are taxable above a £30,000 exemption limit.

Tax treatment of payments in lieu of notice and holiday pay

Payments in lieu of notice are taxable in full if they are provided for in the contract of employment or if the employer customarily pays them. Other payments in lieu of notice are treated in the same way as redundancy payments, i.e. taxable above a £30,000 exemption limit. Holiday pay owed is taxable in full.

All of the above payments are taxed in the year in which they are received. Those payments which are taxable in full have been taxed in this way since 1989 and those payments which are taxable above a £30,000 exemption limit—i.e. redundancy payments and some payments in lieu of notice—have been taxed in this way since 1998.

Exports

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of UK goods exported to (a) Antwerp and (b) Rotterdam were for onward transit outside the EU in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [129673]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 7 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave on 9 May 2000, Official Report, column 334W, and on 10 May 2000, Official Report, columns 400–01W, on the same subject.

Where goods are moved in transit through other EC countries while en route to non-EC countries, exporters are required to state the final country of destination on their customs declarations. Customs produce trade statistics on the basis of the declared final country of destination and do not record transit details.

However, some goods exported to other EC countries and reported as such may subsequently be exported on to a third country—e.g. by way of a further commercial transaction. The European trade statistics system does not allow for the identification of these movements.

Public Sector Workers (Home Loans)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 13 June 2000, Official Report, column 574W, on Public Sector Workers (Home Loans), whether a teacher employed in (a) a county school and (b) an independent school granted a preferential loan for housing by (i) the Department for Education and Employment, (ii) the Exchequer and (iii) the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, would be liable for tax and national insurance contributions on that loan. [129713]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 7 July 2000]: On the basis that the teacher would not be an employee of a Government Department and the loan was neither guaranteed nor facilitated by the teacher's employer, the teacher would not be liable to income tax or national insurance contributions on the loan.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 13 June 2000, Official Report, column 574W, on Public Sector Workers (Home Loans), whether a nurse (a) in the NHS and (b) employed in a private sector hospital granted a preferential loan for housing by (i) the Department of Health, (ii) the Exchequer and (iii) the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, would be liable for tax and national insurance contributions on that loan. [129714]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 7 July 2000]: On the basis that the nurse would not be an employee of a Government Department and the loan was neither guaranteed nor facilitated by the nurse's employer, the nurse would not be liable to income tax or national insurance contributions on the loan.

Judicial Review

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library copies of the evidence which he has disclosed in the judicial review application of Williams Jeffery Barber on behalf of the National Crime Squad and others. [128922]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Although the Chancellor is under no obligation to publish the evidence that is disclosed in a judicial review, a copy of the witness statement prepared by the Treasury for the judicial review will be placed in the Library.

Council Tax

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) pensioners and (b) non-pensioner households spend more than 10 per cent. of their total expenditure on council tax. [125925]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 14 June 2000]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Christopher Chope, dated 10 July 2000:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking about spending on council tax. (125925)

The Family Expenditure Survey shows an estimated 230,000 pensioner households and 500,000 non-pensioner households in Great Britain spent more than 10 per cent. of their total expenditure on council tax in 1998–99, after deducting any discounts or benefits. Total expenditure is all spending on goods and services including mortgage interest, but excluding saving and investment, life assurance and medical insurance payments, and purchase or alteration of dwellings.

Like all estimates from sample surveys, these figures are subject to sampling variability.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate he has made of the cost of Working Families Tax Credit payments to families in receipt of child support payments; [128330]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of families in receipt of both child support payments and Working Families Tax Credit. [128331]

Dawn Primarolo: A reliable estimate of the number of families in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) and which also receive maintenance payments is not yet available. All maintenance received is disregarded for WFTC, and the amount of maintenance received cannot be determined from the information processed for applications for WFTC. Household survey data available for analysis do not yet cover families receiving WFTC.

DEFENCE

Shipbuilding

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reviews of British shipbuilding capabilities and capacity he is conducting; and if he will make a statement. [128770]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Quentin Davies, dated 11 July 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about reviews of British shipbuilding capabilities and capacities. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The Ministry of Defence keeps British shipbuilding capabilities and capacity under regular review, in consultation with other Government Departments, Trade Unions and representatives of the shipbuilding industry.

UK Shipbuilding yards play a crucial role in supplying warships and major vessels to the Royal Navy and Royal Fleet Auxiliary. As you are no doubt aware, the Strategic Defence Review announced a considerable commitment to the UK Shipbuilding Industry over the next 15–20 years; through major ship programmes, including the Future Aircraft Carrier, the Type 45 Destroyers and the Future Surface Combatant. These programmes provide a secure long-term platform for the UK Shipbuilding Industry to increase its efficiency and effectiveness.

Personal Weapons

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personal weapons, and of which types, have been procured in each of the past five years; and how many are planned to be procured in the next five years. [128772]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Quentin Davies, dated 11 July 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the number and type of personal weapons that have been procured in the past 5 years and how many are planned to be procured in the next five years. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The following personal weapons have been procured for the Armed services in the last 5 years:—

Weapon type	1995	1996	1997	1998	1999	2000
Sub-machine guns	—	8	—	2	—	36
Shotguns	—	—	—	100	—	—
Pistols	—	—	—	—	491	—
Specialist rifles	—	—	—	—	—	139
New special forces small arm	—	—	—	—	—	1,380
Total per year	—	8	—	102	491	1,555

At present there are only two future purchases planned in the next five years: the Personal Defence Weapon, which will replace the current in-service 9 mm pistol, where we plan to procure up to 15,000 weapons and a small buy of about 20 large calibre Sniper Rifles.

Search Systems

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what his Department's plans are for the incremental acquisition of new equipment on to the Nimrod MRA4; and if he will make a statement; [128711]

(2) how the Active Search Sonobuoy System will be capable of discriminating real submarine targets from false acoustic alarms; and if he will make a statement; [128709]

(3) how long the procurement of the Active Search Sonobuoy System will take; and if he will make a statement. [128710]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Paul Keetch, dated 11 July 2000:

I am replying to your three questions (Nos 128709–128711) to the Secretary of State for Defence about the Nimrod MRA4 and Active Search Sonobuoy System. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

You asked about the Department's plans for the incremental acquisition of new equipment onto the Nimrod MRA4. As this aircraft is still in development, it is too early for a comprehensive plan of future enhancements to be drawn up. Nevertheless the opportunities offered under the Smart Procurement Initiative, through incremental acquisition, will be actively pursued at the appropriate time. At present, there is one new system which is being progressed with the aim of enhancing the aircraft's capability, that is the SR(SA)903 Active Search Sonobuoy System (ASSS).

You also asked how ASSS will be capable of discriminating real submarine targets from false acoustic alarms. ASSS will use sophisticated software which will analyse the acoustic signature of the contacts picked up by the sonobuoy. These solution algorithms will be able to discriminate real from false targets.

Your final question asked how long the procurement of the ASSS will take. Subject to the project being approved next year, the plan will be to deliver an ASSS capability in line with the In-Service Date of the main Nimrod MRA4 programme (March 2005).

BNFL (Berkeley Centre)

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made on the work for his Department being undertaken at the BNFL magnox facility at Berkeley Centre in Gloucestershire. [130418]

Mr. Spellar: The work undertaken for the Department by BNFL Magnox, Berkeley Centre, has been very successful, but it did not commence until June 1999 and has taken longer than anticipated because of problems developing the experimental apparatus. Further examination of spent fuel is taking place and it is now planned that the site will revert to its fully safeguarded status by 30 September 2000.

Airborne Early Warning Capability

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to acquire a future naval airborne early warning capability; and if he will make a statement. [129228]

Dr. Moonie: We plan to acquire a Future Organic Airborne Early Warning (FOAEW) system to replace the capability currently provided by Sea King airborne early warning helicopters. FOAEW will operate from the Future Aircraft Carrier (CVF) and complement the deployment of the Future Carrier Borne Aircraft (FCBA). It will mount powerful radar systems to provide wide sensor coverage against both air and surface threats, and command and control for operations by the carrier air group. Expressions of interest for participation in the programme were sought from industry in February 2000. The planned in-service date for FOAEW is 2012.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Sea King airborne early warning variants are in service; how old they are; and how many are operationally available. [129229]

Dr. Moonie: There are 13 Sea King Airborne Early Warning helicopters in service. Of these, nine are operationally available, with the remainder undergoing major maintenance programmes and a capability upgrade. Ten of the airframes were first delivered to the Royal Navy between 1969 and 1971 and converted to the Airborne Early Warning variant between 1982 and 1987. The other three airframes first entered Service as in between 1985 and 1986, being converted during 1997 and 1998.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to withdraw the (a) Sea King airborne early warning and (b) Type 22 Batch II frigates from service. [129230]

Mr. Spellar: There are currently no plans to withdraw the Sea King Airborne Early Warning (Mk 2/7) aircraft from service.

Plans for the withdrawal from service of the Type 22 Batch 2 frigates currently in service are as follows:

HMS Sheffield

2012—to be superseded by a T45 Destroyer

HMS Coventry

2001—to be superseded by HMS St. Albans, a T23 Frigate.

Type 23 Frigates

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which of the Type 23 Frigates are due for refit in the next 12 months. [129231]

Dr. Moonie: One Type 23 Frigate, HMS Iron Duke, is due to start refit at Rosyth Royal Dockyard in spring 2001.

RAF Aircraft

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the Royal Air Force's total inventory of Tornado F3s; and how many are operationally available; [128708]

(2) what is the Royal Air Force's total inventory of (a) Harrier GR7s, (b) Tornado GR1s and (c) Jaguar GR1s; and how many in (a), (b) and (c) are operationally available; [128706]

(3) how many Tornado GR4s are in operational service; [128705]

(4) how many (a) Tornado GR1, (b) Tornado F3 and (c) Jaguar GR1 are held in reserve; and how long it would take for the aircraft in (a), (b) and (c) to be returned to front-line duties; [128707]

(5) how many Nimrod MR2s are (a) in service, (b) operationally available and (c) in the process of being upgraded to MR4 standard. [128703]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is detailed in the table:

Aircraft type	Total RAF inventory	Operating fleet[1]	Sustainment fleet[2]	Aircraft in storage
Tornado F3	[3]138	85	29	—
Tornado GR1	110	73	[4]36	1
Tornado GR4	64	52	[5]12	—
Jaguar GR1/GR3/GR3A	[6]98	38	7	12
Harrier GR7	75[7]	52	[7]23	—
Nimrod MR2	[8]22	18	4	—

[1] Aircraft available to operational commanders

[2] Aircraft needed to sustain operations through major maintenance and upgrades

[3] 24 Tornado F3 currently not required by the RAF are on loan to the Italian Air Force

[4] 20 of these GR1 currently in conversion to GR4

[5] Three of these GR4 aircraft are on loan to DERA for trials

[6] 41 Jaguar GR1 are used as Ground Instructional Aircraft and are not available to fly

[7] Four of these Harrier GR7 are on loan to DERA for trials

[8] The Nimrod MR2s will be replaced by 21 Nimrod MRA4. Six airframes are currently in conversion to MRA4

The degree of operational urgency and availability of resources would dictate the time it would take to restore Tornado and Jaguar airframes in storage to front-line duties.

SIFF Programme

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the Successor SIFF programme, indicating when a final decision will be made. [129388]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 127W, by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces.

RAF Mildenhall

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Polish contractors were invited to bid for work on a support centre at RAF Mildenhall; and what reasons underlay the decision to include these contractors in the bidding process. [129403]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 6 July 2000]: Two Polish contractors, Exbud Joint Stock Company and Mostostal Zabrze Holding, were invited to tender for the contract to provide an Operations Support Centre at RAF Mildenhall.

The reasons for including these firms in the bidding process stem from Poland's membership of NATO.

The Support Centre at RAF Mildenhall has been identified as being eligible for NATO funding under NATO's Security Investment Programme (NSIP). The contract for this work has been opened to International Competitive Bidding (ICB).

Under ICB arrangements, firms nominated by NATO member nations that contribute to the NSIP funding must be invited to tender for the work.

The two firms in question were nominated by the Polish Embassy in London and invited to bid.

During the tender period both Exbud and Mostostal Zabrze declined to tender.

Meteorological Office

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost to the Meteorological Office of the recruitment campaign undertaken in late 1999 and January seeking extra observers, including the cost of press advertisements. [129453]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Meteorological Office. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. and learned Member.

Letter from Peter Ewins to Mr. James Wallace, dated 11 July 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the cost to The Met. Office of the recruitment campaign undertaken in late 1999 and January seeking extra observers. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of The Met. Office.

The cost of the campaign, including the cost of press advertisement, was £26,340.

Submarines

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the location and operational status is of each of the Royal Navy's (a) Trafalgar Class and (b) Swiftsure Class submarines. [129858]

Mr. Hoon: (a) Of the Royal Navy's seven Trafalgar Class submarines, three are operationally available and four are in refit, extended maintenance or repair.

(b) Of the RN's five Swiftsure Class, three are operationally available and two are in refit, extended maintenance or repair.

Class	Operational or engaged in preparing for service, trials or training	Undergoing refit, extended maintenance or repair
Swiftsure	Sovereign Splendid Superb	Sceptre (Rosyth) Spartan (Rosyth)
Trafalgar	Trafalgar Triumph Turbulent	Talent (Devonport) Tireless (Gibraltar) Torbay (Devonport) Trenchant (Devonport)

The specific operational status and location of each operational submarine is classified for security reasons and is being withheld under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Balkans

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the proportion of cluster munitions dropped by the RAF in Kosovo that failed to explode. [129934]

Mr. Spellar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) on 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 59W.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what money has been allocated to the clearance of unexploded ordnance, with particular reference to cluster munitions dropped by the RAF in Kosovo. [129936]

Mr. Spellar: While British forces continue to play a part—particularly in the clearance of unexploded ordnance—clear-up and reconstruction after a conflict are matters for civil agencies within the international community rather than specifically for the Ministry of Defence.

The Department for International Development provided more than £7 million during the 1999–2000 financial year for the clearance of mines and unexploded ordnance in Kosovo. So far, a further £6.6 million has been committed in the current financial year.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Army reservists in total have served in Kosovo, Macedonia and Albania since the beginning of the conflict there last year. [129935]

Mr. Spellar: Since December 1998, we have mobilised 555 members of the Territorial Army and 253 Regular Reservists for service in Kosovo, Macedonia and Albania, making a total of 808 reservists.

Ceremonial

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the benefits of (a) Trooping the Colour and (b) Beating the Retreat in formulating his policy on each ceremony. [128808]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 3 July 2000]: The Trooping of the Colour is a birthday parade laid on by the Household Division for Her Majesty the Queen as their Sovereign and Colonel in Chief. Beating the Retreat raises funds for service charities. Both events are a traditional display of pageantry and the excellent skills of our service personnel and increase the standing and esteem of the armed forces in the eyes of the public.

These are important factors in our current planning for armed forces events to be held in London annually from 2001 onwards.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 26 June 2000, Official Report, column 408W, on departmental vehicles, if he will list the number of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles by make and model. [129075]

Mr. Spellar: I have arranged for a list showing the number of vehicles by make to be placed in the Library of the House. A further breakdown of the 23,000 vehicles by model could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

SA80 Refit

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reasons have been given by Heckler and Koch for the SA80 refit to be carried out in Germany. [129665]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 7 July 2000]: Royal Ordnance submitted a bid to the Ministry of Defence on the basis that the bulk of the modification programme should be carried out at Heckler and Koch's Obendorf facility where the original modifications were designed and implemented. The company has indicated that to carry out the modification work elsewhere would require it to invest in the acquisition of new specialist tooling equipment and the transfer of technical expertise from Obendorf, and maintains that conducting the modification work there represents the lowest risk to the timescale and cost of the programme. Equally, early indications are that work on stripping and refurbishment of weapons prior to modification could most sensibly be done in the UK.

General Purpose Machine Gun

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the current timescale is for phasing out the use of the General Purpose Machine Gun. [129667]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The General Purpose Machine Gun (GPMG) in the Light Role is due to be withdrawn from service in 2015; those variants that are mounted onto vehicles or helicopters will be withdrawn in line with the relevant out of service date for the platform.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the facilities (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere which (i) manufacture the general purpose machine gun barrel and (ii) are capable of manufacturing the general purpose machine gun barrel. [129668]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 7 July 2000]: In the UK, the Nottingham Small Arms Factory, which trades as H&K UK Ltd. located within RO Nottingham, is capable of manufacturing the general purpose machine gun (GPMG) barrel. Elsewhere, the Heckler and Koch (H&K) facility at Oberndorf, Germany and the Fabrique Nationale (FN) facility at Herstal, Belgium also have the capability to manufacture the GPMG barrel.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many general purpose machine guns (a) are in service and (b) were received into service in each of the last five years. [129666]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 7 July 2000]: There are currently some 11,300 general purpose machine guns (GPMG) in service. No purchases of the GPMG have been made in any of the last five years.

Small Arms

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what facilities in the United Kingdom are capable of high volume production of small arms at short notice; and of these, which have test and range facilities. [129664]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 7 July 2000]: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Chinook Crash

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in relation to the 1994 Chinook crash, (1) what assessment he has made of the state of health of Flight Lieutenant Tapper (a) five minutes, (b) four minutes, (c) three minutes, (d) two minutes and (e) one minute before the crash; [129288]

(2) what assessment he has made of the state of health of Flight Lieutenant Cook (a) five minutes, (b) four minutes, (c) three minutes, (d) two minutes and (e) one minute before the crash. [129289]

Mr. Spellar: The RAF Board of Inquiry determined that Flight Lieutenants Tapper and Cook were free from emotional stress, and were well rested and physically fit prior to commencing duty on 2 June 1994. A complete medical examination of their bodies was carried out after the crash by a team headed by a consultant forensic pathologist. This showed that both were in good health and had taken neither alcohol nor drugs. Nothing was found to suggest that an explosion or any noxious agent played any part in the accident. The Board of Inquiry concluded that the mental and physical state of Flight Lieutenants Tapper and Cook was most unlikely to have been a factor in the accident.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pesticides

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice to local education authorities and to schools his Department has given on the use of the organophosphate pesticide chlorpyrifos in proprietary products. [129992]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 10 July 2000]: Proprietary insecticides whose active ingredient is Chlorpyrifos, an organophosphate, continue to be available for use within schools and in school grounds. However, the HSE/DETR, MAFF and the Advisory Committee on Pesticides are currently looking at the implications for the use of these products in the UK, following the recent American restrictions on their use.

The precautionary procedures for dealing with risks from pesticides do not depend on special instructions being issued to schools. They rely on: approved uses for products; instructions for use, on the product and the packaging; and the design of suitable containers for the products.

Teenage Pregnancy

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many 16 and 17-year-old parents (a) have taken and (b) are taking part in the education maintenance allowance pilots following the publication of the Social Exclusion Unit report, "Teenage Pregnancy", in June 1999. [129254]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 10 July 2000]: This information is not available at the present time. There is no special treatment of teenage parents in the main EMA pilots, but the evaluation should provide an indication of the numbers involved and will provide an assessment of any factors which are particularly relevant to teenage parents. The first results from this evaluation should be available towards the end of this year. Also, from September, two of the 15 original EMA pilot areas (Stoke-on-Trent and Cornwall) will test out additional flexibilities intended to help teenage parents participate in education, while still maintaining the 'something for something' principle.

Residential Care Homes

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment with what frequency residential care homes are subject to Ofsted inspections; and what the Chief Inspector's assessment is of the educational standards of residential care establishments. [129771]

Ms Estelle Morris: Ofsted inspects and reports upon residential independent schools catering for pupils with special educational needs, which are registered as schools and children's homes, at least once in a six-year period. At the request of the Social Services Inspectorate, Ofsted participates in inspections of Secure Units, which take place at intervals of approximately three years. Ofsted does not inspect the education provided in other types of residential care establishments for young people. HM Chief Inspector's annual report for 1998–99 contains sections about residential special schools (page 59) and the education of young people in secure accommodation (pages 64–65).

Ritalin

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what guidance he issues to schools regarding the use of Ritalin; [129957]

(2) what recent representations he has received on the use of Ritalin. [129958]

Jacqui Smith: My Department and the Department of Health have jointly issued a good practice guide, "Supporting Pupils with Medical Needs", which includes general advice for schools on dealing with medicines safely. It also provides guidance on drawing up individual health care plans for pupils with medical needs, which could include the use of Ritalin if appropriate. My Department has not issued other specific guidance to schools on the use of Ritalin, and we have not received any representations recently on this issue.

Inner-city Schools

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent steps he has taken to improve standards in inner-city schools. [129439]

Ms Estelle Morris: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 3 July 2000, Official Report, columns 75–76W.

Bladder Problems (Women)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans the Women's Unit has to commission research into the effect of bladder problems on the quality of life of women affected by the condition. [129125]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 6 July 2000]: The Women's Unit has no plans to commission research into the effect of bladder problems on the quality of life of women affected by the condition.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what evidence he has received concerning the number of women over the age of 35 who experience bladder problems; and if he will make a statement. [129124]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 6 July 2000]: I have not, in my capacity as Minister responsible for Women, received any evidence concerning the number of women over the age of 35 who experience bladder problems. However, the Department of Health statistics show that 68,410 women aged 35 and over with bladder problems were admitted to NHS hospitals in England during the period 1998–99.

Student Drop-outs

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the drop-out rate was for students on courses of further education in the most recent academic year for which figures are available. [129704]

Mr. Wicks: Published figures are in terms of the median college in-year retention rate, which in 1997–98 was 87 per cent. for full-time students and 84 per cent. for part-time students.

Standards Funds

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how he will ensure that education authorities which have a below average Standard Spending Assessment per pupil are able to take full advantage of the money offered through the Standards Fund. [129696]

Ms Estelle Morris: For 2000–01, local education authorities have now accepted over 98 per cent. of the allocations offered to them through the Standards Fund. Most authorities accepted their allocations in full, including authorities that have below average standard spending assessments per pupil. The requirement for authorities to contribute to the Standards Fund was allowed for in the 5.4 per cent. increase in education Standard Spending Assessment. In addition, schools have received a share of the £290 million funding increase announced in the budget to further drive up standards, and benefit from their share of the £50 million extra in grant for general support of school budgets announced in November. Since 1997, spending per pupil has increased £300 in real terms.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what monitoring is undertaken of Private Finance Initiative contracts for (a) schools, (b) further education colleges and (c) higher education institutions; and if he will make a statement. [129203]

Mr. Wicks: Responsibility for monitoring PFI projects lies with the relevant procuring body. For schools, monitoring is the responsibility of local education authorities or other procuring bodies. The Department informs the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions about services and payments arising from new projects, so that the overall level of revenue commitments can be monitored.

The Further Education Funding Council supports colleges in developing projects and monitors educational achievement, financial returns and the efficient use of property. The Higher Education Funding Council for England monitors progress by requiring higher education institutions to submit progress reports on PFI contracts as part of their annual financial forecasts.

The Department works closely with LEAs and the Funding Councils to ensure that procedures are in place to monitor progress and value for money effectively.

Correspondence

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the hon. Member for Broxbourne will receive a reply to her letters to him of 14 April, 11 May, 8 June and 6 July, relating to her constituent, the Secretary of the East Hertfordshire Branch of the National Union of Teachers. [130117]

Mr. Wills: A reply will be issued today.

Undergraduates

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many home-domiciled applicants aged under 21 there were to (a) full-time and (b) sandwich undergraduate courses in each of the last three years; and how many acceptances there were onto such courses, indicating (i) the proportion of the age group in each socio-economic group this represents and (ii) the proportion of acceptances that were (A) to former polytechnics and (B) accepted in an institution in the locality of the applicant's home address. [127724]

Mr. Wicks: The available information is shown in the table.

Applicants and acceptances to full-time and sandwich undergraduate courses in the UK via the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS)

Home domiciled students aged under 21

	1997	1998	1999
Applicants	300,926	303,729	306,809
Acceptances	237,519	239,663	245,626
Percentage of acceptances to former polytechnics	35.2	35.5	35.1
Percentage of acceptances to institutions in the applicant's home region[1]	42.2	42.3	43.5
Participation rates by social class[2]
Non-manual household head[4]	48	45	[3]45–46
Manual household head[5]	18	17	[3]17–18

[1] Based on Standard Statistical Regions in 1997 and Government office Regions in 1998 and 1999. Data at a more disaggregated geographical level are not available centrally.

[2] Derived from the number of initial entrants to full-time undergraduate courses and population data from the 1991 census.

[3] Provisional estimates.

[4] Social Classes, I, II, IIIN (Professional, Intermediate, Skilled non-manual).

[5] Classes IIIM, IV, V (Skilled manual, Partly skilled, Unskilled).

The social class mix of the underlying population is taken directly from the 1991 Census. Over time this approach becomes less reliable, particularly at a disagreggated level and the social class groupings have therefore been aggregated.

Over the period shown, participation rates of young people by social class have fluctuated in line with overall participation. These overall trends in part reflect a large increase in the size of the age-group and the decision by some students to pull forward their year of entry to higher education from 1998 to 1997 in advance of the introduction of fees. Over the same period the proportion of young students who come from the lower social classes (IIIM, IV, V) has remained constant at around 27 per cent. and the proportion who come from the higher social classes (I, II, IIIN) has remained at around 73 per cent.

HEALTH

Health Authorities

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which (a) NHS trusts and (b) health authorities fall within which parliamentary constituencies. [129460]

Ms Stuart: A copy of the information available has been placed in the Library. The information refers only to England and does not contain a direct mapping of constituency to trust, only health authority to trust and health authority to constituency.

Press Releases

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many press releases his Department has issued in the first six months of the present year. [130188]

Ms Stuart: The Department has issued 395 press releases in the first six months of the present year.

Osteopathy

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what arrangements will be made to support students (a) financially and (b) otherwise in obtaining a professionally recognised osteopathy qualification who are currently students at the John Wernham College of Classical Osteopathy; [130017]

(2) how many students will be affected by the decision of the General Osteopathic Council to refuse accreditation to (a) the John Wernham College of Classical Osteopathy and (b) similar colleges in the UK; [130015]

(3) how many vacancies exist in the UK on osteopathy courses accredited by the General Osteopathic Council; [130016]

(4) what discussions he has had with the General Osteopathic Council regarding the decision to refuse accreditation to the John Wernham College of Classical Osteopathy; and if he will make a statement. [130013]

Yvette Cooper: I have had no discussions with the General Osteopathic Council (GOsC) on these matters. Under the Osteopaths Act 1993, the GOsC may formally recognise osteopathic qualifications for the purposes of statutory registration with the approval of the Privy Council. However, the Act does not require the GOsC to seek the approval of the Privy Council for any decision it makes not to recognise a qualification. I understand that the John Wernham College of Classical Osteopathy has been given leave to apply for a judicial review of GOsC's decision in its case.

The Department has been informed that some 75 students at the John Wernham College are likely to be affected by the GOsC's decision not to recognise its qualification. The college, and its validating body the North East Surrey College of Technology, are responsible for advising and assisting those students. The GOsC has no statutory duty to assist students in these circumstances but has requested that all schools of osteopathy applying to have their qualifications recognised prepare a contingency plan in the event that their applications are unsuccessful. It is now trying to assist the John Wernham College to activate its contingency plan.

The GOsC has recognised osteopathic qualifications provided by five other schools. The Department has been informed that these currently cater for around 850 students in total but the Department does not have information on any vacancies that may exist.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Lightbulbs

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what percentage of lightbulbs used in the House are low energy. [129379]

Sir Sydney Chapman: Some 75 per cent. of lightbulbs on the parliamentary estate are of the low energy type. More light fittings will be adapted for low energy lightbulbs during the Summer Adjournment as part of a continuing exercise.

Recycling

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee in what location in the House waste paper for recycling is sorted from other waste. [129383]

Sir Sydney Chapman: Under the present waste disposal contract, Vote Office waste paper is recycled and other waste paper is incinerated to generate electricity for the national grid; competitive tendering showed that it would cost an additional £250,000 to separate more waste paper for recycling. The Accommodation and Works Committee has, however, resolved that the issue should be considered again when the contracts are next retendered.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what plans there are to introduce facilities for the recycling of (a) plastics, (b) aluminium and steel and (c) glass in the House. [129377]

Sir Sydney Chapman: The House has a contract with London Waste Ltd. for waste disposal. As part of the disposal process, the company recovers ferrous and non-ferrous metals for recycling; glass is also recycled separately. General kitchen waste and packaging are incinerated, generating electricity for the national grid.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what percentage of electricity used in the House is supplied from renewable sources. [129378]

Sir Sydney Chapman: At present none of the energy used in the House is from renewable sources. Power for the House is purchased in the competitive market on the basis of lowest price, and energy from renewable sources has proved more expensive in the past. It is the intention to obtain prices for renewable energy as part of the exercise to renew contracts for electricity supplies later this year.

Annunciators

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee how many annunciators there are in the House. [129380]

Sir Sydney Chapman: There are 900 annunciators in the Palace of Westminster, and 1,718 on the Parliamentary estate as a whole.

Paper

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee (1) what was the volume of paper provided by the House in each of the last three years; [129381]

(2) what percentage of paper provided by the House in the last 12 months was made from recycled paper. [129382]

Mrs. Roe: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms; I have asked him to write to the hon. Member.

Organic Food and Drink

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee what percentage of food and drink served in the House is organic. [129376]

Mr. Dennis Turner: The House of Commons Refreshment Department does not compile any statistics on the quantity of organic food and drink purchased or sold through its catering operations. The Department is a member of the Soil Association and recognises the significant demand for organic produce. Last year the Department introduced, on a trial basis, an organic menu in the Members' Dining Room. While indisputably popular with its customers, the menu was reluctantly discontinued as a consequence of the inconsistent availability and quality of supply, and the high cost of such produce. The Department now pursues a policy of purchasing organic produce or ingredients wherever consistent availability and quality can be guaranteed by suppliers, and where it is judged that the price to be passed on to the Department's customers is affordable.

Environmental Performance

Mr. Brake: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what (a) measures and (b) targets have been established relating to the use by the House of Commons' of resources and the Government's targets for environmental performance. [129317]

Mr. Kirkwood: The Parliamentary Works Directorate is preparing to operate an environmental management system under ISO 14001. Using the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate (PACE) methodology, which was recently promulgated, measurements are being made of the percentage of our total office waste which is recovered. Targets for improvement are then to be set. Energy usage is closely monitored and significant savings will be achieved when Portcullis House is occupied and other buildings are vacated.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by her Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130037]

Clare Short: In line with Treasury guidance my Department's standard payment terms commit us to paying bills within 30 days of receipt of the goods or services or the presentation of a valid invoice, whichever is the later. The percentage of invoices settled within the 30 day period during the last financial year was 96.8 per cent. The comparable figure for 1998–99 was 96.3 per cent. We do not generally enter into different payment terms.

Bangladesh

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if Bangladesh qualifies for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative. [129595]

Clare Short: From the latest information available, Bangladesh's debt sustainability ratios are below the minimum thresholds used by the enhanced Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative, which means that it would not qualify for debt relief.

For a country to receive HIPC debt relief, it requires not only unsustainable levels of debt, but also a commitment to poverty reduction and reform. In the case of Bangladesh, any consideration of debt relief would be likely to require further progress in areas such as public expenditure allocations on essential services for poor people, measures to improve the quality of public services, improving revenue administration, and a serious start on structural measures such as financial sector and public enterprise reform.

Our substantial aid programme to Bangladesh—£65 million in 1999–2000—focuses on promoting the reduction of poverty both directly and by addressing constraints on faster pro-poor growth and improved governance.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many of her Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129615]

Clare Short: My Department has no telephone lines used by the general public that are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many agencies of her Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129632]

Clare Short: This Department does not have any agencies.

WALES

Inward Investment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the prospects for inward investment to Wales; and if he will make a statement. [129499]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular discussions with the First Secretary about a range of topics including the prospects for inward investment to Wales.

Wales continues to do well in attracting inward investment, but cannot afford to be complacent in the face of increasingly severe competition. Every effort is being made to raise awareness of Wales and to improve the potential for investment. The National Assembly, Welsh Development Agency and others will continue to keep existing measures under review. I believe that this will place Wales in a good position to exploit all opportunities for securing future investment.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the PFI contracts entered into by the Welsh Office prior to July 1999, indicating (a) their dates of commencement, (b) their value, (c) if they have been subject to refinancing and (d) if his Office has a claw-back entitlement to share in savings arising from refinancing. [129060]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information requested is as follows:

OSIRIS—IT Network

(a) June 1996
(b) £48 million
(c) No
(d) Not applicable

A55 Anglesey Dualling

(a) December 1998
(b) £110 million
(c) No
(d) Not applicable.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129477]

Mr. Paul Murphy: From 1989 to 1 July 1999 it was not the policy of the Welsh Office to write annually to members of staff who pay reduced rate National Insurance contributions.

The Wales Office does not currently have any staff who pay such a reduced rate, but it is intended that an office notice will be issued annually, to remind any member of staff who may be paying reduced rates of the necessity of informing Personnel of any change in circumstances.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130044]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The percentage of currently presented bills paid by my Department within 30 days of receipt of the valid invoice or the satisfactory receipt of goods/services, whichever was the later, or the agreed contractual terms if otherwise specified, was (a) 97 per cent. for 1989–99 and (b) 97 per cent. for 1999–2000.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Saudi Oil

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the oil trade component in the Al Yamamah agreements with Saudi Arabia; and what assessment he has made of the impact of oil price changes on those arrangements with Saudi Arabia since 1985. [129362]

Mr. Hoon: I have been asked to reply.

Details of the funding arrangements under the Al Yamamah agreements are confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the United Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and I am therefore withholding that information under the provisions of Exemption 1 of Part II of the Code of Practice on access to Government Information. However, the funding arrangements of the Al Yamamah programme are kept under review by both the Ministry of Defence and the Saudi Arabian Government and adjustments have been made periodically in response to prevailing economic conditions.

Research Councils

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money each research council allocated to the public understanding of science in each year since 1994. [128278]

Ms Hewitt: Research Council expenditure on public understanding of science activities in the years 1994–95 to 1999–2000 was as follows:

Research Council Public Understanding Spend

£million

	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
BBSRC	0.28	0.32	0.40	0.40	0.60	0.80
EPSRC	0.55	0.93	0.93	0.93	0.93	0.93
ESRC	—	—	0.53	0.59	0.54	0.75
MRC	0.10	0.30	0.20	0.33	0.66	0.51
NERC	0.16	0.16	0.14	0.23	0.15	0.15
PPARC	0.20	0.20	0.32	0.33	0.44	0.53
Total	1.29	1.91	2.52	2.81	3.32	3.67

In the case of MRC and ESRC these figures also include some public relations activity not accounted for separately.

These figures do not include public understanding work undertaken by Research Council grant holders as a condition of their grant, as figures on this activity are generally not available. However, as an example, BBSRC estimates that the value of such activity undertaken by its own grant holders totals at least £3 million per annum. The figures also exclude the significant amount of activity undertaken by Research Council funded institutes/centres, figures for which are not available centrally.

Engineering

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) steps he has taken and (b) funding has been allocated to promote (i) science engineering and (ii) other science activities to (A) children and (B) the public in each year since 1994. [128277]

Ms Hewitt: There is a great deal of activity led by industrial interests and charities to which the Government's efforts are complementary. The Government support a range of activities to promote science and engineering to children and the general public. We also consider that it is important to do more than promote science and engineering, and takes steps to involve the public over major scientific issues and to increase the opportunities for dialogue. Except for some very specific activities, it is not practicable to provide accurate total costings of promotional activities or to provide a breakdown for the cost of activities aimed at children.

My Department's largest investment is through the Science Budget grant-aided activities of the Research Councils, who all have science promotion as one of their responsibilities. Estimates of expenditure by the Research Councils are given in answer to the preceding question. The Royal Society also undertakes activities in this area some of which are grant-aided from the Science Budget at about £1 million per annum, and supports among other things the activities of COPUS.

The Department also administers two main programmes. A general programme administered by the Office of Science and Technology (OST), provides core funding to the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and funds the BA's co-ordination of National Science Week. It also provides additional support for the COPUS grants scheme, including its projects aimed specifically at promoting SET for women and ethnic minorities, and funds innovative projects aimed at bringing science to a wider audience through, for example, drama, art, and the Internet. In order to gain a better understanding of the public's attitudes to science, the OST also funded last year's 'Public Consultation on Developments in the Biosciences', and this year, in partnership with the Wellcome Trust, has undertaken a survey looking at public attitudes to science in the UK. The OST's budget for these activities in 1994–95 was £1.0 million, and has since risen to an average of £1.25 million per annum.

The second main programme, supported from the Department's Innovation Budget specifically supports engineering and has had several manifestations since 1994. They include:

> The Action for Engineering (AfE) Initiative ran from October 1994 to June 1996. AfE brought together 125 people representing industry, education, the engineering profession and Government to take co-ordinated action to increase substantially the influence, involvement and achievement of professional engineers for the benefit of British industry. A total of £820,000 was spent under this programme over the period 1994 to 1999.
>
> One of the key outcomes of AfE was the establishment of the Science Engineering Technology Mathematics Network (SETNET), which has the objective of bringing coherence and co-ordination to the many schemes and resources aimed at fostering the teaching and learning of engineering related subjects (the sciences, mathematics, design and technology) in schools. In the period 1996–99, SETNET received funding of half a million pounds. A further £260,000 has been committed in this financial year to enable SETNET to plan for expansion of its network of SETpoints.
> The Year of Engineering Success (YES), which followed AfE in January 1997, was an industry led initiative that received some £520,000 in Government support. It was aimed at increasing the awareness of the vital contribution of engineering to the nation's success and prosperity, through an ambitious public participation exercise during the calendar year 1997.
> The Campaign to Promote Engineering (CPE) was formally launched in July 1998 following the conclusion of the YES. Funding of up to £425,000 per annum was approved in February 1999 for an initial three years with an option for a further two years after review.

The various scientific advisory bodies, including those that fall within my Department's responsibilities all see engagement of the general public as an important part of their activities, and the Chief Scientific Adviser's Guidelines on the use of scientific advice in policy-making stress the importance of transparency.

"Made in Britain"

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what "Made in Britain" emblems are available from his Department to British companies to mark the country of origin of their products. [125677]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 12 June 2000]: None.

Royal Mail

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the disruption to post for businesses as a result of recent industrial action at Royal Mail offices in North London; and if he will make a statement. [130187]

Mr. Byers: This is an operational matter for the Post Office.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding Royal Mail's decision to cease the use of private motor vehicles for delivery; and what assessment he has made of its impact upon service in rural areas. [129983]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 10 July 2000]: I have received no representations on this matter. Such decisions are an operational matter for the Post Office. I understand that Royal Mail does not plan any deliveries on the basis of the use of private cars and that all deliveries have a designated mode of official transport. However, some employees have preferred to use their own private vehicles to travel to and from their deliveries. I understand that a pilot scheme to discontinue the use of private motor vehicles on delivery has had no impact on service.

Japanese Automotive Companies

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence underlay the statement in his Department's recent memorandum to the Trade and Industry Committee concerning the total amount of inward investment in the UK planned by Japanese automotive companies. [130047]

Ms Hewitt: The total amount of inward investment in the UK referred to in the memorandum represents commitments made by Japanese automotive companies in manufacturing facilities in the UK, some of which has yet to be spent.

Vehicle Manufacturing

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence underlay the statement in his Department's recent memorandum to the Trade and Industry Committee on the competitive environment for vehicle manufacturing in the UK. [130046]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The recent problems at BMW and Ford are not indicative of the general state of the UK vehicle manufacturing industry. The evidence points to a robust UK vehicle manufacturing industry: in 1999 car exports at 1.1 million were the highest ever; UK sales were the 4th highest on record and UK car production at its highest level since 1972[1].

Significant new investment continues, with c£2.0 billion worth of capital expenditure and c8,000 new jobs announced since 1997. This year alone (2000) GM/Vauxhall has announced a £189 million investment plan for its three UK plants and Honda £130 million for the modernisation of its manufacturing line at Swindon.

We consider that this demonstrates that a positive environment exists in the UK in which to do business.

SMMT

Post Offices

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 22W, to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) how many post offices there are in each constituency; and how many of them are operating unprofitably in each constituency. [130050]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that the information given in the answer to the hon. Member for Erdington on 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 22W, remains the most recent data available on the number of post offices in each parliamentary constituency.

I would also refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 5 July 2000, Official Report, column 210W.

BNFL

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the MOX fuel supplied to Japan by BNFL in respect of which data had been falsified. [130369]

Mrs. Liddell: I am pleased that agreement on a resolution to this problem has today been reached. BNFL has agreed that it should bring back to the UK the fuel at Takahama in Japan. BNFL's Japanese customer, Kansai Electric Power Company, has today announced that it has lifted the moratorium that it imposed on BNFL on 17 January this year on new reprocessing and MOX business with Japan.

The Government have long recognised that finding a solution to this problem, while primarily a matter between the two companies, gave rise to various inter-government issues, including on implementation of the return of fuel. These considerations are set out in an agreement that the Government have today signed with the Government of Japan. There are two aspects to this inter-governmental agreement, an understanding based on our discussions with the Government of Japan, and a letter from my Department to Kansai Electric Power Company. Both documents are being placed in the Library of the House.

Small Businesses

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what operational targets he has set for the Small Business Service for 2000–01. [130370]

Ms Hewitt: The Small Business Service (SBS) was established on 1 April. The Framework Document, which sets out the relationship between the SBS and the Department of Trade and Industry, has already been placed in the Library of the House.

I have agreed with David Irwin, the Chief Executive, that the mission of the SBS should be to build an enterprise society in which all small businesses thrive and achieve their potential.

The aims of the SBS are:

To help all small businesses realise their potential;

To promote world class business support to enhance the performance of small firms with growth potential;

To help promote enterprise across society and particularly in under-represented groups and disadvantaged communities; and

To achieve the highest standards of service delivery and provide value for money.

I expect the SBS to review its plans regularly in response to the needs of small businesses, particularly in its first year of operation. In line with the request for all Agencies to be given operational targets, I have set the following targets for the 2000–01 year:

Operational Targets

150,000 individuals and businesses to use SBS services each quarter;

80 per cent. of customers to be satisfied;

SBS service standards to be published by September 2000;

Review business support services and publish the results by December 2000;

Establish an index of the impact of regulation on small businesses by December 2000;

45 franchises to be established by April 2001;

Establish the Information and Advisory Service, including systems to allow on-line transactions and notification of regulation to small businesses by April 2001.

Finance

100 per cent. of valid invoices paid within 30 days.

Questions Delegated to the Chief Executive

Chief Executive to reply to all letters within 10 working days, including letters from MPs delegated to him for reply.

Investors in People

SBS Agency to achieve its own recognition as an Investor in People by 31 March 2001.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce a small business employers' charter stipulating the rights of employers. [129954]

Ms Hewitt: The Government have no plans to introduce an employers' charter as described.

The European Charter for Small Enterprises, agreed last month at the Feira Council, set out a number of commitments to help small businesses. Areas for action, both at the European and member state level, include improving access to finance, enhancing business support, better regulation and strengthening innovation and entrepreneurship. These actions are designed to ensure that small businesses thrive in the European Union and that it becomes the most competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world.

Petroleum Prices

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 298W, on petroleum prices, what recent discussions he has had with the petroleum industry on the supply of petroleum to the United Kingdom market; what assessment he has made of the statement made by OPEC in Vienna on 21 June that the high level of crude oil prices was in part a consequence of market speculation; and if he will make a statement. [129303]

Mrs. Liddell: Officials in my Department meet regularly with Oil Industry representatives. A number of factors are influencing crude oil and product prices at the current time. Market speculation is always one of these.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 298W, on petroleum prices in the United Kingdom, what recent discussions he has had with OPEC regarding increases in production. [129301]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government are not a member of OPEC and have no direct contact with it. Through membership of the International Energy Agency we do, however, engage in and encourage dialogue between groups of oil consuming and oil producing countries on matters of common interest.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 298W, on petroleum prices, what assessment he has made of when the OPEC decision of 21 June, to increase production to above pre-March 1999 levels with effect from 1 July, will be reflected in petroleum prices in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [129302]

Mrs. Liddell: Petrol prices, which were rising for a variety of reasons not limited to the price of crude oil, are expected to ease soon. The OPEC decision of 21 June has not yet had an impact on crude oil prices and the timing of any reduction remains unclear.

Internet Access

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the population of each county in Wales has access to the internet. [129752]

Ms Hewitt: Figures are not available for individual counties in Wales. However, figures from the Family Expenditure Survey show that 15 per cent. of households in Wales could access the internet from a home computer, averaged over the financial year 1999–2000, up from 7 per cent. in the previous year.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to publish information on the civil plutonium inventory. [129968]

Mrs. Liddell: Figures for the United Kingdom's civil plutonium holdings are published by my Department each year and are placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The most recent were published on 13 June 2000 covering holdings at 31 December 1999.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent assessment (a) his Department, (b) consultants to his Department and (c) non-departmental public bodies responsible to his Department have made of electrometallurgical techniques to process spent nuclear fuel as developed in the (i) United States and (ii) Russia. [129966]

Mrs. Liddell: DTI has made no assessment of electrometallurgical techniques to process spent nuclear fuels, nor have we commissioned consultants to do so. The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, a non-departmental body reporting to DTI, recently considered pyrometallurgical processing (developed in the United States) as a potential technology for the future management of nuclear fuels at its Dounreay site. It concluded that the technology was not a practicable option for dealing with the non-metallic fuels at Dounreay, and that the waste products might not be acceptable in the UK without further treatment.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Moluccas

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning the destruction of the Christian University in the Moluccas. [129457]

Mr. Battle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 10 July 2000, Official Report, column 390W. We are disturbed by press reports that State Pattimura University in Ambon has been attacked. We will continue to monitor the situation closely.

Kashmir

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about physical attacks on the Chairman of the Hurriyat conference in Kashmir; and if he will make a statement. [129946]

Mr. Hain: We are aware of media reports of an incident involving the Chairman of the all-party Hurriyat conference, Syed Ali Shah Gilani, on 30 June in Kashmir. We condemn all acts of violence and abuses of human rights which bring suffering to the people of Kashmir.

Greece

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government's assessment of UK threat levels to, and protective measures for, UK diplomatic staff in Greece has changed since the date of its submission on this subject to the Foreign Affairs Committee. [129758]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 7 July 2000]: We increased the level of our threat assessment to British Diplomatic and Military interests throughout mainland Greece in the immediate aftermath of the assassination of Brigadier Saunders. No further change has been made since then. Measures to increase security are being implemented following the visit of a specialist security adviser.

Community Forums

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Community Forums held by his Department to encourage wider ethnic diversity in the Diplomatic Service. [129929]

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for hosting the successful Community Forum which the Department recently organised in Glasgow. Community Forums enable the Department to reach out to communities that might otherwise not have considered the Foreign Office as a career for their young people. The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) hosted a Forum in Leeds yesterday. I am delighted that the Forums, together with other initiatives taken by the Department and which we continue to pursue, have led to a significant increase in the number of applications from members of minority ethnic communities.

Feira Presidency

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will deposit in the Library the paper referred to in section II. A. 1 of the first annexe of the Feira Presidency conclusions. [129811]

Mr. Vaz: Yes.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason, in Annexe 1 of the Feira Presidency conclusions, DSACEUR rather than SACEUR will be consulted on the headline goal; and if he will make a statement on the proposed involvement of the United States Government. [129919]

Mr. Vaz: DSACEUR operates under the overall command of SACEUR. NATO has made DSACEUR the focal point within the Alliance for issues relating to ESDI. Given DSACEUR's European responsibilities, he can make an important contribution to NATO input to the elaboration of the EU's Headline Goal.

The decisions taken at the Feira European Council will ensure effective transparency and dialogue between NATO and the EU, particular EU/NATO Working Groups on security, capability goals, EU access to NATO assets and permanent EU/NATO structures. The United States Government will be fully involved in this process. President Clinton has welcomed the Feira Conclusions.

European Treaties

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many European documents have been designated as treaties by statutory instrument under section 1(3) of the European Communities Act 1973 in the periods (a) 1973 to 1982, (b) 1983 to 1993 and (c) 1994 to 1999. [130073]

Mr. Vaz: Between 1973 and 1982, 31 European Documents were designated as treaties under section 1(3) of the European Communities Act 1972. From 1983 to 1993 this number was 10, and from 1994 to 1999, 31.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the export of a truck to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. [130365]

Mr. Hain: Following consultations with this Department and the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry issued an export licence for an ex-military Bedford 4x4 truck for use by the Catholic Relief Service in Kinshasa. This will provide the Catholic Relief Service with the means to deliver urgent humanitarian assistance. We are satisfied that the truck will not be used for military purposes. This decision is consistent with and does not affect the Government's continued support for the EU Common Position on arms exports to the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Bosnia-Herzegovina

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the export of two military rated trucks to the United Methodist Committee for Relief in Bosnia-Herzegovina. [130368]

Mr. Vaz: The Government have approved the export of two 4x4 wheel drive all purpose vehicles to the United Methodist Committee for Relief in Sarajevo. These goods are of ex-army stock and are rated on the Military List. The Committee needs the trucks to distribute relief to remote villages in the region. The Committee has substantially modified the trucks to curtail their military applications and has undertaken that the vehicles will be for their sole use.

This decision does not affect the Government's continued support for the EU Common Position on arms exports to Bosnia-Herzegovina.

David Chell

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Malaysia about the case of Mr. David Chell. [130085]

Mr. Hain: We have not yet made any representations about the case of David Chell in Malaysia. However, if the death sentence is upheld once the appeals process is exhausted we will make strong representations to the Malaysian Government to grant clemency and have the sentence commuted. We would also consider making representations if, after all legal remedies have been exhausted, Mr. Chell and his lawyer have prima facie evidence of a miscarriage or denial of justice.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130032]

Mr. Hain: In 1998–99 the Foreign and Commonwealth Office paid 97.7 per cent. of such bills. In 1999 this figures rose to 97.9 per cent. Calculations are in accordance with HM Treasury's approved method.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Arts

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the per capita Government spending was on the arts in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland in the last financial year; and what his planned figures are for the current year. [129725]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 7 July 2000]: Central Government grant in aid spend per capita, distributed by the Arts Council of England, was: for 1999–2000 £4.57 (final outturn); and for 2000–01 £4.75 (projected). Projected figures can differ from those of final outturn: these calculations are based on population estimates (final figures for which will be available later this summer).

I have also asked the Devolved Administrations of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland to provide this information. When it is available, I will write to the hon. Member, and place a copy in the Library of the House.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many visitors there have been to the Millennium Dome. [129963]

Janet Anderson: Attendance at the Dome to date totals 3.28 million, making it the most popular pay-to-visit attraction in the UK. Visitors figures are posted on the Dome website (www.dome2000.co.uk) monthly.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the total sums of (a) Lottery and (b) public money spent and pledged to the Dome project. [123983]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 5 June 2000]: A total of £538 million of National Lottery money has been granted to the project. No taxpayers' money has been invested in the Dome.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he will publish the forecasts of cash shortfall at the Dome if visitor numbers are below the present estimate for the rest of the year; [123981]

(2) what forecasts he has made of the projected revenue and costs of the Millennium Dome. [124478]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) current business plan is based on 6 million revenue-generating visitors. Should visitor numbers fall below this level the business plan will need to be reviewed. Details of the business plan are commercially confidential. NMEC's most recent budget, contained within the business plan, is as follows:

Project Lifetime Expenditure

Dome structure and associated infrastructure—£271.2 million

Set-up costs, Staff, Accommodation, IT, Legal and Corporate Services—£55.4 million

Commercial, Communications and Marketing—£42.7 million

Exhibits and Attractions—£240.2 million

Operations and Running costs in year of operation—£104.6 million

National Programme: Projects (£37.3 million) and Programme Support (£9.9 million)—£47.2 million

Project Lifetime Income

Millennium Commission Grant—£525 million

Commercial Income—£86 million

Sponsorship Income—£123 million (excludes sponsorship by Ford and BT who have designed, built and funded their zones)

Legacy: Sale of Dome—£30.0 million (as budgeted prior to the Legacy competition commencing. Original 1997 budget provision of £15 million was on the basis that the Dome would remain on-site for one year only)

Total budget is £758 million plus an additional £3 million granted by the Millennium Commission to enhance marketing of the Millennium Experience.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 21 June 2000, Official Report, column 232W, on the Millennium Dome, in what way the precise content of a winning bid for the Dome's legacy might affect the division of the proceeds between the New Millennium Experience Company and English Partnerships. [128004]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The recommended decision on the division of proceeds will be taken by Ministers in my Department, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR), the Cabinet Office and HM Treasury. In taking this decision Ministers will receive information and advice from the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC), English Partnerships, the Millennium Commission, and officials in their respective Departments. This will include information about the nature of the preferred bid, including the associated financial offer and the land and other assets required. Such information will be taken into account in deciding how the proceeds of the sale will be divided between NMEC and EP.

National Lottery

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful applications for Lottery funding there have been from each constituency in the UK, ranked in descending order of the number of successful applications. [129747]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 7 July 2000]: I have today placed a table showing the number of successful Lottery applications by constituency, ranked in descending order of the number of applications, in the Libraries of the House. This information is taken from my Department's National Lottery Awards database. No complete list of unsuccessful applications by constituency is available.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the administration costs were as a percentage of Lottery income for each of the Lottery funding bodies in the most recent year for which figures are available. [129533]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 July 2000]: The percentage of Lottery income spent on financing administration costs for each of the Lottery funding bodies during the financial year of 1998–99 (the most recent year for which figures are available from all distributors) is set out in the table:

Distributing body	Percentage administration
Sports Council Scotland	6.3
Sports Council Wales	3.6
Sports Council Northern Ireland	6.8
Sports England	4.8
Arts Council England	9.1
Scottish Arts Council	7.9
Arts Council Northern Ireland	7.5
Arts Council Wales	8.1
Heritage Lottery Fund	3.8
National Lottery Charity Board	8.0
New Opportunities Fund	1.0
Millennium Commission	3.2

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much Lottery money was awarded to projects in the Morecambe and Lunesdale constituency (a) between 1993 and May 1997 and (b) since May 1997; and if he will list the projects which received funding. [128343]

Kate Hoey: According to my Department's National Lottery Awards Database, between the start of the Lottery (November 1994) and 30 April 1997, 24 Lottery awards, with a total value of £3,419,980 were made in the Morecambe and Lunesdale constituency. From 1 May 1997 to 30 June 2000, the database indicates that 44 awards, with a total value of £2,240,908 were made. I am today placing lists of these projects in the Libraries of the House.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129636]

Mr. Chris Smith: The only Agency of my Department is the Royal Parks Agency, who do not use any touch tone telephone steering systems for public telephone lines.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129618]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department does not use any touch tone telephone steering systems for public telephone lines.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128985]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer to his earlier question on 19 May 2000, Official Report, column 280W.

The Royal Parks Agency does not operate an approved list of manufacturers for the vehicles it leases. It operates a number of framework agreements which are all obtained within the framework of "The Public Supply Contract Regulations 1995". The contractors chosen are those which offer the most economically advantageous tender in terms of both price and technical considerations. The vehicles are specified by the standards and performance they are required to meet and not by manufacturer.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage of total staff this represents. [129144]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

The number of New Dealers within my Department as at 1 April 2000 is 4, or 1 per cent. of total staff. There are currently no New Dealers employed in the Royal Parks Agency.

New Millennium Experience Company

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the correspondence between the Chief Executive of the New Millennium Experience Company and the Accounting Officer of the Millennium Commission regarding the request for an additional grant of £38.6 million. [126873]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 19 June 2000]: On 9 June the National Audit Office wrote to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee enclosing a paper on the circumstances in which an Accounting Officer Direction was given to the Millennium Commission Accounting Officer. The substance of the application for grant is contained within the paper, which has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what indemnities have been granted to directors of the New Millennium Experience Company. [126870]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 19 June 2000]: The New Millennium Experience Company considers that publication of details of indemnities are commercially in confidence. To reveal details would adversely affect the NMEC's ability to operate in an effective and commercial manner.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the New Millennium Experience Company will produce its annual report. [128484]

Janet Anderson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) will publish its Annual Report and Financial Statement before the start of Parliamentary recess. Copies of the Report will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

SCOTLAND

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124119]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 June 2000]: None.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pig Farmers

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what cash resources he has allocated for an outgoers scheme for pig farmers. [129398]

Ms Quin [holding answer 6 July 2000]: In the "Action Plan for Farming", £26 million was allocated to the Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme (PIRS) in its first year. As the outgoers element of the PIRS will operate using a sealed bid system, it is not possible to estimate how much of this initial £26 million will be used on this part of the scheme. However, the aim of using a sealed bid system is to obtain the best value for money, with the expectation that a good proportion of the £26 million, plus the additional funds for which bids have been made, can be available for the ongoers element.

CABINET OFFICE

Ministerial Residences

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will establish an official residence in the County Palatine. [128881]

Marjorie Mowlam: I have no plans to establish an official residence in the County Palatine. The Duchy of Lancaster has an estate office in Lancashire which is sufficient for the Duchy's needs.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many of her Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129625]

Mr. Ian McCartney: One. The Cabinet Office public inquiry telephone is the only Cabinet Office line that uses a touch tone steering system.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many agencies of her Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129606]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government Car and Despatch Agency, which is the only agency of the Cabinet Office, does not normally deal with members of the general public and does not use touch tone telephone steering systems for inquiries.

The Central Office of Information is a department and executive agency that reports to the Minister for the Cabinet Office. It does not itself employ touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with inquiries that it receives directly from the general public. However, as part of its Direct Marketing services it does contract, on behalf of its government clients, response houses and contact centres that do use touch tone telephone steering systems as a backup to live handling of calls.

Ministerial Red Boxes

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to her answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 486W, on ministerial red boxes, on what occasions she has left her ministerial red box unattended on public transport. [125744]

Mr. Stringer: I am not aware of any occasions on which any of the Cabinet Office Ministers' red boxes have been left unattended on public transport.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems; [129617]

(2) how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129635]

Angela Eagle: The Department has three telephone lines which are responded to by touch tone.

The Benefits Agency's Child Benefit Centre Helpline and the Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance Customer Care Helpline both use this system.

The Department's Winter Fuel Payments Helpline uses touch-tone technology when all lines are busy. The system give callers a choice between leaving a message or holding to speak to an operator.

Pensioners (Benefits)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what income support benefits are available to British pensioners living in other EU countries other than basic state pension and disability benefits. [129737]

Angela Eagle: Most of the contributory benefits, with the exception of contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance are available to pensioners living in other EU countries. However, it is a condition of entitlement to the income related benefits (Income Support, income-based Jobseeker's Allowance, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit) that a person is resident in Great Britain.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) on how many occasions since May 1997 Ministers in his Department have made a declaration of interest to their colleagues under circumstances envisaged in Paragraph 110 of the Ministerial Code; [129154]

(2) how many times Ministers in his Department have sought the advice of the Permanent Secretary under the circumstances envisaged in Paragraphs 118, 121 and 123 of the Ministerial Code; and on which occasions such advice was sought. [129169]

Mr. Darling: Information relating to internal advice and consultation is not disclosed under Exemption II of the code of practice on access to Government information.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend the period of time during which Housing Benefit claimants may appeal against their benefit decision; and if he will make a statement. [129470]

Angela Eagle: As part of our proposals to bring Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit decisions within the scope of the Appeals Service from 1 April 2001 we intend to introduce regulations to mirror the decision-making arrangements for other social security benefits.

This will mean that Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit claimants will be given a calendar month to dispute a decision. This period may be extended for up to a maximum of 13 months where there are special reasons for delay.

We will be consulting with local authority associations and the Council of Tribunals on these changes in due course.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend the regulations concerning the backdating of Housing Benefit; and if he will make a statement. [129469]

Angela Eagle: We propose to introduce regulations to align the current Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit backdating rules with those for the other income-related benefits from April 2001. This will involve replacing the current 52 week limit which rests on a broad definition of "good cause". Instead, where a claimant delays his claim, that claim can be backdated for up to three months based on a set of prescriptive circumstances.

The Social Security Advisory Committee are currently consulting on the draft regulations and will report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in due course. We also propose to open consultation with the local authority associations this week.

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimates he has made of savings in Housing Benefit arising from reduced house repossessions if a flat rate housing allowance were introduced at (a) £10, (b) £15, (c) £20, (d) £25 and (e) £30 per week and paid to all households in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Persons Tax Credit. [125411]

Angela Eagle: The uncertain behavioural effects that would result from the introduction of such an allowance means that no reliable estimates can be made.

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what he estimates to be the gross cost to public funds of a flat rate housing allowance payable to recipients of working families tax credit and disabled persons tax credit, if such an allowance was paid at the rate of (a) £10 per week, (b) £15 per week, (c) £20 per week, (d) £25 per week and (e) £30 per week. [125409]

Angela Eagle: Precise estimates cannot be made because of the uncertain behavioural effects that would result from the introduction of such an allowance. If a flat rate housing allowance of £30 per week were introduced for all recipients of the tax credits, it is estimated that the gross cost would be of the order of £2 billion per year.

Pensions

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps are being undertaken to establish the means by which pensioners prefer to have their pensions paid. [129452]

Mr. Rooker: Pensioners are routinely asked to specify which method of payment they prefer when making a claim to Retirement Pension from the choices of Post Office or ACT into a bank or building society.

Currently over 50 per cent. of new pensioners are choosing to have their pension paid into a bank or building society account.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants over the last five years in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland and (c) South West Scotland District have had their Incapacity Benefit withdrawn after an all work test carried out by the Benefits Agency Medical Services; how many of these claimants requested a review; how many went to appeal; and how many of these (i) reviews and (ii) appeals resulted in benefit being re-instated. [129498]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

Entitlement to Incapacity Benefit requires the claimant to provide evidence of incapacity. An initial award of benefit is made if there is acceptable medical evidence to support the claim. Subsequently, incapacity is assessed under the relevant medical test: during the first 28 weeks of incapacity, where the claimant has a recent work record, this is the own occupation test; after 28 weeks, or from the start of the claim where the claimant has not recently worked, it is the All Work Test (AWT) which was replaced from 3 April 2000 by the Personal Capability Assessment. If the relevant test is not satisfied, benefit is disallowed from that point. Incapacity is reassessed from time to time to check continuing entitlement.

Information on disallowances following the All Work Test is in table 1 (Great Britain) and table 2 (Scotland). The national data on benefit disallowances shown in table 1 are derived from a different source, and are collected over a different period from the available data for Scotland in table 2. The two tables are therefore not directly comparable. Disallowances include claimants who have failed to return the All Work Test questionnaire or attend for medical examination.

Data on appeals are in table 3. The time lag between disallowance, lodging and hearing an appeal means there is no direct relationship between decisions to disallow benefit and appeals made and heard in each year.

There has never been a requirement in Incapacity Benefit for a person who is dissatisfied with their decision to apply for a review. Since September 1999 a claimant may ask for an unfavourable decision to be reconsidered and revised within a one month time limit.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many non-resident parents who have not co-operated with the Child Support Agency have (a) been processed through Child Support Agency enforcement procedures, (b) been made to pay maintenance, (c) had arrest warrants issued against them and (d) been imprisoned. [129249]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write my the hon. Friend.

Letter from Mike Isaac to Mr. Chris Ruane, dated 10 July 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about enforcement action taken by the Child Support Agency. Mrs. Boardman is unavailable and therefore I am writing to you on her behalf.

The information that I have provided is applicable to England and Wales. Different arrangements apply to Scotland though the underlying principles are similar. The Government believes that non-resident parents should pay maintenance for their children if they can afford to do so and we will continue to pursue non-resident parents who persistently seek to avoid their responsibilities.

The Agency's policy is that, if necessary, it will use the powers given to it by Parliament to enforce payment of child maintenance. Where normal collection arrangements fail and arrears of child maintenance build up, the Agency will initiate enforcement action if the non-resident parent does not make an acceptable offer to pay. However, each case is considered on its merits and the Agency will take account of the likely effect of enforcement action on the welfare of any children involved.

The full range of powers available will be considered. Where an uncooperative non-resident parent is employed a deduction from earnings order can be imposed. This is an effective, value for money method of collecting maintenance and arrears without resorting to the court system. It is a criminal offence for an employer to fail to act on a deduction from earnings order. Where an employer does fail to act they may be prosecuted. During 1999–2000 the Agency prosecuted 5 such cases.

Where a deduction from earnings order cannot be issued, e.g. the non-resident parent is self-employed, and no agreement can be reached to pay maintenance, a Liability Order is made. This means the debt is registered with the Magistrates Court and a County Court Judgement will then be considered making it difficult for a non-resident parent to obtain credit, mortgage, loans etc. During 1999–2000 Liability Orders were granted on 2,169 cases and County Court Judgements sought on 563 cases.

By taking this action it is hoped that the non-resident parent will start to cooperate, however, if this proves ineffective, Bailiff action is taken to seize goods to the value of the debt or, alternatively, a Garnishee or Charging order is imposed. A Garnishee Order freezes the non-resident parent's bank account. A Charging order freezes the non-resident parent's property that could be sold, for example, a car or house that may be up for sale at the time of the order. During 1999–2000 the Agency applied for 130 Garnishee Orders, 69 Charging Orders and took Bailiff action on 1,916 cases.

The final sanction is committal to prison, although this does not discharge the debt. During 1999–2000 a total of 22 applications for committal to prison were made. Of these 18 were successful, 11 of which were suspended sentences.

By making positive telephone or face to face contact with a non-resident parent early on in the assessment process the Agency aims to obtain full compliance and reduce the number of parents who refuse to cooperate. Non-resident parents are encouraged to make regular payments, preferably by direct debt, standing order or a deduction from earnings order.

The Government believes that child maintenance should not be seen as an optional expense to be paid or not as personal circumstances dictate. New legislation, which will support the Child Support Reforms means that maintenance assessments will be simpler to calculate and easier for both parents to understand. This should encourage more parents to co-operate. It will allow the Agency to use more of its resources to deal with those parents who refuse to pay their assessed liability. Additional penalties such as the removal of driving licences are also being considered, though the Agency's aim will remain to ensure the proper flow of maintenance without the use of penalties.

I hope this is helpful.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Stations

15. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to make public transport stations safer. [128414]

Mr. Hill: We have a number of initiatives planned or under way to improve safety at both rail and bus stations. For example, we are encouraging station operators to apply for accreditation under the Secure Stations Scheme that we introduced in April 1998, which is designed to improve and standardise good security practices at all overground and underground stations. 63 stations are currently accredited.

We are also currently undertaking research designed to improve personal security in bus travel (including at bus stations) and we are piloting a safe transport route in the North West of England.

Homelessness

16. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to address homelessness in the capital. [128415]

Mr. Raynsford: The aim of the Government's housing strategy, set out in the Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all", is to offer everyone the opportunity of a decent home and so promote social cohesion, well-being and self-dependence. We have increased housing investment programme resources for London local authorities by 54 per cent. in the current financial year and we are supporting the Association of London Government's Housing Partnership Initiative to help alleviate the shortage of social housing in the London area. We are also spending £160 million in London over the three financial years to April 2002 as part of our commitment to reducing the numbers sleeping rough.

Regional Development Agencies

17. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the role of the Regional Development Agencies in the regional economy in Yorkshire and the Humber. [128416]

Ms Armstrong: The role of Yorkshire Forward, the Regional Development Agency for Yorkshire and Humber, is to improve the region's competitiveness through the promotion of integrated sustainable economic development and social and physical regeneration. Key to achieving this is working in close partnership with a range of regional and local partners.

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress Regional Development Agencies are making in the development of regional economic strategies. [128423]

Ms Armstrong: RDAs submitted their Regional Strategies to Ministers in October of last year. The Government responded in January this year giving them a broad welcome. The RDAs have since been implementing their Strategies through the production of a series of Action Plans.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the remuneration of each director of each Regional Development Agency. [129114]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 4 July 2000]: The annual accounts of the RDAs contain complete information on the remuneration and pension arrangements for senior personnel. The annual accounts for the year ended 31 March are currently with the National Audit Office. When the audit reports on these accounts have been signed they will be laid in the Library of both Houses in line with the Department's usual practice.

NATS

19. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received from (a) the IPMS and (b) BALPA on National Air Traffic Services Ltd. [128418]

Mr. Hill: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Transport has had continuing discussions with the IPMS on employees' interests in the proposed public-private partnership for National Air Traffic Services, and on their views on safety. We have received no recent representations from BALPA.

Council Tax (Pensioners)

20. Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will meet Age Concern to discuss the level of Council Tax upon pensioners. [128419]

Ms Armstrong: I will be happy to meet Age Concern if they want a meeting.

Local Authority Housing

21. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the management of local authority-owned housing. [128420]

Mr. Raynsford: Tenants have a right to expect well managed, high quality housing and services. The Housing Green Paper sets out our commitment to achieve a step change in the quality and management of social housing over the next decade.

We set out in the Green Paper various approaches which we believe will help to achieve this change: stock transfer, arm's-length management companies, and the Private Finance Initiative.

Traffic Calming

22. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make additional funds available to local authorities for the purpose of providing more road safety traffic calming schemes. [128421]

Mr. Hill: Local authorities support road safety schemes from the general resources that we make available for integrated transport in the annual local transport capital settlement. This year these increased by 20 per cent., and we plan to increase them further for 2001–02. In addition, a further £30 million was made available to authorities in the Budget to spend on child safety, safe routes to school and other small scale improvements.

Song Thrushes

23. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about the declining number of song thrushes in Britain. [128422]

Mr. Meacher: My Department has received a number of representations concerning the decline in populations for a number of song birds, including Song Thrushes.

Railway Land

25. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to prevent the British Railways Board from selling former railway land which could in future be returned to railway use. [128424]

Mr. Hill: The British Railways Board is now part of the shadow Strategic Rail Authority (SSRA), which is currently reviewing sites where a potential transport interest has been identified. SSRA is prepared to withhold sites with a potential strategic transport use from the sale process for sufficient time to allow for detailed consideration of the future use and ownership of the site.

Economic Regeneration (Birmingham)

26. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's plans to promote economic and community regeneration in south-west Birmingham. [128425]

Ms Armstrong: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry received the Final Report of the Rover Task Force on 3 July. The report sets out a strategic framework for helping the communities in South West Birmingham and more widely within the West Midlands. The Government are considering the report's recommendations and will work with Advantage West Midlands and other partners to ensure that the local business economy is better able to cope with future changes.

Civic Forums

27. Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the role of civic forums in promoting participation in local decision-making processes. [128426]

Ms Armstrong: In September and October 1998 my Department published a research report and guidance on how local authorities can develop and enhance public participation in local decision making ("Enhancing Public Participation in Local Government—A research report", DETR, September 1998; "Guidance on Enhancing Public Participation", DETR, October 1998). Local organisations such as residents groups and civic amenity societies must always be an important feature of local authorities' consultation and participation strategies.

Local Deprivation

28. Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the underlying data used to compile the proposed index of local deprivation. [128427]

Ms Armstrong: Last December, we published for consultation the information relating to local authority district rankings on five different measures of deprivation. As part of the consultation exercise we also offered each authority information on the ward rankings for their area. The summary report will be published later this year, along with the deprivation scores and ranks of all wards and districts in England. The report will provide details of where to obtain the underlying raw data.

Seaside Transport Links

29. Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps are being taken to improve transport links to seaside towns. [128428]

Mr. Hill: We have made more resources available to authorities to implement their integrated transport strategies, with an increase of 20 per cent. over last year. The requirement to produce Local Transport Plans and Regional Transport Strategies will ensure that authorities work together towards meeting transport need such as improving transport links to seaside towns. Investment in the trunk road network, through the Targeted Programme of Improvements, will also in a number of cases improve such links.

Regional Railways

30. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on planned subsidies to regional railways. [128429]

Mr. Hill: The level of subsidy for each year of the existing rail franchises including those which cover regional railways—is published in the Franchising Director's Annual Report (copies are available in the House Libraries). The Franchising Director has recently announced proposals to change the franchise map of Great Britain (copies of his Press Release are available in the House Libraries). That will lead to some adjustment of contracted subsidies.

Council Tax Bands

31. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will increase the number of Council Tax bands. [128430]

Ms Armstrong: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on 29 June 2000, Official Report, column 603W.

Canals

32. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on prospects for the use of the canal network for (a) urban and (b) rural regeneration. [128431]

Mr. Hill: Our policy paper "Waterways for Tomorrow", published on 27 June, describes how our inland waterways can make a significant contribution to tackling social exclusion and deprivation by acting as a catalyst for economic and social renewal. Improving and restoring our waterways, and redeveloping disused and derelict waterside land can help deliver the Government's target for development on brownfield sites as well as creating jobs and business opportunities.

Fuel Taxation

33. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the impact of taxes on fuel on the road haulage industry. [128432]

Mr. Hill: The Government keep under review the impact of fuel taxation on all sectors of UK industry, including the road haulage industry. Budget 2000 itself contained an important package of measures specifically to further boost the competitiveness of the road haulage industry. These included £45 million of cuts to Vehicle Excise Duty; the introduction of 44-tonne lorries; and tougher enforcement to tackle illegally operating hauliers and protect the competitiveness of legitimate operators. The Road Haulage Forum chaired by Lord Macdonald is also continuing to consider the competitive pressures facing the industry.

Construction Industry

34. Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the performance of the construction industry. [128433]

Mr. Raynsford: Having experienced a recession in the early 1990s, the UK construction industry is now showing clear signs of steady growth. Output has risen by about 2.5 per cent. in real terms between the last two financial years, and that level of growth is forecast to continue at least until 2002.

Council Housing

35. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the levels of public investment he plans to make available to improve the council housing stock. [128435]

Mr. Raynsford: The level of allocations for housing investment by local authorities for the next three years will be decided in the current spending review, the results of which are due to be announced later this month.

Development (South-East)

36. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from (a) SERPLAN and (b) councillors from the south-east region concerning development in the south-east. [128436]

Mr. Raynsford: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received SERPLAN's response and also over 800 other responses, including representations from local authorities. All responses are now being considered.

Local Government

37. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from councils concerning the abolition of the committee system in local government. [128437]

Ms Armstrong: We have received a wide range of comments in response to the various consultations we have conducted about councils' executive constitutions, for which the Local Government Bill [Lords], now passed by this House, provides.

HFCs

38. Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what further progress he has made in reducing emissions of HFCs. [128438]

Mr. Meacher: The Government set out their policy position on HFCs in the draft climate change programme, which was published for consultation earlier this year. This included a series of possible measures which could be taken to reduce emissions of HFCs. The consultation has now ended and we will be developing these measures further taking account of the points raised during the consultation.

Road Haulage

39. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's energy policy and its impact on the road haulage industry. [128439]

Mr. Hill: The Government are determined to encourage energy conservation and efficiency across all sectors of the economy, as part of our strategy to tackle climate change and improve the competitiveness of UK industry. In the road haulage sector, we are committed to improving the efficiency of freight transport and logistic operations, and set out last year how we would achieve this in our Sustainable Distribution Strategy. The strategy sets out a wide range of measures, including, for instance, the dissemination of advice to hauliers through my Department's Energy Efficiency Best Practice Programme about ways of reducing fuel costs.

VAT (Housing)

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in relation to the harmonisation of VAT between new build and repair in connection with the forthcoming urban and rural White Papers. [128417]

Mr. Raynsford: Lord Rogers's Urban Taskforce recommended that we should harmonise VAT on new build and repair and maintenance. Our Urban and White Papers will take forward the Government's response to Lord Rogers's recommendations, although final decisions on taxation will be for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Incinerator Ash

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) which UK heat stations other than Byker have used incinerator ash for construction; [126334]

(2) what data (a) the Government and (b) the Environment Agency hold on levels of dioxin contamination in incinerator ashes. [126335]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 20 June 2000]: Data on levels of dioxins in ash sent for disposal are not routinely held by the Agency or my Department.

The operators of incineration plant are required by section 34 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to provide sufficient information to those managing waste ash to ensure that is it disposed of appropriately, for example chemical and physical information. They are also required to ensure that ashes which contain hazardous substances above certain thresholds are disposed of in accordance with the Special Waste Regulations 1996 (as amended).

Commercially processed incineration bottom ash is currently supplied to the construction market from the following incinerators: Edmonton, SE London Combined Heat and Power (SELCHP), and Tyseley.

Data from these incinerators indicate that the processed ash entering the construction market has dioxin concentrations of between 20 to 50 ng/kg toxic equivalent, which falls within the range observed in urban soils.

Aldermaston

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the statutory consultees for the Environment Agency's consultation on the re-authorisation of the radioactive discharges from Aldermaston; and if he will place copies of submissions by (a) statutory consultees and (b) other parties in the Library. [128455]

Mr. Meacher: The statutory consultees for the re-authorisation of the Aldermaston discharges are MAFF, HSE (NII), Thames Water, West Berkshire council and Reading borough council. The Environment Agency has provided copies of their responses to my Department and copies are being placed in the Library.

Approximately 4,000 responses were received by the Agency. These responses are summarised, and some of them are quoted with the consent of the consultees concerned, in the Agency's decision document. I am arranging for copies of that document to be placed in the Library shortly.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what periods of consultation have taken place between the shadow Strategic Rail Authority and interested local parties over the award of (a) new and (b) extended rail franchises. [129390]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director is operating an inclusive consultation process for franchise replacement. The Instructions and Guidance given to him by the Deputy Prime Minister require him to consult the Chairman of the British Railways Board, local authorities, Passenger Transport Executives, the Rail Regulator, regional planning bodies, Regional Development Agencies and Rail Passenger Committees. He has consulted widely about the replacement of franchises and there will be further on-going consultation as the process continues. Bidders will be encouraged to consult interested stakeholders, including local authorities and Rail Passengers' Committees, giving them the opportunity to raise issues which they would like to see addressed.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what account the Government and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority will take of the record, including safety record, of an existing franchisee and its owner company in the award of (a) new and (b) extended franchises. [129392]

Mr. Hill: The Deputy Prime Minister has asked the Franchising Director to evaluate bids for replacement franchises against the following criteria: commitment to secure better performance and customer services, the extent to which extra or earlier investment can be secured, the extent to which passengers will be given a greater voice in the level and standard of services, and value for money to the taxpayer. Bidders will be encouraged to consult interested stakeholders, including local authorities and Rail Passengers' Committees, giving them the opportunity to raise issues which they would like to see addressed.

Rural Bus Services

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will meet representatives of Stagecoach to discuss the withdrawal of rural bus services. [129645]

Mr. Hill: I meet various representatives of the bus industry from time to time, to discuss a range of relevant issues, which can include rural services.

Decisions on withdrawal of individual local services are matters for the bus operator concerned and for the relevant local authority, which has the power to provide subsidy for socially necessary services which would otherwise not be provided.

HGVs

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what data he collates on the stopping and thinking distances relating to HGVs. [129644]

Mr. Hill: Stopping distances for HGVs are governed by United Nations Economic Commission for Europe Regulation Number 13 and European Council Directive 71/320/EEC as amended by Commission Directive 98/12/EC.

Provided that the vehicle meets the requirements for stopping distance and deceleration during the Type Approval test there are no further requirements for measuring and collating stopping distances.

Strategic Rail Authority

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what information has been supplied to him by the shadow Strategic Rail Authority on its plans for a Scottish office, with particular reference to the number of staff it will employ. [129802]

Mr. Hill: The Strategic Rail Authority, which will be the national strategic rail authority for Great Britain, is currently based in London and has no plans to establish separate offices in Scotland, or any other part of Britain.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many methane explosions have taken place in the past 10 years arising from the operation of landfill sites. [129975]

Mr. Meacher: The Environment Agency has no records of any explosions attributable to landfill gas occurring in England and Wales since 1 April 1996. Records for the period prior to this are not held centrally.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment procedures are in place to monitor the spread of toxic leachate from landfill sites; and what remedial measures exist to combat public health threats from such leachate. [129964]

Mr. Meacher: Recommended procedures and protocols for monitoring ground and surface waters for evidence of contamination by leachate are set out in the Government's statutory guidance to the Environment Agency—Waste Management Papers 4 and 26. Operators of landfills must undertake such monitoring and report the results to the Agency on a regular basis. The Agency also undertakes its own monitoring as a check on operator performance. Extensive research has been conducted on landfill leachate and, although potentially polluting, it is not normally classed as toxic.

Landfill Sites

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessments he has made of the increase in (a) heavy vehicle traffic, (b) vermin and (c) noise levels arising from the operation of a landfill site. [129969]

Mr. Meacher: The Government have not made such assessments for individual sites. An assessment of the impact of an individual site is made when a development planning application is made.

The Government have published two relevant studies. "The Control of Noise at Surface Mineral Workings" was in 1990, and "The Environmental Effects of Traffic Associated with Minerals Working" in 1998. While they refer to surface mineral workings, the contents are applicable to landfilling. The Department issued in May 2000 a consultation draft of Mineral Planning Guidance Note 11, "Controlling and Mitigating the Environmental Effects of Minerals Extraction in England". This provides guidance on noise, with specific reference to the issue of waste disposal sites.

Vermin should be controlled by the operator and regulated by suitable conditions in the waste management licence.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many landfill operators were prosecuted for breach of the site licence in the past 10 years; and what were the (a) largest and (b) smallest fines imposed for those found guilty. [129974]

Mr. Meacher: Data are only available from April 1999, since when there have been 50 prosecutions relating to waste management licences. The largest total fine since April 1999 was for £87,500, and the smallest was £400.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he gives to landfill operators to reduce gas generation from putrescible materials deposited to their site. [129970]

Mr. Meacher: None. Guidance from the Secretary of State is directed at controlling emissions of landfill gas. This is in the form of Waste Management Papers which address the issues of site design, engineering and operation. Waste Management Paper 27 relates solely to landfill gas.

Tolls

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) tunnels and (b) bridges in the UK are subject to tolls. [130100]

Mr. Hill: In the United Kingdom the following undertakings are part of a public highway and have their tolls set by statute:

The Aldwark Bridge, Yorkshire
The Cleddau Bridge, Wales
The Clifton Suspension Bridge, Bristol
The Dartford Thurrock Crossings—Bridge and Tunnels
The Dunham Bridge, Lincolnshire
The Erskine Bridge, Scotland
The Forth Bridge, Scotland
The Mersey Tunnel
The Humber Bridge
The Itchen Bridge, Southampton
The Rixton and Warburton Bridge, on the Manchester Ship Canal
The Severn Bridges
The Shrewsbury (Kingsland) Bridge
The Skye Bridge, Scotland
The Swinford Bridge (Oxfordshire)
The Tamar Bridge
The Tay Bridge, Scotland
The Tyne Tunnel
The Whitchurch Bridge (Oxfordshire)
The Whitney on Wye Bridge (Hereford and Worcester).

There are also a number of toll bridges that provide access across private land. Because they do not have their tolls set by a statutory procedure I do not have a complete list.

Road Traffic Reduction

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason he has abandoned plans to set targets for reductions in national road traffic levels. [128434]

Mr. Hill: The Government have never promised that they would set a national road traffic reduction target; nor does the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998 require us to do so, if we are satisfied that other measures or targets would be better for tackling the adverse effects of traffic. As we set out in "Tackling Congestion and Pollution", our first report under the 1998 Act, published in January, our targets and policies focus on improving the outcomes that matter to people, such as congestion, pollution and road safety, rather than national traffic volume figures.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many internal and external advertisements were placed from 1997 to 2000 for inspector vacancies in the Hull office which stated that Hull was the location for the post; and if he will place copies of such advertisements in the Library. [128792]

Mr. Meacher: External recruitment of inspectors is conducted on a national basis and recruitment adverts do not state a particular location for posts. Our records show that no advertisements for Inspectors have stated Hull as the location for a post since 1997.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many educational and promotional visits were made by HSE inspectors to locations in (a) Hull, (b) East Riding, (c) North Lincolnshire and (d) North East Lincolnshire from 1974 to 2000; and in which offices the visiting speakers were based. [128793]

Mr. Meacher: The data provided are for 1996 onwards. Data pre 1996 are available only at disproportionate cost.

1997–98	5	2	3	4
1998–99	12	11	2	6
1999–2000	13	10	0	9

HSE does not keep records of visiting speakers. However, our records on FOCUS are able to determine how many educational and promotional visits were made to each of the named locations by Inspectors based in Hull.

Educational and promotional visits made by HSE inspectors based in Hull

Year	Hull	East Riding	North Lincolnshire	North East Lincolnshire
1996–97	11	6	2	3

1999–2000	3	5	0	9

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many HSE inspectors within the jurisdiction of the Hazardous Installation Directorate are located in each of the following divisions and how many Control of Major Accident Hazards sites there are by upper and lower tier in (a) Hull, (b) East Riding, (c) East Lincolnshire, (d) North East Lincolnshire, (e) Barnsley, (f) Doncaster, (g) Sheffield and (h) Rotherham. [128794]

Mr. Meacher: For the inspection of COMAH sites and other premises storing and manufacturing chemicals in the ares listed the Hazardous Installations Directorate of HSE has six Inspectors based at Sheffield, managed by a Principal Inspector. These Inspectors also cover the rest of Lincolnshire, Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire. COMAH sites operated by BG Transco are inspected by a separate group of five Inspectors, also based at Sheffield, who inspect BG Transco sites throughout the north of England. Explosives sites subject to COMAH are inspected by three HM Explosives Inspectors who cover eastern and south east England.

All these Inspectors are able to call on the advice and assistance of other HSE inspectors to provide support on a range of specialist topics.

The enforcement of COMAH is undertaken by the Competent Authority (HSE and the Environment Agency). Therefore, Environment Agency Inspectors are also involved in the inspect of COMAH sites.

The number of premises subject to COMAH in the following local authority areas are:

LA Area	Top Tier	TT (Gas)	TT (Exp)	Lower Tier	LT (Gas)	LT (Exp)	Total
(a) Hull	1	—	—	3	1	—	5

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the costing upon which the closure of the Hull HSE office was based took account of future travel and transfer expenses; and what environmental assessment was carried out. [128795]

Mr. Meacher: I can confirm that account has been taken of future travel and transfer expenses. Consideration has been made in relation to the issue of environmental considerations, as transferring the two operational inspector posts to Sheffield will incur some additional mileage. It is difficult to be specific about the actual extra mileage as it will depend on where the inspectors choose to live and the operational need for visits to Humberside.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he held before deciding to close the HSE office in Hull with (a) local employers, (b) trade unions and (c) local authorities: over what length of time such consultations took place; and what the opinions were of those who were consulted. [128796]

Mr. Meacher: On this occasion at the request of the Deputy Prime Minister, Bill Callaghan, Chair, Health and Safety Commission and Chris Willby, Director, HSE Yorkshire and North East have met with trade unions to discuss with them how HSE's role in the current and future issues of Hull is properly preserved.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many inspectors of Band 2 or equivalent and below were in (a) Health and Safety Executive offices and (b) operational inspection groups in each year between 1974 and 2000 in (i) Newcastle, (ii) Leeds, (iii) Sheffield, (iv) Hull and (v) North Allerton. [128845]

Mr. Meacher: Information is provided from 1995. Information prior to that date could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many premises, for which the HSE had inspection responsibility, were registered on HSE databases for Areas 14, 15 and 19 in each year from 1974 to 1995; and how many open incumbent records there were for each of these areas for the years 1996 to 2000. [128846]

Mr. Meacher: The question asks for data from 1974 to 2000. The Field Operations Directorate of HSE currently uses a computer data system introduced in 1996. The previous data system was in use from 1980 to 1995. The information requested is not kept in a format which allows the question to be answered. FOCUS is a dynamic record of clients and locations with which HSE has had recent and/or continuing contact. The following table gives the current number of open incumbent records categorised by role, e.g. employer, self-employed, sub-contractor etc.

Mr. Meacher: The following data are provided for 1996 onwards. Data pre-1996 are available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) site visits and (b) incumbent contacts were made to premises in Humberside County Commission area in each year from 1974 to 2000 (i) by HSE inspectors based in Hull and (ii) by all inspectors. [128847]

Mr. Meacher: The following data cover the period from 1996 onwards.

Site visits and incumbent contacts made to premises in Humberside County Commission by HSE inspectors based in Hull

	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000

Incumbent contacts	4,377	3,045	3,022	2,823

The question asks for data from 1974 to 2000. The Field Operations Directorate of HSE currently uses a computer data system introduced in 1996. The previous data system was in use from 1980 to 1995. It is no longer practicable to search in this database for the details requested. There was no database prior to 1980. Data pre-1996 are available only at disproportionate cost.

Freightliner

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to continue funding the track access grants for Freightliner. [130193]

Mr. Hill: In December 1999, Freightliner Ltd. lodged an application with the Department's Freight Grants Unit for track access and freight facilities grants, to take effect on the expiry of the existing grant arrangements in May 2001. PricewaterhouseCoopers were appointed jointly by the Department and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority to advise on the application, and their report was received at the end of May. The Secretary of State is currently considering the application in the light of advice from PricewaterhouseCoopers and officials.

Gas Installers

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about his plans to replace the CORGI registration system for gas installers. [130051]

Mr. Meacher: There are no such plans. The Health and Safety Commission is currently carrying out a review of the gas safety regime, and is likely to report to Ministers within the next few months with its conclusions and recommendations. One of the issues being examined in the review is whether the statutory registration scheme for gas installation businesses is still appropriate. The Commission has not yet formed a view on that question.

Cornelis Johanna

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the compensation claim submitted to his Department by Mr. Paul Reeman, of Beverly Court, Upton, Manor Road, Brixham, following the report by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration dated 10 August 1999, regarding the certificate of seaworthiness for the fishing vessel 'Cornelis Johanna'. [130116]

Mr. Hill: A significant interim payment was made to Mr. P. Reeman by the Department in November 1999, prior to the submission of a fully substantiated claim. The Treasury Solicitors' Department is considering carefully the detailed claim submitted by Mr. Reeman's solicitors on 22 May 2000, and will be responding to them very shortly.

A30

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the latest noise tests on the A30 Exeter to Honiton Road; and if he will make a statement. [130363]

Mr. Hill: I have published today the results of the tests. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library of both House. The report shows that noise levels are somewhat higher than expected. Our 10-year Transport Strategy which will be published shortly will include further proposals for dealing with road noise. One result will be that this stretch of the A30 will be resurfaced with a lower noise surface.

Park Homes

Maria Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the report of the Park Homes Working Party. [130364]

Mr. Raynsford: I am pleased to announce today the publication of the report of the Park Homes Working Party, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. I would like to thank the members of the Working Party for the work they have done over the last two years to consider the operation of the control regime applying to the residential park homes sector. The Working Party has produced a large number of wide-ranging recommendations for changes to this regime.

The recommendations will need careful consideration, and it would be helpful therefore to have comments on them from interested bodies or individuals who have not already had a change to contribute to the report. I am requesting that any such comments are sent to my Department by 31 October. I will announce my conclusions on the recommendations in due course after that date.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the President of the Council how many of her Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129626]

Mrs. Beckett: My Department has no touch tone telephone steering systems.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the President of the Council how many employees of her Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129090]

Mrs. Beckett: My Department has recruited one employee from the New Deal, who started work on 3 April 2000. The Department is small, with low recruitment requirements, and this represents 3 per cent. of the total staff.

TREASURY

Internet Access

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 28 June 2000, Official Report, column 540W, on the knowledge economy, (1) what is the maximum distance or travelling time a member of the public can reside from a public internet access point under the definition of having access to the internet; and if he will make a statement; [129216]

(2) what is the maximum distance that a person can live from a point of public access to the internet and still be considered to have access; what is the maximum cost that a provider of a point of public access to the internet can charge with access still being considered to be available; and if he will make a statement. [130074]

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is not so defined; the Government are considering the steps to improve access, bearing in mind the need for a practical approach, the underlying objective of convenient, affordable access to the internet, and taking into account a wide range of factors, including the developing market.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 178W, if he will list his Department's targets for answering (a) named day questions, (b) ordinary written questions and (c) written questions tabled in the House of Lords; and if he will make a statement. [130026]

Mr. Timms: The targets are to answer (a) 50 per cent. of named day questions on the nominated day; (b) 70 per cent. of ordinary written questions within a working week of tabling; and (c) 80 per cent. of House of Lords written questions within a fortnight of tabling.

Public Sector (Ill-health Retirement)

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the review of ill-health retirement in the public sector. [130362]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The report of the review is being published today. A copy is being placed in the House library.

The review has confirmed that ill-health retirement should be available to employees who are genuinely unable to remain in employment for health reasons. But it has found that the present levels of ill-health retirement in the public sector are higher than necessary and higher than in the private sector. Variations in rates between individual sectors, and between employers in the same sector, are also significant indicating that there is scope to bring rates down.

The review concluded that the rules and procedures governing the granting of ill-health retirements need to be tightened in a number of cases, and that action is needed to prevent its misuse and to expose the cost involved. It also concluded that many employers can help to reduce the number of such retirements by adopting best practice on workplace health.

The report sets out 36 recommendations for reducing the incidence of ill-health retirement across the public sector. Departments will draw up action plans for each sector implementing these recommendations. Targets will be set challenging individual employers with the highest rates to reduce these to match those of the best in their sector by 2005.

VAT (Fuels)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what VAT revenue from petrol and diesel sales was anticipated for 2000–01 at the time of the Budget; and what his current forecast is of the yield. [129273]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 6 July 2000]: The forecasts of total VAT are published each year in the Financial Statement and Budget report. No forecasts are made of VAT on individual goods and services.

National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new National Insurance numbers were awarded to (a) children and (b) adults in each year since 1990, broken down into geographical regions. [128936]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 4 July 2000]: New NI numbers were no allocated to children until May 1992. The numbers allocated since that date are as follows:

Calendar year	Numbers allocated
1992 (from May)	8,424,054
1993	2,909,215
1994	797,372
1995	759,368
1996	732,072
1997	720,541
1998	712,643
1999	702,221
2000 (to June)	347,497

As numbers are allocated centrally, it is not possible to break the number down geographically.

Bank Access (Wales)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bank branches closed in Wales (a) between 1990 and 1997 and (b) since 1997. [129735]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information is not available.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in Wales do not have a bank account. [129734]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Results from the 1998–99 Family Resources Survey suggest that around 300,000 adults in Wales do not have a bank or building society account.

Euro

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what costs have so far been incurred by (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in preparing for a possible changeover to the euro. [129593]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Expenditure on changeover planning was set out in the second Outline National Changeover Plan, published on 9 March.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the procedures involved in relation to the working families tax credit when a company becomes insolvent; and what targets the Inland Revenue has for resolving cases which arise in this area within a particular time. [129405]

Dawn Primarolo: When a company that is paying tax credits to one or more of its employees becomes insolvent, the Inland Revenue will pay the tax credits direct to the employee for the remainder of the tax credit award period. The system is designed to ensure that employees of the insolvent company continue to receive their tax credit payments on time.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Stipendiary Magistrates

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many stipendiary magistrates, including deputy and acting stipendiary magistrates, sit in the courts of each region of England and Wales. [130194]

Jane Kennedy: The table lists the stipendiary and acting stipendiary magistrates sitting in each commission area in England and Wales. Some acting stipendiary magistrates sit in more than one commission area. All commission areas can request stipendiary cover when the need arises.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 20 June 2000 to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Taylor), Official Report, column 168W, if he will estimate the number of trials heard in magistrates courts by (a) lay benches and (b) stipendiary magistrates, including acting and deputy stipendiaries, for each of the last five years. [130196]

Jane Kennedy: A breakdown of trials heard in magistrates courts (a) by lay benches and (b) by stipendiary magistrates, including acting and deputy stipendiaries, is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Case Guidance

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what guidance his Department provides as to the nature of the cases which should be heard by (a) lay magistrates and (b) stipendiary magistrates. [130195]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor's Department provides no guidance as to the nature of the cases which should be heard by (a) lay magistrates and (b) stipendiary magistrates.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129639]

Jane Kennedy: Both of the Department's agencies, the Court Service and Public Trust Office, make use of touch tone telephone steering systems for some of their public inquiries. These systems are also used in the Land Registry and Public Record Office, which are Departments responsible to the Lord Chancellor and run on agency lines.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129621]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor's Department's Headquarters makes use of touch tone telephone steering on one inquiry line; the Public Trust Office uses it on its Mental Health Customer Service inquiry line; the Public Record Office uses it on its Family Record centre inquiry line. The Court Service and the Land Registry both make some use of touch tone telephone steering systems but the information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Solicitors' Negligence Cases

Dr. Cable: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in how many cases legal aid has been granted over the last five years in solicitors' negligence cases to (a) solicitors and (b) complainants. [129451]

Mr. Lock: Under the system in place until 31 March 2000, solicitors were unlikely to obtain legal aid to defend negligence cases as they would not usually be financially eligible. Generally they would also have the benefit of professional indemnity insurance.

In the last five years for which figures are available, the number of certificates issued to claimants in actions for legal professional negligence was:

	Number
1993–94	3,342
1994–95	3,509
1995–96	3,717
1996–97	2,959
1997–98	2,365

Figures from 1998–99 onwards are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129483]

Jane Kennedy: This reply covers the Headquarters of the Lord Chancellor's Department (with Associated Offices), the Court Service and the Public Trust Office. CSL Managed Services, who provide the payroll service for this Department, write each year to staff who have been identified as making reduced rate NI contributions to determine whether these contributions continue to be appropriate.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Statistics

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the publication of crime statistics to assist comparison of performance at a local level. [130291]

Mr. Straw: The next publication of crime statistics is due on July 18. As in January, an Annexe to the publication will give crime and detection figures for police Basic Command Units for six types of crime which are of particular public concern. But, for the first time, my Department will be publishing these crime figures in relation to Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships. The partnership data will be published in 13 groups, or 'families', of partnerships. The families draw together areas with similar policing and crime reduction characteristics to assist comparison between the areas. There are 376 partnerships. The Home Office will today publish a Policing and Reducing Crime Unit Briefing Note to provide a description of how the family groups have been devised, which includes the list of the family groups. I have placed a copy of this briefing note in the Library.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130034]

Mr. Straw: Owing to disproportionate cost, I am unable to provide information on bills paid by my Department in the format the hon. Member requires. However, I am able to provide information on the percentage of bills paid within 30 days of a valid invoice as given in the table.

	Percentage
Year	Valid invoices
1998–99	96.6
1999–2000	96.3

Coroners Courts

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department is supporting into the work and efficiency of coroners courts. [130010]

Mr. Boateng: We are currently funding research at the University of Reading into the way in which information is provided to the bereaved by Coroners. The results of this work are expected to become available in the second half of 2001.

Kosovan Refugees

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if his Department will reimburse local authorities for costs incurred after 25 June in respect of Kosovans evacuated to the United Kingdom under humanitarian and medical evacuation programmes; [130111]

(2) what is his policy on the provision of accommodation and support to Kosovans who came to the United Kingdom under humanitarian or medical evacuation programmes and who remained here after 25 June. [130110]

Mrs. Roche: Kosovan Albanians who were evacuated to the United Kingdom on the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme between 25 April and 25 June 1999 or who were later evacuated on the medical evacuation programme were granted a maximum of 12 months leave to enter. They were eligible to claim social security benefits or to take employment during this period. They will continue to qualify for support (including accommodation) if they made an application for further exceptional leave before their original leave expired until 28 days after the decision to refuse their application. They are also eligible to work until an appeal has been dealt with. If they are granted further leave to remain they will be eligible for support during that extended period of leave.

The special grants we propose to pay to certain local authorities in England, towards expenditure incurred in 2000–01, are specified in Special Grant Report (No. 68) which was laid before the House on 6 July.

Under the terms of the Report, Kosovans evacuated under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme ceased to be eligible for support when their initial period of exceptional leave to enter the UK expired (25 June 2000 at the latest). However, local authorities will be able to claim for costs associated with the closure of certain vacated reception and return centres up to 25 July.

Expenditure on support for evacuees who arrived on authorised medical evacuation flights will continue until their initial period of exceptional leave to enter ends: up to 31 March 2001 (in some cases).

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each local authority which claimed grants from his Department for supporting asylum seekers between 6 December 1999 and 31 March 2000, giving in each case (a) the actual expenditure by the local authority and (b) the grant-eligible expenditure of the local authority. [130112]

Mrs. Roche: The information is as follows:

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the National Asylum Support Service to assume responsibility for all in-country asylum applicants. [130118]

Mrs. Roche: I propose to extend the new support arrangements for asylum seekers in England and Wales as set out in Part VI of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 according to the following timetable:

Date
Monday 24 July	London in-country cases
Monday 31 July	North East, Yorkshire and Humberside and Wales in-country cases
Monday 14 August	In-country cases in North West, East Midlands, Eastern, South West and South Central
Tuesday 29 August	In-country cases in West Midlands and Sussex
Monday 25 September	All disbenefited cases in England and Wales

The arrangements which take effect between 24 July and 29 August will apply to all new asylum seekers in England and Wales who claim asylum on, or after, the relevant dates set out in the table (in-country applications in Scotland and Northern Ireland are already covered by the new arrangements). All asylum seekers who are currently being supported by local authority social services departments under the interim arrangements in Schedule 9 to the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 will continue to be so supported.

"Disbenefited cases" are those asylum seekers who, prior to 3 April 2000, were in receipt of social security benefits, but who on or after 25 September 2000 receive a first negative decision, who are thus no longer eligible for social security benefits, who go on to appeal and who continue to be eligible for support.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers have (a) been offered, (b) accepted and (c) refused an offer of accommodation by him under the support arrangements introduced on and after 1 April. [130108]

Mrs. Roche: The National Asylum Support Service began on 3 April 2000. The available information is that as at 3 July 2000 there had been 5,100 claims for support from asylum seekers. Not all claims for support will involve a request for accommodation. Of these claims, 2,190 were offered accommodation.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the state of contract negotiations between the National Asylum Support Service and each of the regional consortiums. [130113]

Mrs. Roche: As of 10 July, contracts have been exchanged with Scotland and the North-East. Negotiations with other consortia are ongoing and we hope that a number of areas will be signing up over the coming months. I am not prepared to give information about the current state of any of these negotiations, since to do so could harm the outcome of these negotiations.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how may children of school age are (a) asylum seekers and (b) dependants of asylum seekers in the United Kingdom; how many of those children have been dispersed outside London and the South-East; and if he will make a statement. [130109]

Mrs. Roche: In 1999, the United Kingdom received 3,349 applications for asylum from unaccompanied minors (aged under 18).

Information on the age of asylum seeker dependants in the United Kingdom is not currently available.

Information on dispersal of asylum seekers by age is not held centrally.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will delay the placement of additional asylum seekers in Plymouth until proper facilities and support services are in place which are fully funded by his Department. [130120]

Mrs. Roche: London and the South-East have had to manage a disproportionate number of asylum seekers and there is a recognised need to disperse asylum seekers to suitable areas throughout the United Kingdom. National Asylum Support Service (NASS) has acquired some accommodation in Plymouth through the private sector who are contracted to provide various services, apart from accommodation. There is a "one stop shop" located in Plymouth. We are satisfied that adequate facilities and support infrastructure are available for asylum seekers in Plymouth and that there is no need to delay further placements.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the negotiations to place asylum seekers in Plymouth and the extent to which he consulted the South West Consortium of local authorities. [130119]

Mrs. Roche: We have made clear our intention to disperse asylum seekers throughout the United Kingdom. The placing of asylum seekers in Plymouth is part of that dispersal programme. As of 10 July, ten asylum seekers have been dispersed to Plymouth by the National Asylum Support Service. There is an established consultation process between NASS and the regional consortiums regarding dispersal and siting of cluster areas. NASS last wrote to the South West Consortium confirming that Plymouth remained a cluster area on 8 June. The consortium is also fully aware of the contractors within the area.

The Director of NASS has written to the Chief Executive of South Gloucestershire explaining the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of property in Plymouth and expressing regret that we were unable to consult in advance.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made to put dispersed asylum seekers in contact with immigration and advisory services which offer free advice. [129473]

Mrs. Roche: The Legal Services Commission provides funding, through contracts with quality-assured suppliers of legal services, for the provision of free legal advice and representation to those who are eligible. In addition, the voluntary sector is establishing "one stop shops" in each of the cluster areas where asylum seekers can obtain advice.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will supply immigration and advisory services that provide free advice with the names and addresses of dispersed asylum seekers. [129472]

Mrs. Roche: No. The routine disclosure of personal details of asylum seekers supported by the National Asylum Support Service to third parties would not be compatible with data protection legislation or our duty to confidentiality to asylum seekers.

Europol

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reply he has sent to the request of the Presidency of the European Union (7369/00) for approval of a draft recommendation for rules relating to requests from Europol to member states to initiate investigations on its behalf, with particular reference to the proposal that member states should inform Europol of their reasons for not agreeing to such requests. [130055]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The draft Council Recommendation relating to the possibility of Europol asking member states to initiate investigations (7369/00 now 7369/1/00) is under discussion in the Europol Working Group. The Government's position is set out in an explanatory memorandum deposited with the scrutiny committees on 2 June, copies of which have been placed in the Library. We are negotiating the draft Recommendation on the basis that it is broadly acceptable. The Recommendation does not impose any obligations on the member states. Competent authorities in the United Kingdom would in general already adhere to the principles in the Recommendation in dealing with requests from Europol through the Europol National Unit. We consider that, while it will not always be appropriate for member states to inform Europol of the reasons for not agreeing to their request to conduct an investigation, it is good practice to do so wherever possible.

Edwards Report

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the recommendations of the Edwards Report. [128509]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle) on 16 March 2000, Official Report, column 262W.

The Islands have continued to implement the Edwards Report. Developments since 16 March include:

Guernsey: on 31 May, the Guernsey States approved the "policy letter" for new legislation on regulating director services, which will address the "Sark Lark", among other things. This step paves the way for drafting the legislation and presentation to the states in the autumn.

Isle of Man: the Corporate Services Providers Bill has been making legislative process in the Isle of Man.

Jersey: the Financial Services (Extension) (Jersey) Law has been referred to the Home Office for Royal Assent. It extends supervision to providers of services in connection with companies and trusts.

Glen Howard

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take following the inquest into the death of Glen Howard; and if he will make a statement. [129588]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Crown Prosecution Service have now received a transcript of the inquest into the death of Glenn Howard. They will be reconsidering the case in light of all the evidence that was presented there and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the specific details at this stage. However, the use of restraint tactics when dealing with mentally disordered persons is a matter which I understand the police are reviewing as part of the continual process of evaluating and improving training.

CS Spray

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the Association of Chief Police Officers' decision to make its guidance on the use of CS spray available to interested parties; and if he will make a statement. [129584]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I welcome it.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that the planned research into the interaction of CS spray and anti-psychotic medication used in the treatment of schizophrenia will involve wide consultation with relevant service users, carers and voluntary organisations. [129586]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I am not aware of any research planned specifically on the interaction of CS spray and anti-psychotic medication, although the research we shall be carrying out at the recommendation of the Committee on Toxicity on the longer-term effects of CS spray may provide information on this subject.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the Association of Chief Police Officers' decision on local protocols with health and social services departments about the use of CS spray on people known to have a severe mental illness; and if he will make a statement. [129585]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I agree with the Association of Chief Police Officer's (ACPO) recommendation that chief officers should consider drawing up local protocols with health authorities and social services departments on this matter.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers from the Metropolitan police left the service in the last 12 months; and what were the reasons given for leaving. [129507]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Figures provided by the Metropolitan police show that in the 12 months from April 1999 to March 2000, 1,504 people ceased to serve as Metropolitan police officers. This equates to a turnover rate of 5.66 per cent.

Out of the total 554 officers retired on ordinary police pensions, 361 resigned, 285 were medically retired and 243 transferred to other forces. A further 61 officers left for other reasons, including dismissal and death in service.

I understand that concerns about quality of life and the costs associated with living in London have been reasons historically given by those resigning and transferring to other forces for their decisions. A new exit poll introduced by the Metropolitan police in April 2000 will give more detailed information for future years.

Police Force Areas

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police force areas fall within which parliamentary constituencies. [129458]

Police Complaints

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average length of time was the Police Complaints Authority took to deal with complaints in the last 12 months; and what the PCA guidelines stipulate this should be. [129464]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Police Complaints Authority (PCA) agreed targets for the completion of each stage of the complaints process in a joint statement of intent with the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) in 1992. The PCA's performance against these targets is set out in its annual report.

In 1998–99, the last year for which figures are available, 63 per cent. of PCA supervised investigations were completed within the agreed target of 120 days. The PCA took an average of 47 days to complete its discipline review of completed investigations, against an agreed target of 28 days.

Judicial Decisions

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under which European Union or Community instrument Her Majesty's Government (a) have agreed and (b) plan to agree the mutual recognition of court judgments among EU member states; if he will list each such document and when it (i) was published, (ii) was considered in Parliament and (iii) came into or is expected to come into force; and which bodies or persons the Government consulted before reaching such decisions. [129753]

Mrs. Roche: Action to follow up the conclusions of the Tampere European Council on mutual recognition of judicial decisions has not yet reached the stage of European Union or Community legislation. The French Presidency has however tabled a document in the Article 36 Committee, dated 26 June, (reference 9737/00) which outlines a programme of legislative measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in criminal matters. The document has been deposited for scrutiny in both Houses. The Government intend to support work on the programme of measures, and will consult appropriate United Kingdom bodies including those concerned in implementing the proposals, before any legislation is adopted.

Immigration

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 14 June 2000, Official Report, column 626W, on immigration, if he will list those parts of European treaties coming into force subsequent to the passage of the Immigration Act 1971 which permit questioning, searching and detention on grounds of public policy through derogation from treaty provisions concerning freedom of movement and absence of internal frontiers within the European Union and Community. [129754]

Mrs. Roche: Under the Treaty establishing the European Community (TEC), the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the European Union is subject to derogations on grounds of public policy, public security and public health. These limitations on the Treaty freedoms are allowed by Article 39(3) (as regards freedom of movement for workers), Article 46 (as regards the right of establishment) and Article 55 (as regards the provision of services), and are also recognised by Article 18 (inserted by the Treaty on European Union).

The same limitations can be found in the secondary Community legislation on freedom of movement, including Directives 68/360/EEC, 73/148/EEC and 75/34/EEC. The use by member states of these derogations is subject to Directive 64/221/EEC on the co-ordination of special measures concerning the movement and residence of foreign nationals which are justified on the grounds of public policy, public security, or public health, extended by Directives 72/194/EEC and 75/35/EEC.

In order for Immigrations Officers to decide whether a person should be excluded on the grounds of public policy, public security or public health, Article 20(2)(e) of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994 applies the powers to question, search and detain contained in Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 to EEA nationals.

In the case of the United Kingdom, the question of derogation from provision concerning the absence of internal frontiers within the EU does not arise, having regard to our special position on the maintenance of internal frontier controls.

Citizenship Applicants (Language Difficulties)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applicants for UK citizenship in each year since 1990 were turned down because they had an inadequate grasp of English. [129614]

Mrs. Roche: Information is not available in the form requested for the years 1990–94.

The number of applications refused for an insufficient knowledge of English between 1995 and June 2000 (the latest month for which information is available) are shown in the table.

Year	Total

Firearms

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish his response to the Second report of the Home Affairs Committee for Session 1999–2000 on Controls over Firearms (HC95). [129505]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government are currently considering the Select Committee's report and hopes to publish their response by way of a Command Paper shortly.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he collates on the amount of time which is taken by each constabulary to come to a decision on applications for shotgun licences in the last five years; and what were the longest and shortest waiting times. [129506]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government do not collect statistics routinely on the time taken by individual police forces to grant or renew shotgun certificates.

Children's Homes

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans exist for a co-ordinated police response in relation to (a) child abuse in care, (b) disappearances from children's homes and (c) child deaths in children's homes. [129769]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO)/Local Government Association jointly issued a set of guidelines, "Missing from Care: Procedures and Practices in Caring for Missing Children" (1988), underlining the importance of close co-operation between police and social services when children go missing from care.

"Working Together to Safeguard Children" is a Department of Health document which has been prepared and issued jointly by the DOH, the Home Office and the Department of Education and Employment. It is addressed to those who work in the health and education services, the police, social services, the probation service, and those whose work brings them into contact with children and families. It is intended to provide a national framework within which agencies at a local level draw up and agree detailed ways of working together to promote children's welfare and to protect them from abuse and neglect and, in the most extreme cases, death.

Following publication of "Learning the Lessons—the Government's response to the Waterhouse Report", there is to be an inter-agency review of best practice in conducting complex abuse investigations. A Review Group is being established to take forward this work, bringing together representatives from the Home Office, Department of Health, Local Government Association, the Association of Directors of Social Services and the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Child Detainees

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many girls aged 15, 16 and 17 years were received into custody during 1999 (a) under sentence, (b) convicted unsentenced and (c) unconvicted. [129697]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the table.

Receptions[1] into prisons and young offender institutions in England and Wales of females aged 15, 16 and 17, by type of custody in 1999[2]

Type of custody	Age 15	Age 16	Age 17

[2] Provisional figures

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average length of sentence was, by type of offence, for girls aged under 18 years received into custody in each year from 1994 to 1999. [129698]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the table.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the haulage companies charged under the Carriers' Liability (Clandestine Entrants and Sale of Transporters) Regulations 2000 have been charged on more than one occasion. [129793]

Mrs. Roche: Four.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the haulage companies charged under the Carriers' Liability (Clandestine Entrants and Sale of Transporters) Regulations 2000 were registered in Scotland. [129792]

Mrs. Roche: Of a total of 233 penalties raised by 6 July 2000, 59 had been raised against British registered companies. Records relating specifically to Scottish registered companies are not kept separately.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness and (b) the effect upon the haulage industry of the Carriers' Liability (Clandestine Entrants and Sale of Transporters) Regulations 2000. [129797]

Mrs. Roche: The civil penalty provisions of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 were introduced as recently as 3 April 2000. Provisional figures indicate that the number of illegal entrants detected in Kent since the introduction of the provisions has fallen by 25 per cent., and that the number detected nationally has fallen by about 22 per cent. Total penalties imposed up to 6 July 2000 amount to £2,530,000.

There is now an obligation on lorry drivers to search their vehicles before they embark for the United Kingdom. A code of practice established in consultation with the industry protects drivers from the imposition of a civil penalty if they can show that they have complied with its terms.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many hauliers convicted of transporting clandestine entrants into the United Kingdom since the implementation of the Carriers' Liability (Clandestine Entrants and Sale of Transporters) Regulations 2000 have been fined, for each particular incident (a) £2,000, (b) £4,000, (c) £6,000, (d) £8,000, (e) £10,000, (f) £12,000, (g) £14,000, (h) £16,000, (i) £18,000, (j) £20,000, (k) £22,000, (l) £24,000, (m) £26,000, (n) £28,000, (o) £30,000, (p) £32,000, (q) £34,000, (r) £36,000, (s) £38,000, (t) £40,000, (u) £42,000, (v) £44,000, (w) £46,000, (x) £48,000, (y) £50,000 and (z) £52,000 and over. [129956]

Mrs. Roche: The Civil penalty is set at £2,000 for each clandestine illegal entrant found concealed in a transporter. Penalties imposed thus far have been as follows. Fourteen charges of £2,000; 31 charges of £4,000; 49 charges of £6,000; 37 charges of £8,000; 27 charges of £10,000; 18 charges of £12,000; 15 charges of £14,000; eight charges of £16,000; 10 charges of £18,000; five charges of £20,000; seven charges of £22,000; one charge of £24,000; two charges of £26,000; one charge of £28,000; one charge of £32,000; one charge of £36,000; two charges of £38,000; one charge of £42,000; one charge of £44,000; one charge of £46,000; one charge of £50,000; and one charge of £100,000.

Xenotransplantation

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many primates have been used in the years since 1995 in research involving pig kidneys and pig hearts being transplanted into primates; and what percentage of these primates have rejected the transplanted organs. [129961]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The number used in xenotransplantation research in each of the last four years for which information is available is as follows:

1996—60

1997—83

1998—81

1999—49.

The majority of the primates were euthanased once they began to show clinical or biochemical evidence of terminal organ failure or when their clinical condition began to give rise for concern.

Child Curfew Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to extend the age range covered by child curfew orders; [129243]

(2) what guidance he has issued regarding child curfew orders; [129239]

(3) how many (a) child curfew orders and (b) antisocial behaviour orders have been granted; and if he will break down the number granted in each (i) local authority and (ii) parliamentary constituency. [129265]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government issued detailed guidance to local authorities and the police in September 1998 on the provisions for local child curfew schemes under sections 14 and 15 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. A copy is in the Library. No applications have yet been received from local authorities to establish such a scheme. Following consultation with local authorities and the police, the Government are considering what improvements might be made to the provisions, including extending the age range, to ensure that they are able to contribute effectively to local partnership efforts to tackle anti-social behaviour.

Information on the number of anti-social behaviour orders granted by the courts is being collected centrally with effect from 1 June 2000. Following a trawl of police forces we are aware that at least 80 such orders were made between 1 April 1999 and 31 May 2000, the latest date for which figures are available. We know that anti-social behaviour orders have been granted in the following police force areas, although the list is not exhaustive:

Avon and Somerset;
Thames Valley;
Cambridgeshire;
West Mercia;
Cleveland;
West Midlands;
Cumbria;
West Yorkshire;
Derbyshire;
Devon and Cornwall;
Greater Manchester;
Hampshire;
Hertfordshire;
Lancashire;
Leicestershire;
Metropolitan;
Merseyside;
Norfolk;
North Yorkshire;
Northumbria;
Nottinghamshire;
South Yorkshire;
Suffolk; and Sussex.

Internet Service Providers (Defamation Law)

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the operation of the law of defamation as it relates to the liability of internet service providers. [129407]

Mr. Lock: I have been asked to reply.

A consultation paper on perceived abuses of defamation procedures is currently being prepared by my Department. This will be issued within the next few weeks. It will cover, among other things, defamation on the internet and the subsequent liability of internet service providers.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultation he has held with internet service providers on the law of defamation. [129406]

Mr. Lock: I have been asked to reply.

No formal consultation has yet been held. However, my Department will shortly be issuing a consultation paper on perceived abuses of defamation procedures which will cover the issue of defamation on the internet. Comments will be invited from the Internet Service Providers Association.

WALES

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129851]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information requested as follows:

(a) 107 (33 per cent.)

(b) 65 (30 per cent.)

On 1 July 1999, responsibility for most appointments to non-departmental public bodies in Wales transferred to the National Assembly for Wales. I have made no appointments since that date.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Overseas Territories Bill

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answers of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 496W, and 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 240W, if he will publish the Overseas Territories Bill in draft. [129261]

Mr. Battle: Our priority is to introduce the Bill into the House as soon as Parliamentary time becomes available. We will consider options for publication within that context.

Mexico

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the conduct of the recent elections in Mexico. [129930]

Mr. Battle: The Government welcome the outcome of the Mexican Presidential elections and congratulate Vicente Fox on his historic victory. We will work to establish the same excellent relations with him and his administration which we have enjoyed under his predecessor, Ernesto Zedillo.

We are particularly pleased that the elections passed off so smoothly and that there have been no allegations of serious irregularities.

Yemen

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Yemeni Government on the death penalty passed by the Aden Tawaki Court on the Somali national Mohammed Omer Haji for converting to Christianity unless he recants and returns to Islam and on Yemen's apostasy laws. [130075]

Mr. Hain: Our Ambassador in Sana'a raised the case of Mohamed Omer Haji with the Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs, Abdullah al-Sayedi on 9 July and made clear our concerns. We understand that Mohamed Omer Haji has not yet been sentenced. His case resumes on 12 July. We stand ready to raise the matter again with the Yemeni government.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129847]

Mr. Hain: Since 1 May 1997, Ministers in the Department have made

(a) two paid appointments, of which none were women

(b) 128 unpaid appointments, of which 42 were women (32.8 per cent.)

The Department is committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. To that end, it has drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women holding public appointments to 35 per cent. by 2000 and to 50 per cent. by 2003. The Department's latest plans, together with the Government's overall plan, were published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos: Opening up Public Appointments 2000—2003", copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

Colombia

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the United States concerning possible repercussions for the environment of the use of GM fungicide on coca crops in Colombia. [130018]

Mr. Battle: We are not aware of the use of GM fungicides on coca crops in Colombia. No representations have been made by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to the US Government on this issue.

The US Government are providing funding to the United Nations Drug Control Programme as part of its research into the possible use of Fusarium Oxysporum, a naturally-occurring fungus, in coca eradication programmes. Field trials on Fusarium Oxysporum have not yet been conducted in Colombia. Before these take place further research would need to be carried out inter alia to confirm that it is specific to coca and would not harm agricultural crops and other plant species. Field testing and any subsequent eradication campaign would also have to be approved by the Colombian Government.

Ballistic Missile Threat

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the threat of attack on the UK by missiles launched from (a) Iran, (b) Iraq, (c) North Korea and (d) other states. [130019]

Mr. Vaz: Our current assessment is that there is no significant ballistic missile threat to the UK at present.

We continue to monitor developments in this area closely.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the protocols for the European Convention on Human Rights, indicating the rights in each protocol and the members of the Council of Europe which have not ratified these protocols in each case. [129732]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is publicly available. Full details of the Protocols to the European Convention on Human Rights, and which Council of Europe member states have signed and ratified in each case, can be found on the website of the European Court of Human Rights (http://www.echr.coe.int).

Zimbabwe

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the election process in Zimbabwe. [130431]

Mr. Hain: We welcome the detailed EU and Commonwealth Observer Mission reports. Both made clear that the election campaign was marred by violence and intimidation. Despite this, about half of the electorate turned out to vote in polls which were conducted in a peaceful and orderly manner. For the first time Zimbabwe has a sizeable opposition in Parliament, and the result demonstrates a clear desire for change on the part of the people of Zimbabwe. The Movement for Democratic Change is proposing to mount legal challenges in 26 constituencies.

The EU report has been placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129850]

Mr. Mandelson: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will answer the question from the hon. Member for East Surrey (ref. 125026) tabled on 5 June, concerning the publication of the revised Budget and Business Plan of the New Millennium Experience Company. [128005]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 4 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) on 11 July 2000, Official Report, columns 481–82W.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129491]

Mr. Chris Smith: Neither my Department nor the Royal Parks Agency has a policy to remind staff who pay reduced rates of National Insurance contributions of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates.

National Lottery

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what has been the value to date of National Lottery grant applications made by organisations in Gloucestershire; broken down by constituency; [129517]

(2) how many Lottery grant applications have been made by organisations in Gloucestershire, broken down by parliamentary constituency. [129513]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The information requested is not available as not all Lottery distributors are able to break down applications by constituency or by county.

The number and value of Lottery awards in Gloucestershire by constituency, according to my Department's National Lottery Awards Database, are shown in the table.

Constituency	Amount awarded (£)	Total number of awards
Cheltenham	13,007,979	80
Cotswold	15,880,770	130

Tobacco Sponsorship

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) when he last met the Task Force on Tobacco Sponsorship; and what was discussed; [129534]

(2) what alternative sources of sport sponsorship have been identified by the Tobacco Sponsorship Task Force; [129536]

(3) which sports have benefited from alternative sources of sports sponsorship identified by the Tobacco Sponsorship Task Force. [129538]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 July 2000]: The Government have looked very carefully at how best to achieve an end to the advertising and promotion of tobacco at sports events in a way that will minimise any damage to the sports concerned. A Task Force of business and sponsorship, which I chair, exists to assist sports. All sports will be given up to July 2003 to secure alternative sponsorship, and the Government supported a derogation in EC legislation that those meeting the criteria for 'global events' will be allowed up to July 2006 if they agree to a reduction in expenditure and advertising.

Seven sports have sought assistance to make the transition from tobacco sponsorship—rugby league, clay pigeon shooting, billiards and snooker, pool, darts, ice-hockey and angling. Over the last 18 months there has been extensive contact with the seven sports and the Task Force has been there to: make information available; offer advice to support the development of new marketing strategies; to make initial contacts with potential sponsors; and offer professional advice on how the sports can start to position themselves in a changing marketplace. The Task Force last met together on 18 October 1999. Since then, there have been further meetings between members of the Task Force and the governing bodies.

The Task Force has now concluded the first phase of its work to identify the needs of the sports and ascertain how it can best assist them. Most sports have confirmed that it is too soon to be looking to replace existing contracts, and have indicated that the help of the Task Force can most effectively be targeted in the 12–18 months before these contracts lapse, which is the normal lead time for negotiating new sponsorships. It has been agreed with the sports therefore that there is no need for the Task Force to continue to meet on a regular basis. The Task Force has made it clear to all the sports that its assistance is still available in its second phase, as and when they require it.

I have had recent discussions with the British Darts Organisation and the Ice Hockey Superleague, who have both indicated that they wish to continue to utilise the expertise of the Task Force. The National Federation of Anglers have taken up an offer made by the Chairman of the Virgin Group to use the Internet to assist with its marketing and promotion.

Snooker, rugby league, clay pigeon shooting and pool have indicated that at this stage they do not require the assistance of the Task Force, preferring to wait until the lead in time before their tobacco contracts need to be renewed to see how the Task Force can best assist them.

All the sports are aware that the Task Force is available to assist them at any time if they feel they need its help.

Works of Art (Theft)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people have been dismissed from employment in the institutions holding the national collections for (a) theft and (b) attempted theft of works of art and artifacts since 1990. [130062]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have asked my officials to contact the National Museums and Galleries which are sponsored by DCMS to request information for a reply to my hon. Friend's question. I will write to him as soon as this is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library of the House.

World Cup

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects to place in the Library the full audited accounts of Sport England's contribution to the FA World Cup bid. [129832]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 10 July 2000]: Lottery money totalling £3.14 million has been allocated to the Football Association's bid to host the World Cup in 2006. The uses to which that money is put are closely monitored by Sport England, and details will appear in Sport England's Lottery Annual Report.

Sport England's contribution to the bid is subject to the same general terms and conditions as other major Lottery grants. It is not a general Lottery condition to require published accounts. However, reference to the total costs of the bid will be made in the FA's General Annual Report and Accounts and I have asked the FA, in view of the interest in this matter, to make the detailed information available.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130036]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 11 July 2000]: The percentage of valid invoices for goods and services paid within 30 days or other agreed payment terms by my Department and the Royal Parks Agency was as follows:

Percentage

	1998–99	1999–2000
DCMS	97.8	99.6
Royal Parks Agency	98.0	94.0
Combined	97.9	97.3

Football Arrests

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the arrests made at football matches, by offence, for each Premiership and Football League club, in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [129000]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

Information on arrests at, or in connection with, football matches is collated by the National Criminal Intelligence Service. The data currently available, which are shown, cover arrests by offence for the period 1996–97 to 1998–99. They have not been collated on a league or club basis in the past but will be in future.

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people were (a) arrested and (b) ejected from the ground at football matches at each Premiership and Football League club in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [128999]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

Information on arrests at football matches is collated and analysed by the National Criminal Intelligence Service. Data are only currently available by Football League Division between the 1992–93 and 1998–99 seasons and are indicated as shown. Unfortunately, no data are obtainable on ejections from football grounds.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish his annual report on the Social Fund for 1999–2000 and the Social Fund Commissioner's annual report. [130673]

Angela Eagle: The Secretary of State's annual report on the Social Fund for 1999–2000 (Cm 4755) was published today and has been laid before Parliament.

The report records that total gross expenditure in 1999–2000 was £612 million. This included, 219,000 non-repayable grants and 1,950,000 interest free loans together worth £556 million and funeral, maternity and cold weather payments totalling £56 million. In addition, around 10 million people in over 7.5 million older households received winter fuel payments worth around £760 million.

The Social Fund Commissioner's annual report has also been published today and copies placed in the Library.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129854]

Mr. Rooker: The Government are committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Department has drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women and ethnic minorities holding public appointments. The latest plans, together with the Government's overall plan, were published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos: Opening up Public Appointments 2000–03", copies of which are in the Library.

Since 1 May 1997, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made a total of 57 paid appointments, including reappointments, of which 40 per cent. were women. Similarly, there were 158 unpaid appointments made and 30 per cent. of these were women. The information is set out in the table.

Benefit Fraud Inspectorate

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the inspection report of the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate in respect of Braintree district council. [130672]

Mr. Rooker: The Benefit Fraud Inspectorate report has been published today in respect of Braintree district council and copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

The report provides recommendations aimed at helping the council address weaknesses and to improve the administration of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit, as well as their respective counter fraud activities.

Inspectors found the Benefits Section at Braintree placed a strong emphasis on achieving high levels of speed and efficiency, which compared favourably against the performance of other councils. However, concern is noted that the high priority given to processing claims speedily had been at the expense of ensuring that all payments were secure and valid.

The BFI considered the security of Braintree's benefits system needs to be strengthened in three areas: full compliance with the Verification Framework; fraud investigation; overpayment recovery and classification.

The report notes that Braintree had introduced the Verification Framework eight weeks before Inspectors arrived for the on-site inspection. Although it was still early days, the report notes signs that its introduction was already paying off, by uncovering claims with undeclared income and capital. This was contributing to a reduction in Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit expenditure. The council had also introduced other new security initiatives including the "Do Not Redirect" mail scheme and was using a Remote Access Terminal to access information from the Department and Benefits Agency.

The report illustrates that the council is committed to customer service in their speed of processing claims for benefit. It is encouraging that they have also committed themselves to the Verification Framework which provides a minimum set of standards for ensuring that payment of benefit is made to the right person in circumstances that are checked for correctness.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is now considering the report and will be asking the council for their proposals in response to the findings and recommendations of the BFI.

Mr. Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the inspection report of the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate in respect of Eden district council. [130674]

Mr. Rooker: The Benefit Fraud Inspectorate report has been published today in respect of Eden district council and copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

The report provides recommendations aimed at helping the council address weaknesses and to improve the administration of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit, as well as their respective counter fraud activities.

The BFI reports that Eden District Council had a strong commitment to ensuring benefit payments were paid promptly and overpayments recovered wherever possible. The report notes a reasonable standard of verification was being applied to claims and Inspectors anticipated further improvement once the impact is felt of the council's implementation of the Verification Framework.

Inspectors had a number of concerns, which included a lack of information that was necessary to support the council's benefit operations. It is reported that the combination of this and inadequate targets, measurements and procedural guidance meant that management were taking organisational decisions based on insufficient information. In addition minimal management checking provided little assurance that fraud and error was being prevented from entering the council's benefit system.

The report illustrates that the council is committed to customer service in their speed of processing claims for benefit. It is encouraging that they have also committed themselves to the Verification Framework which provides a minimum set of standards for ensuring that payment of benefit payment is made to the right person in circumstances that are checked for correctness.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is now considering the report and will be asking the council for their proposals in response to the findings and recommendations of the BFI.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage of total staff this represents. [129145]

Angela Eagle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

This Department has recruited 467 New Deal employees as at 1 April 2000. This represents approximately 0.5 per cent. of total staff.

Standard Interest Rate

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to update the standard interest rate used by his Department to include lenders not currently covered in the calculation. [129474]

Mr. Bayley: There are no plans to alter the method of calculating the Standard Interest Rate.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to reduce the three month delay in changes in the standard interest rate used by his Department. [129450]

Mr. Bayley: We have no plans to change the current arrangements, which give effect to changes as quickly as is practicable. Once the information is received from the Office for National Statistics of an alteration in the interest rates, the Department immediately sets in motion the procedures, to amend the relevant computer systems, and legislation. On the last two occasions that the standard interest rate was changed, in April and June 2000, it took six working days and five working days respectively from the date the Department received notification of the change in rates, to the date that regulations were laid. Regulations are laid at least 21 days in advance of their coming into force to allow for proper Parliamentary procedures to be followed. The same timetable applies when the standard interest rate increases as when it decreases.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the single organisation responsible for pensioners and pensions policy will have responsibility for attendance allowance. [128860]

Mr. Rooker: We will set out our plans for the new pensions organisation in due course.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if a claimant's absence when visited by a housing benefit verification officer is considered a negative identification check if the visit is unannounced; and if he will make a statement. [130066]

Angela Eagle: No, if the claimant is not available when visited unannounced, the local authority would either make a further visit or collect the information in another way. A visit is not required to establish the claimant's identity.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reasons it is necessary for pensioners to comply with the requirements of the housing benefit verification framework. [130067]

Angela Eagle: The Verification Framework guidance is aimed at ensuring proper standards in the administration of Council Tax Benefit and Housing Benefit by local authorities. This ensures that the right amount of benefit is paid to any claimant who is properly entitled to it. The checks local authorities are required to make under the Framework apply to all claimants, no matter what their age or status.

That said, as we announced in the Housing Green Paper, we are moving towards organisational changes, which will see services to pensioners being better tailored to their needs. This includes looking at whether there is a need to require pensioners to make claims as often as they have to at the moment. However, any change is still likely to need rigorous checking at the outset to ensure that the full and correct amount of benefit is put in payment.

Anecdotal evidence from local authorities indicates that in some areas the introduction of the Verification Framework has highlighted a significant number of incorrect payments to pensioners. Although in many cases overpayments have been identified, there are also a substantial number of cases where underpayments have been established and rectified as a result of verification.

Benefit Payments

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were in receipt of both Widows Benefit and Housing Benefit in the latest year for which figures are available. [130063]

Angela Eagle: The information has already been published in both Social Security Statistics—May 1998 (table 3.12, page 82) and in Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit Annual Summary Statistics—May 1998 (table 3.10, page 15). The figures for May 1998 are the latest available.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the percentage increase in (a) Widows Benefit and (b) Housing Benefit for the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will use a common index for uprating both. [130064]

Angela Eagle: Following the normal practice, Widows Benefit was uprated in line with RPI of 1.1 per cent. with effect from April 2000. Housing Benefit for non-pensioners was uprated by the Rossi index of 1.6 per cent. for the same period. Housing Benefit for pensioners was uprated by average earnings of 4.6 per cent. We have no plans to use a common index for uprating Widows Benefit and Housing Benefit.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pupil Statistics

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the average staying-on-in-education rate was of 16-year-olds in the Metropolitan

Borough of Dudley between 1995 and 1998, (a) overall and (b) broken down by those who attended (i) schools and (ii) further education colleges. [128928]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 4 July 2000]: Participation in education by 16-year-olds in England rose to 77.4 per cent. (provisional) at the end of 1999, from 76.2 per cent. in 1998. The Secretary of State recently launched a major £3 million advertising campaign aimed at encouraging this year's school leavers and others to stay on in some form of learning. The "Don't Quit Now" campaign is particularly aimed at those who left this year with few, if any GCSEs and are in danger of dropping out of education and training.

Figures for participation in education in Dudley LEA are given in the following table; data for 1998–99 are not yet available. Figures for GST in Dudley TEC are also shown, as there is evidence that in TEC areas high rates of training compensate to some extent for lower levels of full-time education.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129489]

Mr. Wills: The Department for Education and Employment (DfEE) writes to staff identified as paying reduced rate National Insurance contributions each year, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rate contributions. This is in line with Inland Revenue guidance that employers may consider it worthwhile to have arrangements in place to issue a periodic reminder to these employees.[1]

This exercise was first completed in October 1997 and now occurs at the beginning of each financial year.

Musical Chairs

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the proposal to limit the practice of the game musical chairs in schools, included in the document "Towards a Non-violent Society: Checkpoints for Early Years", launched by the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities. [129084]

Ms Hodge: We oppose any suggestions that musical chairs should be banned. Musical chairs is a reasonable traditional game which has been enjoyed by children for generations and should continue to be so.

The publication "Towards a Non-violent Society: Checkpoints for Early Years" was produced by the Forum on Children and Violence. It was not guidance from my Department and was not produced, commissioned or distributed by the Department for Education and Employment. Although there are some useful tips in the document, the reference to musical chairs is not something we endorse. Newspaper reports suggesting otherwise were wrong.

Neo-natal Hearing Screening

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what communication his Department has had with the Department of Health about developing the provision of language and educational support for children from zero to two years in preparation for the pilot project and the introduction of universal neo-natal hearing screening; [130099]

(2) what communication his Department (a) has had and (b) plans to have with (i) local education authorities, (ii) teachers of the deaf, (iii) the teacher training authority, (iv) teaching unions and (v) organisations of and for deaf and hard of hearing people about (1) the launch and (2) the national roll-out of the neo-natal hearing screening pilot project; [130101]

(3) when his Department will establish an advisory group on co-ordinating the development of language and educational provision in preparation for the (a) launch and (b) national roll-out of the pilot project for neo-natal hearing screening; and when it will announce the composition of the group. [130102]

Ms Hodge: Discussions between DfEE and DH have taken place at both ministerial and official level about neo-natal hearing screening, including the consequential need for educational services. Similarly, both Departments are in regular contact with key organisations in this field.

The National Screening Committee advises Ministers on proposed screening programmes and follows set procedures for setting up pilot projects. These include establishing an executive group to represent the various interests to discuss and determine the practicalities of how the pilot projects will develop. When the National Screening Committee establishes an executive group for neo-natal hearing screening, it will include a representative from this Department.

A key function of the executive group and indeed of the pilot projects is to provide an opportunity to explore all the implications of neo-natal hearing screening. During this process both Departments will contact and discuss issues with all the relevant bodies.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research his Department has conducted into the language and educational benefits of neo-natal hearing screening and effective follow-up support for deaf children from zero to two years. [130103]

Ms Hodge: At this time the Department has not conducted any research in this area.

Osteopathy

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the current cost to public funds of training an osteopath at the John Wernham College of Classical Osteopathy. [130014]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 11 July 2000]: The John Wernham College of Classical Osteopathy is not a publicly funded institution. The four year BSc. Honours degree course in Osteopathic Medicine, taught at the College under contract from a publicly funded institution, has been specifically designated by the Secretary of State for fees support and student loans purposes. The public fee rate of £1,025 in the 1999–2000 academic year applies to this course. Eligible students receive fees support subject to a means test and may apply for student loans.

Head Teacher Vacancies

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many vacancies there were for head teachers in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools between (i) June 1998 and June 1999 and (ii) June 1999 and June 2000. [130011]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 11 July 2000]: Information about the annual number of vacancies for head teachers is not collected centrally.

Temporarily filled vacant head teacher posts[1] in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England at January in the years 1998–2000[2]

Nursery and primary	2.5	2.2	2.1
Secondary	1.8	1.6	2.2

[1] Temporarily-filled full-time permanent appointments. A post is included in this table:

a. if there is no incumbent who is expected to return to the post;

b. whether or not filled on a temporary basis, i.e. either without a contract or on a contract of less than one year;

c. whether or not advertised;

d. if an appointment has been made but not yet taken up.

[2] Data are collected in January of each year.

[3] Excludes vacancies in grant maintained schools.

Head teachers have a key role in boosting standards in schools. We are establishing a National College for School Leadership to give a focus to school leadership development, and are designing a coherent package of training and development programmes for aspiring, new and serving head teachers.

Nursery Schools

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals he has to enable nursery schools whose numbers have increased above the full-time equivalent of 105 pupils after 20 January to receive an additional £3,000. [128797]

Ms Estelle Morris: There are no plans to pay additional School Standards Grant to schools to take account of increases in their number of pupils after 20 January 2000. This was the date of the annual Schools Census, and the allocation of available funds between schools was most effectively done by using data from that source.

City Academies

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will list the expressions of interest he has received regarding the promotion of city academy Pathfinder projects; [129786]

(2) how many schools have been identified as appropriate candidates for city academy Pathfinder projects. [129787]

Ms Estelle Morris: A number of potential sponsors have had discussions with local education authorities about the possible location of City Academies.

Circulars

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what circular documents are in preparation to send to (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in the next six months. [129785]

Jacqui Smith: Following the commitment made by the Secretary of State to cut by one third the number of documents and by a half the number of pages sent automatically to all schools in the next school year, this Department is reviewing all plans to send documents to schools from September 2000. When that review has been completed, I will write to the hon. Member with a list of planned documents and place copies in the House of Commons Library.

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what instructions he has issued (a) through Government offices and (b) otherwise to training and enterprise councils to confine funding for modern apprenticeships to (i) 16 and 17 year olds and (ii) 18 to 24 year olds. [130087]

Mr. Wicks: The Planning Guidance for TECs/CCTEs, which is part of their contract, says that for 2000–01 the Department expects increasing numbers of 16–17 year olds in Work Based Training (including both Foundation Modern Apprenticeships and Advanced Modern Apprenticeships) and similar levels of starts for 19+ trainees compared with the previous year but focused on Advanced Modern Apprenticeships.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list Part C GM crop trial plantings in Shrewsbury and Atcham; and if he will make a statement. [126883]

Mr. Meacher: There is no requirement to notify the Department of releases of a GM crop which has a Europe-wide Part C marketing consent for cultivation. However, the industry body SCIMAC has agreed to provide location details for the GM maize being grown in the Farm Scale Evaluations under a Part C consent. All Farm Scale Evaluations sites are listed at www.environment.detr.gov.uk/fse/location/index.htm. None are in Shrewsbury and Atcham.

The terms of the Government's agreement with SCIMAC precludes general cultivation of GM crops until after the end of the farm scale evaluations, however small scale plantings for trial purposes are permitted.

Regional Government

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what (a) is the current cost, (b) was the cost in each of the last five years and (c) is the projected cost of each of the Government Offices for the Regions. [127992]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The current running costs, and the running costs for the last five years for each of the Government Offices for the Regions, are set out in the table. The projected costs for the next financial year and beyond are the subject of negotiation between Departments, in the light of the recommendations of the PIU Report "Reaching Out".

The increase in running costs for the Government Offices Central Unit (GOCU) reflects the transfer of functions to the unit by parent Departments. The Central Unit also hold a number of budgets centrally on behalf of GOs.

[1] Allocations for 2000–01

Note:

The North West and Midlands Government Offices merged during 1998–99

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people (a) are and (b) were in each of the last five years employed by each of the Government Offices for the Regions. [127993]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The information is set out in the table:

	2000	1999	1998	1997	1996
North East	267	261	286	269	332
North West	402	401	383	428	445

South East	248	215	197	224	220
London	398	350	334	329	295

Prior to 1996, this information was not collated centrally and could not be provided without disproportionate cost.

The increase in the number of staff in the Government Office for London reflects the transfer of responsibility for transport policy in London from DETR to GO-L and GO-L's work on the establishment of the GLA as a whole. GO-L is already declining in number and expects staff numbers to decrease further.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what functions are carried out by each of the Government Offices for the Regions; and what functions have been transferred from them to Regional Development Agencies. [127994]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The Government Offices for the Regions operate within a Policy Framework and a set of objectives endorsed by their parent Departments. The Policy Framework covers five areas of cross-departmental activity comprising

Regeneration, Sustainable Development, Competitiveness, Social Inclusion and Partnership. The main departmental activities include:

> For DETR—Regeneration: land use planning in the regions; Housing in the regions; Countryside, integrated transport strategies, road scheme decisions; local transport priorities; statutory casework.
> For DTI—Promotion of national competitiveness policies; Regional; Selective Assistance; the Smart scheme; Business Links; Export Promotion; provision of regional economic intelligence, enterprise grant scheme.
> For DfEE—TEC and Careers Service contracting; National Learning Targets, European Social Fund and some education related activities.

The Single Regeneration Budget and administration of Inward Investment activity (with the exception of GO-East and GO-London, which retain some residual responsibilities for inward investment activity) transferred from the Government Offices to the Regional Development Agencies. The GOs have a major role in sponsorship of the RDAs.

The Government are currently reviewing the regional activities of all Whitehall Departments in the light of the PIU Report "Reaching Out", to ensure strengthened co-ordination of policy initiatives with a regional and local impact. All Departments whose responsibilities affect regional or local activities are committed to better co-ordination of key policies by involving Government Offices.

South-east Planning Area

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what area of land in the South-east planning area is designated for its (a) intrinsic environmental value of international importance, (b) intrinsic environmental value of national importance, (c) landscape value and (d) cultural value. [129073]

Mr. Raynsford: Within London and the South East, areas designated for their intrinsic environmental value of international importance amount to 92,235 hectares designated under the Ramsar Convention and 98,800 hectares designated Special Protection Areas and candidate Special Areas of Conservation. Areas designated as being of national importance, namely National Nature Reserves and Sites of Special Scientific Interest, amount to 13,780 hectares and 135,600 hectares respectively. Over 7,000 square kilometres are designated areas of landscape value, namely Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty and the New Forest Heritage Area. In addition there are five World Heritage Sites and over 3,270 Ancient Scheduled Monuments.

Motorcyclists (Penalty Notices)

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to investigate the issuing of incorrect road tax penalty notices to motorcyclists; and if he will make a statement. [128778]

Mr. Hill: A recently publicised case involving a motorcyclist, where enforcement action was commenced when the motorcycle was in fact licensed, has led DVLA to review its procedures to ensure that this does not happen again.

Before any action is taken by DVLA, the national vehicle register is checked to establish whether vehicles are unlicensed at the time of offence. This safeguard should avoid action being taken against motorists in the situation where a licence has been taken out, but the vehicle register has yet to be updated with the licensing details from the Post Office.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultation the Government and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority will conduct with (a) local rail users, (b) local rail user groups and (c) local and regional authorities in the award of (a) new and (b) extended rail franchises. [129389]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director is operating an inclusive consultation process for franchise replacement. The Instructions and Guidance issued to him require him to consult, as appropriate, the Scottish Executive, the National Assembly for Wales, the Greater London Authority, local authorities, Passenger Transport Executives, regional planning bodies, Regional Development Agencies and Rail Passenger Committees (formerly Rail Users Consultative Committees). He is also encouraging bidders for replacement franchises to consult with these authorities and passenger representatives about the proposals in their bids.

Homelessness

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he has issued to local authorities on (a) consulting registered social landlords regarding nominations, framing allocations policies and homelessness strategies and (b) preparing a corporate action plan to deal with homelessness and the prevention of homelessness; and if he will make a statement. [129258]

Mr. Raynsford: The Code of Guidance on Parts VII and VII of the Housing Act 1996 includes guidance on section 167 of the 1996 Act, which requires local housing authorities to consult registered social landlords with which they have nomination agreements when adopting or changing a housing allocation scheme. The Code also includes guidance on framing allocations policies. The Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice; A decent home for all", proposes giving more choice to applicants for social housing, and improving the safety net for homeless households, including a multi-agency approach to developing homelessness strategies. The Government propose to issue a revised Code of Guidance on Parts VII and VII of the Housing Act 1996 later this year, taking account of the developing agenda on social lettings and homelessness as set out in the Housing Green Paper and responses to the consultation on this.

Social Housing

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much discretion will be given to local authorities under the Housing Green Paper proposals to change the way in which allocations are made to social housing, to take account of housing problems in their own area; and if he will make a statement. [129257]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government consider that choice for those seeking social housing should be as wide as possible. However, the Housing Green Paper proposals recognise the wide variations in demand for housing in different parts of the country. Local authorities are responsible for local housing strategies and developing lettings policies which reflect local housing needs. We will wish to ensure that the framework for lettings schemes is flexible enough to deal with these local circumstances. We intend to consider responses to the Housing Green Paper and to consult with local government, Shelter and others before finalising our proposals.

Open-air Concerts

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the safety measures which apply to large open-air concerts, following the deaths at a recent concert in Denmark; and if he will make a statement. [129691]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has recently carried out a major review of guidance covering music events, including large open-air festivals. "The event safety guide: a guide to health, safety and welfare at music and similar events" was launched in October 1999. In addition, a revised version of HSE's guidance booklet "Managing Crowds Safely" is due to be published later this year. HSE will review the proposed guidance in the light of the deaths at the Roskilde Festival.

Right to Buy

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the recommendation of the Environment, Transport and the Regional Affairs Committee that the right to buy legislation should be amended so as not to apply to settlements with fewer than 5,000 properties. [129692]

Mr. Raynsford: We are considering the Committee's recommendations. Our Rural White Paper later this year will address the issue of affordable housing in rural areas.

Trans-European Network

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what ports in the UK are included in the Trans-European Network transport network; and what (a) EU and (b) UK funds have been used for improving facilities at those ports in each year since 1994. [129466]

Mr. Hill: At present, no individual ports are specifically included within the transport Trans-European Network (TEN). Rather, projects at inland ports and seaports may be eligible for European Union (EU) TEN funding if they correspond to the specifications or criteria set out in Section 4 and 5 of Annex II to the TEN guidelines (Decision No. 1692/96/EC of 23 July 1996).

To date, EU TEN funding to ports has only been offered in relation to studies. Since 1995, when the TEN programme was introduced, the UK ports which have been allocated funding, and the total funds offered, are as follows:

£ million

Year	Ports receiving funds	EU funding
1995	None	—
1996	None	—
1997	Portsmouth; Great Yarmouth; Boston; Port of London; Southampton; Felixstowe; Heysham	0.70
1998	Portsmouth; Sunderland; Tyne; Humber; Heysham; Southampton; Harwich	1.60
1999	Great Yarmouth	0.24

The Government have not provided any funding for improving facilities at UK ports during the period 1994 to 2000.

NATS

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the companies or organisations that have expressed interest in becoming the strategic partner in National Air Traffic Services Ltd.; and if he has received representations from them about forecast capital spending in NATS. [129763]

Mr. Mullin: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) on 14 June 2000, Official Report, column 640W.

Playing Fields

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the planning policy guidance is regarding development of playing field sites. [129795]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Planning Policy Guidance note 17: "Sport and Recreation" emphasises the special significance of playing fields and that they should normally be protected. The Town and Country Planning (Playing Fields) (England) Direction 1998 requires referral to the Secretary of State of planning applications for development of local authority-owned playing fields or those currently, or in the previous five years, in educational use, where Sport England has objected but the local planning authority is minded to grant permission. The Secretary of State then has the opportunity to call in the application for his own determination.

"High Hedges"

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish his findings on the responses to the consultation document, "High Hedges"; and if he will make a statement. [129817]

Mr. Mullin: There is nothing I can add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 613W.

Council Housing

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase the resources available to tackle the investment backlog in council housing; and if he will make a statement. [129822]

Mr. Mullin: The level of allocations for housing investment by local authorities for the next three years will be decided in the current spending review, the results of which are due to be announced later this month.

Rail Freight

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions at what weight on the highway piggybank trailer systems that have been proposed by the winner of the recent rail freight competition will run. [129995]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 10 July 2000]: The cement road tanker to be conveyed on the intermodal wagons will have a maximum weight of 40 tonnes to which the traction unit would be added when on the highway.

Leasehold and Commonhold

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to publish a draft bill on leasehold and commonhold. [130168]

Mr. Mullin: As was announced in the Gracious Speech given on 17 November 1999, Official Report, columns 4–7, we intend to publish a draft Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Bill for consultation during this session. The leasehold reform aspects of the draft Bill are the responsibility of my Department, and those on commonhold are the responsibility of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor. We now expect to publish the draft Bill for consultation during the summer.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many residential leaseholders there are in England and Wales. [130169]

Mr. Mullin: Estimates[1] from the Department's Survey of English Housing show that in 1998–99, there were 1,920,000 residential leaseholders in England. The Department has no information on the number of residential leaseholders in Wales.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129842]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 11 July 2000]: The Secretary of State has made the following appointments to non-departmental public bodies sponsored by the Department since 1 May 1997.

Appointments to UNDPBS since 1 May 1997

	Women
(a) Paid	163 (25.2 per cent.)
(b) Unpaid	204 (27.3 per cent.)

This Government are committed to increasing representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Department has drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women and ethnic minorities holding public appointments. The latest plans, together with the Governments overall plan, were published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos, Opening Up Public Appointments 2000–2003", a copy of which is deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

London Underground

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the bidders on the short list for the PPP for the London Underground; and if he will make a statement. [130189]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 11 July 2000]: On 5 July, London Underground announced that the shortlisted bidders for the two deep tube PPP contracts would be as follows:

JNP (Jubilee, Northern and Piccaddilly lines): Tube Lines Group and Tuberail.

BCV (Bakerloo, Central, Victoria and Waterloo and City lines): LINC and Metronet.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the line closures on the London Underground that are planned between July and December, indicating the (a) purpose and (b) duration of each line closure. [130192]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 11 July 2000]: This is an operational matter for London Underground. I understand they are only planning one major closure during this period. This will be the Victoria Line between Victoria and Brixton between 5 and 26 August. This is for trackworks.

In addition, London Underground plan to carry out normal maintenance and improvement works involving some weekend closures, as shown in the table.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what dates the final contracts will be signed for each part of the London Underground network; and what are the significant dates in the PPP process in the run-up to those dates. [130190]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 11 July 2000]: The Government have consistently made it clear that it will not give specific dates for completion as these would undermine the public sector's position in negotiations. The next steps towards the public private partnership are as follows:

bids are due for the sub-surface lines contract by 15 September; and shortlisted bidders for the two deep tube contracts are required to submit final offers in the autumn.

Neighbourhood Renewal

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning good-quality housing in the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal; and if he will make a statement. [130244]

Ms Armstrong: The Social Exclusion Unit has just completed an extensive 12 week consultation on the framework document on the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal. The consultation included over 70 events around the country and to date over 600 written responses have been received. Housing quality was raised at a number of the events. The written response is currently being analysed and it is too early to assess how many concern good quality housing. The results from the consultation will be reflected in the final strategy document to be issued later this year.

Social Exclusion (Islington)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the coordination of Government policies on social exclusion in respect of Islington's voluntary sector. [128648]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The local voluntary sector has an important role to play in combating social exclusion. Local authorities, including Islington borough council, provide substantial funding to that sector. The extent of that funding is a matter for individual councils bearing in mind their statutory responsibilities, their priorities and the wishes of their electorate.

Rural White Paper

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the account that will be taken in the Government's proposed Rural White Paper of the effect on the rural economy of hunting, shooting and fishing. [128657]

Mr. Mullin: The Government recognise that country sports, such as fishing, shooting and hunting, contribute significantly to the economy in some rural areas. We are taking account of this during the preparation of the forthcoming Rural White Paper.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Rural White Paper will be published. [128655]

Mr. Mullin: The Rural White Paper is being prepared in tandem with a White Paper on urban policy and we intend that both White Papers will be published when the House returns in the autumn.

Mortgages

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the proportion of mortgages held on (a) fixed rate, (b) variable rate and (c) other terms in each of the last 20 years; and if he will make a statement. [130257]

Mr. Mullin: The Department does not collect information on the totality of outstanding mortgages. It does, however, collect information on the numbers of "new advances" that are fixed rate, discounted variable rate and other variable rate. Figures were first collected in 1993 and the figures for 1993 and 1999 are as follows.

	Percentage of new mortgages by number			Percentage of new mortgages by value
	Fixed	Discounted variable	Other variable	Fixed	Discounted variable	Other variable
1993	57.3	20.6	22.1	60.4	19.6	20.0
1999	40.2	39.4	20.4	43.1	37.4	19.5

DETR 5% Survey of Mortgage Lenders

Equivalent information on outstanding mortgages has been collected using ad hoc surveys of mortgage lenders carried out by the Council of Mortgage Lenders (CML) in 1994, 1997 and 1999. Their findings were published in Housing Finance No. 24 (1994); News & Views No. 22 (1997) and Housing Finance No. 44 (1999).

Drinking Water Inspectorate

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the tenth annual report of the Drinking Water Inspectorate will be published. [130471]

Mr. Meacher: The Drinking Water Inspectorate has published its tenth Annual Report today.

The main features for 1999 were:

a further improvement in drinking water quality

a further increase in the number of discoloured water incidents but signs of the beginning of an improvement programmes in place as part of Periodic Review to meet required quality improvements implementation of Cryptosporidium Regulations.

The Inspectorate has also published two leaflets for consumers. "How Good is the Drinking Water", will summarise the main points of the Report. "DWI Report on (Each) Water Company" gives brief details of the quality of drinking water supplied by individual water companies.

Copies of the Report and leaflets have been placed in the Library of the House.

DEFENCE

Sierra Leone

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the work of the Short Term Training Team in Sierra Leone. [130626]

Mr. Hoon: The work of the Short Term Training Team is progressing well, with the recruits due to complete their infantry training before the end of July. In the light of the success of this training, and in order to provide further support for the Government of Sierra Leone, I have approved a second six-week course, which will run to early September. The training team for this course will be largely drawn from one Royal Irish, whose equipment will be transported by the RFA Sir Galahad, which will then return to the UK. The existing RFA, Sir Percivale, will remain in support. In addition, the Government will be providing some items of personal equipment needed by the trainees, including boots and ponchos, from surplus MOD stocks, as well as an additional 5 million rounds of 7.62 mm link ammunition to help to meet urgent operational needs. As with the previous batch of ammunition announced on 29 June, this will be delivered to Sierra Leone subject to the Government of Sierra Leone securing formal agreement from the ECOWAS Secretariat that this ammunition can be imported as an exception to their Small Arms Moratorium. In accordance with UNSCR 1171 (1998), this shipment will be notified to the UN Sanctions Committee. Its provision will also be subject to confirmation that it will be used only by regular SLA soldiers, in accordance with international humanitarian law and human rights standards, and not by child soldiers.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129848]

Dr. Moonie: The following figures apply to appointments and reappointments made to Ministry of Defence non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) since 1 May 1997:

(a) paid: five women; 19 per cent. of all appointments

(b) unpaid: nine women; 17 per cent. of all appointments.

These figures include appointments not made by the Secretary of State for Defence, such as appointments to the Armed Forces Pay Review Body, which are made by the Prime Minister. They exclude appointments made to bodies which have been declassified as NDPBs since 1 May 1997, such as the subcommittees of the Defence Scientific Advisory Council.

Within the overriding principle of selection based on merit, MOD is committed to increasing diversity in appointments to its NDPBs and raising the representation of women, people from ethnic minority groups and disabled people in line with government-wide objectives.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122608]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The Ministry of Defence has approximately 340 key buildings and sites. Of these, stand-alone travel plans for 19 key sites have been submitted. The sites are:

Royal Marines, Poole
Victory Building, HM Naval Base, Portsmouth
MOD (Navy) Headquarters, Ensleigh, Bath
MOD (Navy) Headquarters, Foxhill, Bath
Defence Helicopter Support Authority, Yeovilton
Hydrographic Office, Taunton
Defence Logistics Organisation, Andover
Headquarters 2 Division (Army), Craigiehall, Edinburgh
Headquarters Salisbury Garrison, Wilton, Wiltshire
Headquarters 4 Division (Army), Aldershot
Headquarters 5 Division (Army), Shrewsbury
Headquarters Adjutant General, Upavon, Wiltshire
Royal Air Force Stafford
Royal Air Force Halton
Royal Air Force Brampton/Wyton
Royal Air Force Cranwell
Royal Air Force Lossiemouth
Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, Farnborough/Pyestock
Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, Malvern.

Travel Plans for the remainder of my Department's key buildings and sites were not submitted by March 2000. Plans for these sites will be produced as part of measures for promoting green transport initiatives within our corporate Environmental Management System (EMS), and where significant environmental impacts arising from transport activities are identified by site-based EMSs.

However, it must be borne in mind that many of our sites are in locations that are relatively isolated and MOD Main Building is not just an administration Centre but also a 24 hour operational Headquarters.

The framework for the corporate EMS was approved in April 2000 and an implementation programme is being developed during the current Financial Year. Formal implementation of the EMS will commence in April 2001.

Friend/Foe System

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce a decision on strategic identification of friend/foe system procurement; what response he will make to submissions made on behalf of Raytheon and their subcontractors; and if he will make a statement. [128931]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 4 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces gave the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) on 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 128W.

In accordance with departmental policy, the competing suppliers will be debriefed on the outcome of the competition.

RMPA Programme

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 7 March 2000, Official Report, column 642W, on the RMPA Programme, what the procurement strategy for the Active Search Sonobuoy System (Service Requirement 903) is; and if he will make a statement. [129463]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Paul Keetch, dated 12 July 2000:

I am replying to your question (No 129463) to the Secretary of State for Defence about the procurement strategy for the Active Search Sonobuoy System (ASSS) to meet SR(SA)903. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

Under BAE SYSTEMS, as prime contractor for the Nimrod MRA4 programme, two consortia are currently conducting a risk reduction programme for ASSS and are in competition for the next phase of the programme, to develop and integrate the system into the Nimrod MRA4. Thomson Marconi Sonar Ltd (TMSL) lead one of the consortia and Ultra Electronics Limited (UEL) lead the other. Once the competition has been decided the main Nimrod MRA4 contract will be amended to incorporate this development and integration activity to enable ASSS to be introduced by March 2005 concurrent with the introduction into service of Nimrod MRA4. We have already secured a commitment to, and maximum price for this work from BAE SYSTEMS.

Nimrod

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there has been any delay in the Nimrod upgrade programme. [128704]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Quentin Davies, dated 12 July 2000:

I am replying to your question (No 128704) to the Secretary of State for Defence about the Nimrod MRA4. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

You asked whether there had been any delay in the Nimrod upgrade programme. Following EAC approval for Development and Manufacture in July 1996, the Nimrod MRA4 contract was let with BAE SYSTEMS in December 1996 with an In-Service Date (ISD) of April 2003. Following technical and resource problems, BAE SYSTEMS advised the DPA in late 1998 that they could not meet this date. In May 1999, following extensive negotiations, the contract was re-baselined with an ISD of March 2005, a delay of 23 months, with the MOD securing various benefits in compensation.

In the MPR 99 report, published on 6th July, the delay in the Nimrod MRA4 ISD is shown as 51 months. This derives from the method the NAO have used in the past to account for ISD slippage. As well as the 23 months described above, it includes an earlier cumulative delay of 28 months judged against the earliest estimate of when a Nimrod MR2 replacement aircraft was needed, but ahead of any meaningful Industry input. In future MPRs, ISD slippage will be measured against the most recent approval, which in the case of Nimrod MRA4 would be the Main Gate equivalent in July 1996. This will show the slippage to be the 23 months described above.

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the contract at BAE in Brough to build Nimrods. [129945]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Ms Shona McIsaac, dated 12 July 2000:

I am replying to your question (No 129945) to the Secretary of State for Defence about the contract at BAE in Brough to build Nimrods. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The contract for the conversion of current standard Nimrods to the new Nimrod MRA4 standard was placed with BAE SYSTEMS, Warton, who act as the prime contractor. A significant proportion of the activity on this programme has been placed by BAE SYSTEMS' sites, including Brough. The facility in Brough is principally involved in the design and manufacture of various aircraft components and installation tooling to support the aircraft build programme which will be undertaken at the BAE SYSTEMS' facility at Woodford.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129490]

Dr. Moonie: The Pay and Personnel Agency (PPA) is the payroll provider for the Ministry of Defence.

It is not the current practice of the PPA to write annually to staff paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions.

We apply a number of checks to identify and act upon any changes of circumstances which affect the continuing payment of reduced rate National Insurance contributions. These systems were audited in March 1998 by Inland Revenue and DSS and they included a 100 per cent. check of all staff then paying reduced rates of contributions. No problems were identified with the systems in operation.

BRNC Dartmouth

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sea-based training takes place at BRNC Dartmouth. [129803]

Mr. Spellar: All Naval Cadets joining BRNC undertake an extensive package of training in the 67 boats owned by the College. This training is carried out on the River Dart and surrounding sea area with some sailing and motor vessels ranging as far as France and the Channel Islands. The aim of this training is to familiarise the cadets with the maritime environment, and all cadets are required to prove their competence in a variety of craft.

In the second term of the cadets' training a six week period is spent undertaking Initial Sea Training (IST) in an operational warship. The ship continues with her normal programme so, for example, cadets were onboard HMS Chatam while she was engaged on Operation Palliser (Sierra Leone). The aim of this period is to provide naval cadets with an experience of life as a junior rating, thus gaining an insight into the working conditions and lifestyle of the men and women they aspire to lead.

Alliance Ground Surveillance

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in the past year on the NATO Alliance Ground Surveillance programme. [129804]

Mr. Hoon: NATO Allies remain committed to the definition of a NATO-owned and operated core capability of an Alliance Ground Surveillance (AGS) programme. This task is currently being addressed within the Alliance, with the intention of placing into service a NATO-owned and operated core capability in about 10 years' time.

Type 45 Destroyers

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with the Royal Navy's Type 45 destroyer programme. [130419]

Mr. Hoon: The Government have now approved the procurement of Type 45 destroyers, in line with our firm commitment to a modern and effective destroyer and frigate force. Subject to the satisfactory completion of negotiations, a contract will be placed later this year with the prime contractor, BAe Systems, for the first three of these ships, and including some major long-lead equipment for a further three, at an estimated cost in excess of £1 billion. It is planned that the first and third ships will be assembled by BAe Systems Marine, and the second ship by Vosper Thornycroft. The first of class is expected to be launched from the BAe Systems Marine Scotstoun yard on the Clyde.

The class is to be named the 'D' Class and Her Majesty the Queen has graciously agreed to the first of class being named HMS Daring and the second HMS Dauntless. This revives two names that have served the Royal Navy well since the early 1800s.

The ships will be equipped with the PAAMS Anti Air Missile System, a collaborative programme with France and Italy, and will provide highly effective area defence against aircraft and missiles. In addition, the Type 45 Destroyer will be a multi-role, general purpose platform capable of operations across the spectrum of tasks from peace support to high intensity warfare.

The first of class will enter service in 2007. I expect an order for the second batch of ships will be placed around 2004.

Construction of these new ships will sustain up to 3,000 jobs directly in the shipyards over the next 10 years and will sustain or create almost as many elsewhere in the defence industry.

Sonar 2087

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to acquire sonar 2087 for the Royal Navy; and when the system will be in service. [129232]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 July 2000]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Quentin Davies, dated 12 July 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the plans to acquire Sonar 2087 for the Royal Navy and when it will be in service. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

Two companies, Thomson Marconi Sonar Ltd and Babcock Defence Systems Ltd, are currently competing for the Demonstration, Manufacture and Support contract for Sonar 2087. We expect to place a contract in Spring 2001. Subject to negotiations with the successful contractor, we plan to bring the equipment into service at the end of 2005.

Defence Procurement Agency

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Defence Procurement Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [125248]

Dr. Moonie [pursuant to his reply, 7 June 2000, c. 237W]: I must apologise that my answer contained an erroneous figure for Key Target 2. The figure for average cumulative slippage of in-service dates at 31 March 2001 should have read 23.8 months, rather than the 20.9 months shown in the Official Report.

HEALTH

Parkside Community Health Trust

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district nurses working for Parkside Community Health Trust who carry a clinical case load have been given discretionary award points under the recommendations of the pay review body in 1998. [125948]

Mr. Denham: In line with national guidance from National Health Service Executive, Parkside Health NHS Trust has developed guidelines for awarding discretionary points to its nursing and therapy staff. This was done in consultation with staff groups and their representatives. The trust has considered a total of 59 applications, of which 30 were successful. Of these, six applications came from district nurses, and two were given discretionary award points.

Hospitals (South-west Surrey)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people live within two miles of (a) Farnham, (b) Milford and (c) Haslemere hospitals. [128502]

Mr. Denham: The Office for National Statistics (ONS) centrally produce resident population data for health authorities and local authority districts.

However, they do not produce population data below these levels, which includes population by trusts. Currently, the only population data available below health authority and local authority districts are ward level data, which are based on the 1991 Census.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the commitments given by the West Surrey Health Authority Chief Executive and the Chief Executive of the Surrey Hampshire Borders Trust concerning the future of community beds at Farnham Hospital in the "Right Balance" plans published in May 1998. [128495]

Mr. Denham: It is for local health authorities to decide on the configuration of services that best suit their local health economy's needs, based on the specialised knowledge they have of the local community.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS (a) state and (b) community in-patient hospital beds were available in (i) the South West Surrey constituency and (ii) the West Surrey health authority in May (1) 1997, (2) 1998, (3) 1999 and (4) 2000. [128504]

Mr. Denham: South West Surrey constituency approximates to West Surrey health authority in terms of geographical coverage so figures are given only for West Surrey health authority.

Figures are calculated by annual number of bed days per year divided by days in year. State beds are all beds, whereas community beds are those in community trusts.

Bed availability data are collected on a year-end basis; thus there is currently no published data for 1999–2000.

Average daily number of available beds for NHS trusts located in West Surrey health authority

	All trusts	Community trusts
1996–97	2,635	356
1997–98	2,359	314
1998–99	2,477	819

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients had been waiting for in-patient treatment, excluding day cases, for more than one year on 31 March (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000 in West Surrey health authority. [128507]

Mr. Denham: The table provides the total number of patients waiting for ordinary admissions for more than one year, excluding day cases, in West Surrey health authority.

	Total number of patients
31 March 1997	426
31 March 1998	751
31 March 1999	675
31 March 2000	763

Thorotrast

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the number of cancers attributable since 1970 to the use of Thorotrast; [128327]

(2) what advice his Department has given to health authorities and trusts since 1970 on tracing patients exposed to Thorotrast; and if he will make a statement; [128326]

(3) what research his Department has commissioned since 1970 on the long-term effects of Thorotrast upon patients. [128328]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 5 July 2000]: We are not aware of any advice that this Department has given to health authorities and National Health Service trusts on tracing patients exposed to Thorotrast since 1970.

No estimate is available of the numbers of cancers attributable to Thorotrast since 1970.

The Department has not commissioned any research specifically on the long-term effects of Thorotrast since 1970

Thorotrast was first used in 1928 and discontinued in 1955. It has not been used in the United Kingdom and the NHS since 1955.

It is not known how many patients were exposed to Thorotrast between 1928 and its discontinuation in 1955 and no estimate of the number of cancers attributable to the use of Thorotrast is available. We are not aware of any formal programme for tracing patients exposed to Thorotrast. It is not known how many people alive today may have been exposed to Thorotrast four to seven decades ago.

Bone Marrow Donors

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many bone marrow donors have been recruited by the National Blood Service in the last year. [129266]

Mr. Denham: In 1999–2000 6,000 new bone marrow donors were recruited by the National Blood Service and entered onto the British Bone Marrow Registry. The target for 2000–01 is 10,000.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many samples are analysed each week for the purposes of registration as a bone marrow donor by (a) the National Blood Service and (b) voluntary organisations. [129267]

Mr. Denham: The National Blood Service currently types around 120 samples each week. This will rise to 250 each week by the end of 2000–01. We understand that the Anthony Nolan Bone Marrow Trust aims to recruit around 300 new donors a week.

Beta Interferon

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost of beta interferon in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) other EU member states and (c) the United States; and if he will make a statement on the factors underlying the cost in each country. [129244]

Ms Stuart: The annual cost per patient of the beta-interferons in the United Kingdom is £9,320 (Betaferon), £9,490 (Avonex), £9,090 (lower dose of Rebif) and £12,070 (higher dose of Rebif).

The Department has made no studies of the cost of treatment in different countries. As far as the prices of the beta interferon medicines are concerned, the Department has information both from the manufacturers and from contacts in the health authorities of other countries. Direct comparisons of prices of products of this type are misleading because they are often supplied direct to hospitals, making list prices less significant. Furthermore, some countries include distribution costs and some aspects of care within the list price while others account for them separately.

Subject to these qualifications, it can be said that in general the annual cost of beta interferons in the UK is slightly greater than in other EU countries, reflecting currency movements since the products were introduced.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the guidance issued to health authorities on the use of beta interferons in multiple sclerosis pending further guidance from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. [130246]

Mr. Denham: Until guidance is available from the National Institute of Clinical Excellence, the guidance issued by the Department in 1995, Executive Letter (95) 97, continues to apply.

Fritchie Report

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he will publish a response to the recommendations of the Fritchie report. [129395]

(2) when he will meet Dame Rennie Fritchie to discuss her report on NHS appointments. [129396]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 6 July 2000]: I set out the Department's response to the recommendations made by the Commissioner for Public Appointments, Dame Rennie Fritchie, in a letter to her dated 7th July 2000. It confirms our concern to ensure that appointments to National Health Service boards are made in a way which is seen to be both open and fair. Copies of the letter are available in the Library.

GPs (Lancashire)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that GPs who retire in the period up to 2005 in (a) East Lancashire and (b) Pendle are replaced. [129612]

Mr. Denham: East Lancashire health authority is taking a number of initiatives in response to a study by Lancaster University relating to workforce planning for general medical and other primary care staff. The 1998 study projected data to 2003–04; these data will be reviewed in the near future and extended for a further period. Measures include:

> Promoting Personal Medical Services (PMS) pilots where appropriate. There has been a very encouraging response in applications for the third wave of PMS;
> Working locally through Primary Care Groups (PCGs) and with the Post Graduate Medical Centre at Manchester University to expand the number of training practices and the number of trainees in East Lancashire. Three locally trained general practitioners joined the East Lancashire list last year;
> The development of a recruitment package aimed at the National Health Service in East Lancashire, but with a focus on General Practice;
> Ensuring that retiring GPs give as much notice as possible (three months is the minimum) and to plan a phased approach to retirement where possible;
> PCGs are encouraging practices to review their skill mix and examine alternative options for patient care e.g. greater use of nurse practitioners.

The health authority, together with Pendle PCG, is actively addressing the issue of GP retirement and subsequent recruitment. It is using all the above approaches, however, the deployment of one or more PMS pilots is regarded as a particularly appropriate solution for the area.

Primary Care Groups and Trusts

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many primary care groups have been established in England and Wales; how many of these groups have been changed to primary care trusts; and what the estimated administrative cost is of establishing these organisations; [129475]

(2) if he will make a statement on the procedures for transferring responsibility from community care trusts to primary care trusts in respect of the services to be provided by the trusts and in particular about the arrangements for transferring responsibilities to the Southend Primary Care Trust. [129476]

Mr. Denham: 481 primary care groups became operational on 1 April 1999. Nineteen of these were approved for primary care trust status and began operating as 17 primary care trusts on 1 April 2000. Two primary care trusts merged. There are now 459 primary care groups and 17 primary care trusts in England covering a population of over 49 million.

Information regarding local health groups in Wales can be obtained by contacting the Welsh Assembly.

Primary care groups perform functions formerly discharged by their parent health authorities. They are funded to do so by the health authority from within existing resources in their unified budget allocations. Central support was provided to health authorities in 1998–99 to help them to establish primary care groups. This funding was released by the ending of the general practitioner fundholding scheme.

In 1999–2000, health authorities receive £25,000 towards the cost of developing each primary care trust proposal which goes to consultation. Each primary care trust that is approved receives central funding towards its preparatory and development costs—£100,00 for a Level 3 primary care trust and £175,000 for Level 4 primary care trust.

Every health authority is required to conduct a local consultation on each prospective primary care trust. The consultation typically lasts between six weeks and three months. A report is presented to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State which includes details on the proposal itself, the health authority's view on the proposed primary care trust and its state of readiness, the proposed establishment and operational dates and a summary of the consultation results which identifies the community services, currently provided by the local community National Health Service trust, to be provided by the prospective primary care trust. These services reflect the views of the local community and other stakeholders.

Information on the consultation process is contained in Health Service Circular 1999/207 "Primary Care Trusts: Consultation on Proposals to Establish a Primary Care Trust". Copies have been placed in the Library.

Southend Primary Care Group became a Level 3 primary care trust from 1 April 2000 and will be consulting on moving to Level 4 from April 2001. The remaining six primary care groups within South Essex Health Authority are aiming to move to trust status in April 2001. This may then result in five Level 4 primary care trusts in South Essex. External consultants are currently facilitating a local review of how clinical and support services provision may change. Local priorities, including services to be managed by each primary care trust, will be included in the consultation documentation. The consultation is likely to run from 1 August to 31 October. No transfer of community services will be made until primary care trust Level 4 status is achieved following successful consultation with wide stakeholder support.

Edgware Community Hospital

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what services are now available at Edgware Community Hospital; how many people used each of those services in the last year; and if he will make a statement. [129948]

Mr. Denham: Services currently available at Edgware Community Hospital are:

Adolescent psychiatry
Cardiology testing
Children's services
Consultant-led outpatients services
Day surgery
Dietetics
Birth Centre
Intermediate care beds
Mental health services for adults, including in-patient facilities
Occupational therapy
Pathology and blood tests
Pharmacy
Physiotherapy
Specialist services (e.g. rehabilitation following brain injury)
Speech and language therapy
Urgent Treatment Centre for Minor Injuries
X-ray and ultrasound.

A primary care walk-in centre will open at the end of August 2000.

During 1999–2000 there were 30,000 attendances at the urgent treatment centre, 80,000 outpatient attendances across a range of specialties, 3,200 attendances for day surgery and 28,940 diagnostic tests. 228 births took place at the Edgware Birth Centre and there were 219 admissions to the general practitioner admission unit.

Jean Brett

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review the case of Jean Brett, following the report by Conciliation Connections, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement. [130029]

Ms Stuart: The Conciliation Connections report recommendations were considered and accepted by Mount Vernon and Watford National Health Service Trust (now part of West Hertfordshire Hospitals NHS Trust) at a public trust board meeting. As recommended in the report the trust has apologised, carried out an audit into the work of the consultant's department to ensure that no unnecessary operations were being performed and made an offer of compensation.

Recently the Chief Medical Officer requested the Eastern Regional Office to review the file notes; the conclusion was that no further action be taken.

Ritalin

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prescriptions for Ritalin were issued in each year since 1991; and at what cost. [129959]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is shown in the table.

Number of prescription items and net ingredient cost of Methylphenidate Hydrochloride (Ritalin) dispensed in the community, 1991 to 1999

England	Prescription items (thousand)	Net ingredient cost (£000)
1991	2.0	11.7
1992	2.6	16.5
1993	3.5	25.7
1994	6.0	52.3
1995	14.7	253.0
1996	47.9	811.7
1997	92.1	1,636.5
1998	126.6	2,402.8
1999	158.0	3,100.3

Notes:

1. The data cover all prescriptions dispensed in the community, ie by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England.
2. The data do not cover drugs dispensed in hospital or private prescriptions.
3. The net ingredient costs is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.

Capital Charges

Mr. Alan Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the capital charges regime for new NHS buildings. [130097]

Mr. Denham: There are currently no plans to review the capital charges regime in the National Health Service.

The NHS, in common with the Department and other Government Departments, is required to meet a cost of capital charge. This is currently set by Her Majesty's Treasury at 6 per cent. of the net value of relevant assets employed. New buildings are included in the calculation of net assets, and depreciation (the other component of capital charges) continues to be charged on all operational NHS buildings.

The Valuation Office Agency is carrying out a review of the technique for calculating the value of specialist NHS buildings. Any consequent change in valuation techniques could be expected to impact on the absolute level of capital charges (through adjustments to new and existing building valuations), but not in the operation of the capital charges regime.

Osteopathy

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of osteopaths required in the NHS over the next 10 years. [130012]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 11 July 2000]: The Department does not make central estimates of the number of osteopaths required in the National Health Service. However, health authorities, NHS trusts and primary care groups may employ or contract with osteopaths if they consider it appropriate to do so.

Nurse Consultants (Newcastle)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he received the business case for an additional nurse consultant in intermediate care from a Newcastle consortium of primary care, acute care, health authority and the city council; and when he will make a decision. [129137]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 11 July 2000]: On 16 June 2000 we announced the second wave of nurse consultant posts. A nurse consultant in intermediate care at the Northumbria Healthcare National Health Service Trust was 1 of the 91 posts that we approved. Details of the new posts are set out in "Making a Difference: Strengthening the nursing, midwifery and health visiting contribution to health and health care", copies of which are available in the Library.

Cataract Operations

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made in the improvement of biometry equipment and techniques to enhance the accuracy of cataract operations. [130121]

Mr. Denham: There has been an encouraging improvement in the efficiency of cataract operations as a result of the introduction of the phacoemulsification technique whereby ultrasound is used to break up the opacified lens so that it can be removed through a thin cannula. We have allocated £20 million over two years to the modernisation of the equipment and facilities used in cataract operations.

Glenthorne Youth Treatment Centre

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if a decision has been taken on when Glenthorne Youth Treatment Centre, Erdington, will close; and if he will make a statement. [130429]

Mr. Hutton: In my reply to my hon. Friend on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 329–30W, I announced that, while I had concluded that it was no longer appropriate for the Department to run such a child care facility as Glenthorne Youth Treatment Centre, no decision would be taken on when the centre would finally close until suitable alternative placements had been found for the 12 children accommodated in the centre at that time.

The Department and the management of the centre have worked closely with the local authorities and the Prison Service to identify the most appropriate alternative places. Suitable arrangements have now been made for all 12 children. The last child has now left the centre.

I therefore propose to close the centre on 13 July 2000.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Orders in Council

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the President of the Council what arrangements are in hand to improve the accessibility of Orders in Council to hon. Members; and if she will make a statement. [130394]

Mrs. Beckett: Arrangements have been made for copies of Orders in Council approved since the beginning of the year 2000 to be made available to hon. Members in the House Library.

Copies of the Orders approved at the Privy Council meetings in February, March, April and May 2000 have already been sent to the Library. Copies of the Orders approved in June 2000 will be available later this month. Thereafter, copies of the Orders approved at monthly Privy Councils will be available during the succeeding month.

Copies of individual Orders will also continue to be available on request from the Privy Council Office.

Government Bills

Mr. Brady: To ask the President of the Council how many amendments to Government bills tabled during the present Parliament by (a) Opposition spokesmen, (b) Opposition backbench hon. Members and (c) Government backbench hon. Members which had been selected were not debated on the floor of the House as a result of timetabling of the report Stage of Bills. [127857]

Mrs. Beckett [pursuant to her reply, 6 July 2000, c. 292W]: The information contained in the table for the Financial Services and Markets Bill: Further consideration, 9 February 2000 should have read:

Session 1999–2000[1]

	Financial Services and Markets Bill: Further consideration, 9 February 2000
Amendments tabled by Opposition spokesmen but not debated	0
Amendments tabled by Opposition backbenchers but not debated	1
Amendments tabled by Government backbenchers but not debated	0

[1] Up to 30 June 2000

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 12 July. [129788]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Beef on the Bone

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Solicitor-General what the cost was of the prosecution of Christopher Bowman for selling beef on the bone. [126790]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 19 June 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

This prosecution was taken by North Yorkshire county council as the enforcement body under the Beef Bones Regulations 1997. The information requested is not available centrally.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Qinghai Project

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the independent Inspection Panel's findings that the World bank was not in compliance with its policies on environmental assessment in respect of the Qinghai Project. [128732]

Mr. Foulkes: We agreed with the World bank management's proposal to carry out further environmental studies following the findings of the Inspection Panel.

Following board discussions on 6 and 7 July, the Chinese Government withdrew its application for funding for the Qinghai component of the project. It now plans to fund those activities itself. There will now be no international involvement in ensuring environmental—and social—standards are adequately met.

Street Children

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development in which countries her Department is working on the issue of street children. [130106]

Mr. Foulkes: My Department supports work which benefits the lives of street children in many countries, including programmes in Brazil, Ecuador, Kenya, South Africa, Russia, Bangladesh, India, Tanzania, Zambia and Uzbekistan. In addition to these initiatives, street children in many countries also benefit from our support provided both bilaterally and multilaterally through the United Nations Children's Fund, the ILO's International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour, and Save the Children Fund Programmes.

Primary Education

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which countries her Department is assisting in the development of primary education for children. [130107]

Mr. Foulkes: Our bilateral support is focused primarily on the poorest countries of sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia. Over the past two years, DFID has committed over £200 million to support the development of universal primary education programmes in sub-Saharan Africa. I have just approved DFID support totalling £61 million over seven years for the Malawi Education Sector programme, which will provide increased access for all Malawian children to primary education of improved quality.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which she has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129845]

Clare Short: The information requested is as follows:

(a) five—of which two (40 per cent.) were women.

(b) 64—of which 25 (39 per cent.) were women.

SCOTLAND

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129852]

Dr. Reid: The Government are committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Government have drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women and ethnic minorities holding public appointments, to which my Department subscribes. The action plan was published on 24 May.

During the period 1 April 1997 to 30 June 1999, 205 women were appointed to non-departmental public bodies in Scotland out of a total of 587 appointments. Women appointees represented 35 per cent. of the total appointments made in this period. 162 women were appointed to paid posts, representing 37 per cent. of all the paid appointments made in that period. Forty-three women were appointed to unpaid posts, representing 28 per cent. of all the unpaid appointments made in the same period.

With effect from 1 July 1999, responsibility for most appointments to non-departmental public bodies operating in Scotland passed to the Scottish Executive.

I have made one appointment to a non-departmental public body during the period to end 1999: the appointee was a woman.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130043]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 11 July 2000]: In 1998–99, the Scottish Office, including its executive agencies and associated Departments, paid 97.8 per cent. of valid invoices for goods, services and works within either 30 days or the agreed payment terms. The corresponding figure for the first quarter of 1999–2000 was 97.6 per cent. The Scotland Office was established on 1 July 1999.

From that date until 31 March 2000, the Department paid 98.4 per cent. of valid invoices within either 30 days or the agreed payment terms.

Information on the timing of payment in relation to the receipt of goods and services rather than receipt of invoices is not held centrally. Information on other agreed payment terms, which are relatively uncommon, is not held centrally. Payment of invoices from 1 July 1999 by the Scottish Executive is a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129480]

Dr. Reid: The former Scottish Office observed guidance issued by the Inland Revenue that periodic reminders should be issued. A reminder was issued to relevant staff in 1997 and a further reminder will be issued shortly to staff in my Department. The frequency with which reminders are issued is being reviewed.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

GM Seed

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what meetings prior to 17 April (a) he and (b) other Ministers have held on the subject of GM free seed purity. [124166]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Prior to 17 April, MAFF Ministers held various meetings about GMOs at some of which the issue of GM free seed purity in relation to agricultural production was discussed.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice the Government have received from the Advisory Committee on Releases into the Environment on the possibility of contamination of seed imports with GM varieties. [126860]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 19 June 2000]: None. This particular issue is not within ACRE's remit.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which organisations the Government informed about the contamination of Advanta rapeseed with GM varieties before 17 May; and on what dates. [126856]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 19 June 2000]: The Secretary of the Seed Crushers and Oils Processors Association was informed by my officials on 16 May that the Government would be making an announcement on this matter.

Aquatic Environment (Sussex)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent measurements he has made of the aquatic environment off the Sussex coast to identify the possible presence of radioactive material emanating from Cap la Hague. [124231]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 5 June 2000]: My Department, until recently, carried out regular monitoring and assessment of the radioactive contamination of marine foodstuffs and environmental indicator materials within the English Channel. This work transferred to the Food Standards Agency on 1 April this year.

The results of this work were published in my Department's report "Radioactivity in Food and the Environment", the last of which was for 1998. The low levels of man-made radioactivity found in the English Channel cannot be attributed with any certainty to particular sources.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125159]

Mr. Morley: (a) The MAFF Smoking at Work policy has been in force since January 1994. Indications are that the policy has been successful. Support in the form of courses, videos and other material are available to staff who wish to stop smoking but, to date, no-one has taken advantage of this.

(b) The Department's policy covers all offices throughout the estate. Suitably equipped, ventilated, smoking rooms are provided at all major sites.

Organic Farming

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money the Government have allocated for research into (a) organic farming, (b) biotechnology and genetic modification and (c) agriculture in total in the next three years. [127791]

Mr. Morley: My Department funds a wide and varied programme of research worth over £100 million per annum to support and inform our policies. Current and projected funding levels for my Department's research in the areas specified are:

£ million

	2000–01	2001–02
Organic farming	2.1	2.1
Biotechnology[1]	ca.24	ca.24
Genetic modification[2]	ca.5	ca.5
Total agriculture	90.9	93.7

[1] Research which uses modern biotechnology as a tool. Costs exclude expenditure on genetic modification.

[2] Includes research on genetically modified food and non-food products and to underpin safety assessments of genetically modified organisms in the environment.

Note:

All figures are provisional

A large amount of MAFF's biotechnology research has no relevance to genetic engineering, but focuses instead on areas such as the development of new tools for pest and disease diagnosis, biological control techniques, and other means of pest and disease control in plants and animals.

Figures for research spending in 2002–03 and beyond are not yet available. These will be subject to Spending Review decisions, to be announced shortly, and on the outcome of the consultation on a new MAFF Research Strategy to cover the period 2001 to 2005, to be launched later this year.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the decrease in pesticide usage that would result from 30 per cent. of agricultural land becoming organic in the UK. [126310]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 June 2000]: It is not possible to calculate a meaningful figure. The use of pesticides varies markedly from crop to crop, and year to year, and the calculation would have to be based on assumptions about the use of the land that was to be converted. In addition, there are a number of pesticides available for use in organic agriculture but little information on the levels of their use. Some organic pesticides are permitted for use at higher rates than are the alternative conventional pesticides. On the other hand, some organic farmers seek to avoid the use even of these pesticides.

Rabbit Haemorrhagic Disease

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the measures being taken by the Government to combat the spread of rabbit haemorrhagic disease in the United Kingdom. [128310]

Mr. Nick Brown: Viral haemorrhagic disease of rabbits (RVHD) is endemic in wild and domestic rabbits in the UK. While the Government have no control measures against the spread of RVHD in the wild rabbit population, it remains an offence under the Specified Animal Pathogens Order 1998 to introduce live RVHD virus into rabbits deliberately, except under licence. The equivalent legislation in Northern Ireland is the Specified Animal Pathogens Order (Northern Ireland) 1999.

The most effective way of controlling the disease in domestic or farmed rabbits is by vaccination.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the research projects being (a) carried out and (b) sponsored by his Department into rabbit haemorrhagic disease, and state the nature of each project. [128309]

Mr. Nick Brown: There are currently no research projects on viral haemorrhagic disease of rabbits in the MAFF funded research programme. Work was done at the Veterinary Laboratories Agency between 1992 and 1996 and several scientific papers were published from this research.

I understand that research is being done in some EU member states where commercial rabbit breeding is on a larger scale than in the UK. The Institute of Virology at Oxford University is also engaged in current research, but this is not funded by MAFF.

Marine Research Vessels

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each of his Department's marine research vessels stating for each vessel (a) which port they operate out of, (b) the complement of crew, (c) the age, (d) the estimated years until decommissioning and (e) the research programme in the current year. [128306]

Mr. Nick Brown: MAFF has two Fisheries Research Vessels, operated by MAFF's Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science (CEFAS). The two vessels are the 72 metre long RV Cirolana and the 53 metre RV Corystes. Both vessels operate out of the port of Lowestoft.

The Cirolana has a current complement of 17 crew. It was commissioned in 1970, and has been in operation for 30 years. It is expected to be decommissioned in 2003. Its programme for calendar year 2000 is for eight voyages. Five will support the science and management of marine fisheries, and three will support the science and management of the marine environment.

The Corystes has a current complement of 16 crew. It was commissioned in 1988, and has been in operation for 12 years. It has a design life of 25 years. Its programme for calendar year 2000 is for 16 voyages. Eight will support the science and management of marine fisheries, and eight will support the science and management of the marine environment.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129493]

Mr. Morley: Staff in my Department are paid via Chessington Computer Services Ltd. (CCSL) who are notified about National Insurance (NI) contributions by the Contributions Agency. All staff are notified by Office Notice as and when changes occur to NI contributions. The most recent Office Notice outlining the position of married and divorced women with reserved rights to reduced rates of NI contribution was issued in November 1997. This Office Notice will be re-issued shortly and every year thereafter.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public; [129634]

(2) how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129616]

Mr. Morley: There is one MAFF Agency (Central Science Laboratory) with a touch tone telephone system installed.

MAFF has touch tone telephone systems installed at three sites.

South-west Regional Flood Defence Committee

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money was allocated to the South-west Regional Flood Defence Committee for capital projects from grants through his Department in each of the last three years. [130002]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 10 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 23 March 2000, Official Report, columns 640–41W, which explained how grant is allocated to the Environment Agency and provided figures for the South-west RFDC for 1996–97 to 1998–99. For 1999–2000, the original Grant Earning Ceiling for the South West RFDC was £2.2 million and the estimated outturn is £0.9 million.

In terms of actual grant payments, the sums paid in the last three years are as follows:

	£ million
1997–98	1.4
1998–99	1.3
1999–2000	0.1

The net amount of grant paid in 1999–2000 reflects (a) the relatively low level of the achieved capital programme and (b) the reclaim of grant paid in previous years on legal costs in the light of the settlement of a contractual dispute in the Agency's favour.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130039]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 11 July 2000]: MAFF's standard terms of business are payment within 30 days of receipt of a valid invoice or the provision of goods and services, whichever is the later. Where other payment terms are exceptionally agreed, they are used to measure performance. Performance is measured against all supplier invoices paid. For 1998–99, 93.3 per cent. of invoices were paid on time; in 1999–2000 89.5 per cent. of invoices were paid on time.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Post Office Network

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated cost of setting up a universal bank in sub-post offices. [129989]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 10 July 2000]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 252W.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Post Office was informed of the contents of (a) the Performance and Innovation Unit report on Modernising the Post Office network and (b) the proposals contained in his oral statement of 28 June 2000, Official Report, columns 907–20, on the Post Office network. [129985]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 10 July 2000]: By the nature of the Performance and Innovation Unit's study on modernising the post office network, the Post Office were closely involved in it throughout. However, they did not receive a copy of the report in final form or of my statement until after I stood up to make my statement to the House on 28 June.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what mechanisms are employed to ensure that the full value of rural sub post offices to the local community and economy are taken into account in developing co-ordinated Government policy. [128654]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In preparing its report on the post office network, the Performance and Innovation Unit has assessed in detail the economic and social role and value of rural sub post offices in the local community. Its findings are reflected in the recommendations made in its report for a range of measures to protect and sustain the rural network.

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Performance and Innovation Unit's work as it affects rural post offices. [128643]

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Performance and Innovation Unit's work as it affects rural post offices. [128653]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Performance and Innovation Unit's report on the post office network emphasises the important contribution made by post offices to their local communities and, in particular, the need to protect the rural network against avoidable closures by providing financial support for a period. The Performance and Innovation Unit's report contains 24 recommendations, of which six relate specifically to the network of rural post offices, 12 relate to the network as a whole and six relate specifically to urban post offices. The Government accept all of them.

E-commerce

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the first annual report on the state of e-commerce is to be published; and if he will make a statement. [130048]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 11 July 2000]: We will be publishing the first annual report in September, one year after the e-commerce@its.best.uk report was published. This will allow us to set out in more detail the Government's plans for taking forward the e-commerce and e-government agenda, in the light of the Spending Review White Paper which the Chancellor is publishing in the summer.

Arms Sales

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the armaments sales and transfer agreements involving Her Majesty's Government under the category of Government to Government in the last year for which figures are available, identifying separately those to which commission payments apply; what the accountability arrangements are for each agreement; and if he will make a statement. [129359]

Mr. Hoon: I have been asked to reply.

The UK's main Government to Government supply agreements were described in Part III of the 1998 Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House. Table 8 of the report provided details of major equipment transferred between 1 January and 31 December 1998 by the Ministry's Disposal Sales Agency under this type of agreement. However, after publication, the Table was found to contain inaccuracies. It included details of two Jetstream aircraft for Uruguay which were not transferred until January 1999 and will therefore appear in the next Annual Report. The two entries for Brazil were also incorrect and should be consolidated into a one line entry for four River Class Patrol Minesweepers. The table also included details of the transfer of Harrier aircraft for India which were not handled under Government to Government arrangements.

Table 8 of the 1998 Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls should therefore read as follows:

Destination	Equipment	Quantity
Brazil	River Class Patrol Minesweepers	4
Uruguay	Wessex HC Mk2 Helicopters	5

Similar information in respect of 1999 transfers will appear in the 1999 Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls which should be published shortly.

The Ministry of Defence does not employ agents nor does it pay commission to third parties in support of Government to Government overseas sales.

TREASURY

Minimum Wage

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his letter of 25 May concerning the effect of the minimum wage on household incomes of different income deciles, what estimate he has made of the gross gain for each decile of households; and if he will make a statement. [128037]

Dawn Primarolo: The National Minimum Wage has, for the first time, provided a statutory level beneath which pay cannot fall—removing the worst excesses of low pay in the workplace.

It should be viewed as part of a comprehensive and coherent strategy to tackle poverty and encourage work—a strategy that combines targeted in-work tax credits with a minimum wage that is set at a prudent level.

The estimates of the gross increase in earnings for households in each income decile are provided in the table.

			Average gross increase in earnings for households affected by NMW
Decile	Percentage of households gaining from NMW	Distribution of affected households	Absolute (£ per week)	Percentage

Landfill Tax

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the national tax forgone on landfill is represented by money actually set aside by environmental tests for allocation to environmental bodies since the start of the scheme. [128886]

Mr. Timms: From the introduction of the tax on 1 October 1996 to 30 April 2000 the maximum potential tax credit that could be claimed under the environmental bodies credit scheme equates to £305 million. Tax credits for the same period amount to approximately £224 million which represents 73 per cent. of the potential tax claimable. This percentage has been rising each year.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the 10 per cent. contribution to tax forgone required from landfill operators has been contributed by the operators themselves. [128888]

Mr. Timms: Around one quarter of the 10 per cent. has been contributed by the operators themselves.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of landfill operators eligible to establish environmental trusts to administer tax forgone under the terms of the landfill levy have actually done so. [128883]

Mr. Timms: The Landfill Tax regulations 1996 require that all environmental bodies are independent of landfill operators. There are 850 landfill operators registered for landfill tax. Of these, 494 or 58 per cent. have made contributions to environmental bodies under the scheme.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the total amount of tax forgone set aside by environmental trusts for allocation to environmental bodies under the terms of the landfill levy has so far been allocated. [128884]

Mr. Timms: Ninety per cent. of the contributions received have already been spent or allocated to specific projects. The balance awaits allocation.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the total sums of tax forgone so far allocated by environmental bodies under the terms of the landfill levy have been allocated to recycling. [128887]

Mr. Timms: From the introduction of the tax on 1 October 1996 to 31 December 1999, 11 per cent. of expenditure has been on recycling. In addition, some spending on education and on research and development has been related to recycling.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the total tax requirement including notional tax forgone arising from the landfill levy is represented by the money set aside by environmental trusts for allocation to environmental bodies since the scheme began. [128885]

Mr. Timms: From the introduction of the tax on 1 October 1996 to 30 April 2000 credits have been subject to an overall cap of 20 per cent. of annual tax liability. Tax credits claimed have amounted to around 15 per cent. of the total tax revenue. This figure has been rising year on year—of a theoretical maximum of 20 per cent., in 1999–2000 the actual credits claimed were around 18 per cent.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total receipts were from landfill tax in Scotland in each of the years for which figures are available. [130078]

Mr. Timms: It is not possible to provide the requested information as revenue figures are not collated or recorded on an individual site by site basis.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Dundee-based projects and organisations have benefited from landfill tax credits in each year since the introduction of the tax; and if he will list them. [130080]

Mr. Timms: Data from Entrust, the regulator of the environmental bodies credit scheme, show that there are two environmental bodies with registered addresses in Dundee which have received funding from the landfill tax credit scheme since it started in October 1996. These are Dundee Waste and Environment Trust and University of Dundee Concrete Technology Unit.

There are five active or completed projects recorded as being carried out by Dundee Waste and Environment Trust. These are Mezieshill garden project; Baldragon Wood Wildlife Project; Restoration of Murroes and Tealing Parish Church; creation of public parks and amenities from derelict land in Dundee; and Lime System Development Project. The University of Dundee Concrete Technology Unit has received funding and has registered seven projects.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the value of landfill tax credits generated in (a) Scotland and (b) Dundee in each year since the landfill tax was introduced. [130079]

Mr. Timms: According to information held by Entrust the regulator of the environmental bodies credit scheme, contributions received by environmental bodies sited in Scotland have been as follows:

Year	Amount (£)
Scotland
1997	5,573,789
1998	6,628,874

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason heat pumps have not been included on the initial list of recommended technologies eligible for climate change levy tax incentives; and if he will make a statement. [129648]

Mr. Timms: The list was drawn up to include technologies with the greatest potential to reduce carbon dioxide emissions. Six were identified initially on this basis. Two more have been added subsequently. The Government will keep the list under review.

Office of Government Commerce

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his plans are for the Quinquennial Reviews of CCTA and PACE which are due in the next year.

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA) and Property Advisers to the Civil Estate (PACE) are part of the Office of Government Commerce (OGC) which became operational on 1 April this year. Since 1 April, key strategies for the new organisation have been developed, and a review has been put in hand to ensure that resources and the organisational structure support those strategies. The terms of reference for the review are:

> To review the present structure of OGC, covering its executive agencies and all other units; and to make recommendations on how best to align OGC's resources to deliver successfully its vision and strategies. The review will take into account the views of stakeholders including staff, central departments, other departments, customers and suppliers. It will also take account of requirements for Agency quinquennial reviews, in order to provide the specific reviews required for CCTA and PACE in the next year.

In ensuring that the review will take account of the need for quinquennial reviews of CCTA and PACE, it will consider past performance, organisational options for service delivery and ways in which service can be improved. These issues are also relevant to the whole organisation, not just CCTA and PACE. Similarly, the organisational review will incorporate an independent input and will seek the views of both customers and suppliers about how the OGC as a whole can best catalyse the most efficient and effective use of the civil procurement budget.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Experiments

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many dogs were killed as part of experiments in British research laboratories in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement. [129947]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In my reply to the hon. Member on 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 380W, in which I stated that members of the public often find it particularly difficult to accept that species that are kept as domestic pets or companion animals, such as dogs, are also used in research to find cures for illness. Such animals must be purpose bred and supplied by designated establishments and can only be used if there is no viable alternative for that particular procedure. I should emphasise that dogs are only used in about a quarter of 1 per cent. of all procedures.

Table 1 of the Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals Great Britain records the number of scientific procedures performed on dogs and Table 1a records the number of dogs used by primary purpose of the procedure. Numbers for the last three years for which figures are currently available are:

1998: 5,575 dogs used in 6,828 procedures

1997: 5,891 dogs used in 7,490 procedures

1996: 6,735 dogs used in 7,944 procedures.

They are primarily used in pharmaceutical research and development, or in pharmaceutical safety and efficacy evaluations. The results of this work have produced medicines which have cured illness, saved human lives and added to veterinary science which has assisted animal care. The figures reflect a downward trend in this use.

Swadlincote Magistrates Court

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made to accommodate the local probation service and to provide its services in South Derbyshire, and at what cost, when the Swadlincote magistrates court closes. [130171]

Mr. Boateng: It is the responsibility of Derbyshire Probation Service to acquire new premises to accommodate its staff currently operating from Swadlincote magistrates court when it closes. The location and costs are not yet known, but we have given Derbyshire Probation Service an assurance that we will provide financial support to assist in acquisition of new accommodation in Swadlincote should that be part of the local strategy at the time.

Departmental Grants and Payments

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisations and individuals received grants and payments in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01 for services in support of the work of (i) the Probation Service, (ii) local authority social services departments and (iii) for education as defined in the relevant budget line set out in his Department's Annual Report 1999–2000; and how much money was paid in each such grant. [130115]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 11 July 2000]: Information relating to those organisations directly funded by the Home Office in 1999–2000 for work in support of the Probation Service is as follows. Expenditure shown is the final outturn figure: figures for 2000–01 are available.

Society of Voluntary Associates (SOVA): £230,000

National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NACRO): £441,660[1]

National Offender Employment Forum: £50,000

Inner London and Surrey Probation Services—Evaluation of Asset and Springboard Projects: £35,387

Langley House Trust: £963,132

Middlesbrough Prostitution Task Force: £1,000

National Mentoring Consortium: £29,000

Prisoners' Abroad: £90,000

Venture Trust: £432,500

Lucy Faithful Foundation: £392,826

The remainder of the expenditure on that budget line (£177,495) was in respect of individual placements with various agencies for dangerous offenders.

Total: £2,843,000

[1] Amount shown represents project funding paid in addition to the core grant to NACRO which is shown under a separate budget line in the Home Office Annual Report.

No direct payments were made by the Home Office under local authority social service departments or for education as defined in the relevant budget line set out in his Department's Annual report 1999–2000.

Transsexuals

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Home Office Working Group on Gender Allocation, with particular reference to the membership, frequency of meetings, submissions received and expected report date. [130089]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The terms of reference and the membership of the Interdepartmental Working Group on Transsexual People were announced, by means of a written answer on 15 April 1999, Official Report, columns 132–33W, by my noble Friend, the then Minister of State, Home Office, the Lord Williams of Mostyn. The Group met once every two months, under the chairmanship of a Home Office official, until January 2000.

Submissions were received from 99 individuals and from the Beaumont Society, the British Medical Association, Change, the FTM Network, Northern Concord, the Gender and Sexuality Alliance, the Gender Identity Research and Education Society. The Gender Trust, Liberty, and Press for Change. Representatives of the last five organisations met the Working Party in January. Further written material was received from a number of these organisations and from the Evangelical Alliance Policy Commission.

The Working Group's report is being carefully considered. It was presented to Home Office Ministers in April and is being circulated to ministerial colleagues in other Government Departments and in the Scottish Executive, the National Assembly for Wales and the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many football hooligans (a) detained and (b) arrested at (i) Euro 2000, (ii) Copenhagen in May and (iii) the Scotland versus England match last year (A) were added to the Category C list and (B) had restriction orders placed upon them; [128155]

(2) how many of those football fans (a) detained and (b) deported at (i) Euro 2000, (ii) Copenhagen in May and (iii) the Scotland versus England match in Glasgow last year were (1) Category C hooligans and (2) subject to international restriction orders. [128154]

Mr. Straw: The police service in England and Wales ceased to designate individuals involved in football hooliganism by categories A, B, and C, some three years ago, and have replaced this by a more targeted, intelligence-led approach. International Football Banning Orders may be sought as a result of behaviour in jurisdictions outside England and Wales only where an agreement exists for that purpose ad the individual in question has been convicted in that jurisdiction of a football-related offence.

No one has yet been made subject to an International Football Banning Order as a result of events at Euro 2000; it was not possible to impose International Football Banning Orders on persons detained or arrested in Copenhagen as a result of the decision of the Danish authorities not to prosecute such persons; and two people have so far received International Football Banning Orders as a result of convictions associated with the Scotland versus England match last year: additional bans will be sought on receipt of the necessary documentation from the Scottish Crown Office. None of those detained or deported as a result of their behaviour at these events last year were subject at the time to Restriction Orders or International Football Banning Orders.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 4 July 2000, Official Report, columns 170–73, on football hooliganism, if he will list the offences for which the 409 people arrested in Belgium and Holland were convicted. [129597]

Mr. Straw: Of the 965 England supporters arrested or detained during Euro 2000, 391 had previously been convicted of a criminal offence. The National Criminal Intelligence Service now advise that the convictions are as follows: 133 convictions for violence, 200 for disorder, 38 for the possession of an offensive weapon, 122 for criminal damage and 250 for other offences. Some supporters will have been convicted of more than one type of offence.

On-the-spot Fines

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what external advice he has received concerning the compatibility of on-the-spot fines imposed by police with the European Convention on Human Rights; [129240]

(2) what consultations he has carried out regarding the imposition of on-the-spot fines by the police; and if he will list the bodies he has consulted. [129242]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As I made clear in my reply to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and the Weald, (Miss Widdecombe) on 10 July 2000, Official Report, columns 432–33W, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister discussed a number of ideas for tackling disorderly and anti-social behaviour at his meeting with chief officers of police on 3 July. These included the possibility of on-the-spot fines or fixed penalties. The purpose of the meeting was to open up discussion and to seek the views of chief officers on the options which should be further considered rather than to present ready-made solutions.

The chief officers present broadly welcomed the idea of extending the fixed penalty system to a wider range of offences and I have asked my officials and the Association of Chief Police Officers to consider this option, and others, in the coming weeks.

Any new measures would, of course, have to comply with the European Convention on Human Rights.

Security Service

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if all processing of personal data by the Security Service is covered by a certificate under section 28 of the Data Protection Act 1998. [129613]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 5 July 2000, Official Report, column 235W.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements there are for the inspection of hostels used by asylum seekers under the dispersal programme. [129940]

Mrs. Roche: There is a twin track approach to the inspection of accommodation. First of all, officials in the National Asylum Support Service have signed a Service Level Agreement with the Property Advisors to the Civil Estate (PACE) part of the Office of Government Commerce. PACE officials are responsible for inspecting properties provided by accommodation providers and ensuring that housing conditions comply with the terms of the contract. Additionally, a Performance Monitoring Inspections Team has been established to carry out inspections in conjunction with PACE to ensure that the providers of accommodation comply fully with the contract in terms of effective housing management and access to support services.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what environmental and health and safety legislation applies to hostels used by asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement on the ways in which such legislation differs from that applying to houses in multiple occupation. [129939]

Mrs. Roche: All property must meet the requirements of the Housing Act 1985 or Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 and meet all regulatory requirements, including environmental and health and safety obligations, whether under law or regulations issued by any public or local authority and any statutory or non statutory organisation or body.

The provider is obliged through contract and specification to ensure that all necessary planning permission has been granted by the relevant authority. Where a house in multiple occupation scheme is in place the landlord must comply with the terms of the registration with the local authority.

Mr. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department plans to take responsibility for all asylum seekers who have not yet received a final decision but who are currently supported by local authorities; and when the backlog of existing cases will be cleared. [130272]

Mrs. Roche: We have no plans at present to assume responsibility for the support of asylum seekers who have not received a final decision on their application and who are currently supported by local authorities.

We are on course to make a substantial reduction in the backlog of asylum applications by April 2001.

Mr. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the National Asylum Support Service, in commissioning accommodation for asylum seekers, is commissioning within grant levels set for local authorities. [130273]

Mrs. Roche: Contractual negotiations between the National Asylum Support Service and potential providers of accommodation to asylum seekers are commercially confidential.

Mr. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many port-of-entry applicants the National Asylum Support Service has accepted responsibility to support since 1 April; and how many in-country applicants there have been (a) nationally and (b) in London boroughs since 1 April. [130270]

Mrs. Roche: The National Asylum Support Services (NASS) assumed responsibility for the support of those seeking asylum at ports of entry with effect from 3 April. From the same date they also assumed responsibility for those making in-country applications for asylum in Scotland and Northern Ireland. On 7 April NASS assumed responsibility for in-country applicants who made their application for asylum in Kent. Between 3 April and 10 July NASS has accepted responsibility for the support of 4,353 asylum seekers. These include all those who are eligible to receive support from NASS. It is not possible to break the figure down to show the number of port applicants receiving support. Since 1 April there have been 8,400 applications for asylum made in-country. Separate figures to show the number of applicants living in London boroughs are not available.

Grants

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the beneficiaries of (a) community support grant and (b) family support grant in (i) 1999–2000 and (ii) 2000–01, giving the sums of money paid in each grant. [129525]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The Family Support Grant is a programme of funding for voluntary organisations which first became available in 1998 when it was announced that £7 million would be made available over three years. The first £1 million of awards for 1999–2000 were announced in June 1999 and a further £3 million was announced in April 2000 for 2000–01. Additionally, it was agreed that the new National Family and Parenting Institute would receive £247,000 from the Home Office as part of a "joined up" funding package from five other Departments and the Welsh Assembly totalling £2 million over the three years. 1999–2002 Parentline Plus would receive £310,000 for each of the financial years in question in order to develop and expand the services already provided to parents by introducing a national freephone telephone helpline for parents.

Funding under the open competition in both bidding rounds has gone to a range of national and local organisations across the country under three strands to help support infrastructure organisations and to promote innovative work with families. Each year a grant is made available to fund projects with a specific theme aimed at plugging gap areas in provision. In 1999 the theme was working with boys, young men and fathers. This year projects working on the parenting of teenagers have been funded.

Grants paid out in the year April 1999–2000 are available for up to three years and for 2000–01 for up to two years. Grants given to voluntary organisation projects are listed; figures are given per project for both 1999–2000 and 2000–01 where applicable.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Judicial Appointments

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications were received in the last year for judicial appointments by (a) solicitors and (b) barristers for posts as (i) deputy district judge, (ii) assistant recorder and (iii) circuit judge; and in respect of how many of the applicants there were (1) no comments, (2) one comment and (3) two or more comments in relation to the informal consultation element in the selection process for each of (i) to (iii). [129949]

Mr. Lock: The numbers of barrister and solicitor applicants for the last year's competitions are as set out:

Competition	Barristers	Solicitors
Deputy District Judge	64	359
Assistant Recorder	573	114
Circuit Judge	111	35

No "informal" consultation takes place for any of these competitions. However, in relation to the formal consultation process which takes place for each of the competitions, the relevant members of the judiciary and the profession are invited to submit their views on each candidate. In addition, for the Assistant Recorder and Deputy District Judge competitions each candidate is invited to nominate consultees. Candidates for Circuit Bench competitions have not hitherto been invited to nominate consultees, although they have been invited to do so for this year's competition. The only available statistics are for the Assistant Recorder competition, which show that up to 30 comments were received on each applicant.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129853]

Jane Kennedy: Of the non-judicial appointments made to our non-departmental public bodies since 1st May 1997, nine (or 32 per cent.) of the paid appointments have been women and 305 (or 41 per cent.) of the unpaid ones have been women.

This Government are committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Department has drawn up an action plan for increasing the numbers of women and people from ethnic minorities holding public appointments. The latest plans, together with the Government's overall plan, were published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos: Opening Up Public Appointments 2000—2003", copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

Legal Services Ombudsman

Mr. Colman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Legal Services Ombudsman intends to publish her annual report for 1999–2000. [130675]

Mr. Lock: The Legal Services Ombudsman has today published her ninth annual report, and copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

CABINET OFFICE

Business Regulations

7. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the level of regulation on business. [128651]

Mr. Stringer: The OECD has reported that the UK has one of the lowest levels of business regulation of any member country.

Modernising Government Programme

8. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on progress in the modernising government programme. [128652]

18. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement about progress on the modernising government programme. [128666]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Good progress is being made across the public sector: NHS Direct, the ONE project, internet access in libraries, and improved Government websites, as well as improved policies to tackle deep-seated problems like social exclusion.

This is a long term change programme. There will be further changes made to improve services to the public. These will include changing address in one transaction and help with life cycle events.

9. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the cost of the modernising government programme. [128656]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The modernising government programme is ongoing and integral to the work of every part of the public service. We are using specific funds, such as the Invest to Save Budget (totalling £230 million) and the Capital Modernisation Fund (totalling £1.1 billion) to assist in the process of modernisation. An example of the type of project that this money is going towards funding is the integration of services for pensioners at the Benefits Agency.

11. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on her Department's work in co-ordinating Government policy on the modernising government programme. [128659]

Mr. Ian McCartney: In July 1999 we published the Modernising Government Action Plan showing action in hand by the centre of government to promote and drive forward the commitments of the White Paper published earlier in March 1999. Progress against the Action Plan is reported regularly on the internet. The last update showed that over 90 per cent. of the activities were on course or had been delivered.

Special Advisers

10. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what estimate she has made of the cost of salaries of special advisers in Government for the financial year 2001–02, on the basis that each adviser who is so entitled receives the maximum performance-related increment for that year. [128658]

Marjorie Mowlam: The estimated total cost of Advisers in 2001–02 is approximately £4.6 million.

Public Appointments

12. Mr. Brady: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement following the publication of "Quangos: Opening up Public Appointments 2000–03". [128660]

Mr. Stringer: "Opening up Public Appointments 2000—03" was published on 24 May. It contains the Government's updated plan for increasing the participation of women, members of the ethnic minorities and disabled people in public life.

The Government are keen to ensure that those serving on the boards of public bodies are as representative of society as possible. We are committed to the equal representation of women and men in public appointments and a pro-rata representation of members of the ethnic minorities. It also wants to encourage more disabled people to participate in public life.

Government Services

13. Ms Walley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to make Government services more accessible and responsive to their recipients. [128661]

Mr. Ian McCartney: We have appointed consumer champions in all the key central government services, to find out and meet their users' needs. We have been working hard to ensure we consult the public better and more widely about policy and services.

We are working to provide extended opening hours in the services where there is greatest demand, and we will provide electronic access to all services by 2005.

Drugs Referral Scheme

14. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to ensure that the introduction of the drugs referral scheme does not disadvantage those drug users who have not been arrested but who wish to receive treatment to break their drug dependency. [128662]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Arrest Referral Schemes play an important role in the Government's drug strategy, by putting drug misusers with problems in touch with the various treatment services available.

The Government have recently proposed a National Treatment Agency to provide a cohesive central approach to treatment for problem drug misusers. This means the Department of Health and the Home Office working together to ensure that those requiring treatment are able to access services which have a positive impact on health and crime, regardless of their route of referral.

Social Exclusion

15. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement about the Government's strategy to combat social exclusion. [128663]

Marjorie Mowlam: I can confirm that good progress is being made towards achieving the Government's targets on the four reports from the Social Exclusion Unit that have been published. These are on School Truancy and Exclusion, Rough Sleeping, Teenage Pregnancy and Bridging the Gap, which is about 16–18 year olds not in education, training and employment.

The SEU launched a consultation framework version of the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal in April. Over 18,000 copies of the consultation framework were disseminated. The consultation ended on 30 June. The SEU are currently reviewing responses and will set out an action plan for the National Strategy later this year.

International Drug Trading

16. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what recent meetings she has had with foreign Government representatives to discuss strategies for combating the international trade in illicit drugs. [128664]

Marjorie Mowlam: I hold regular meetings with foreign Government representatives to discuss respective drug strategies and share experiences of combating the international trade of illicit drugs.

Over recent months, some of the key players I have met include: President Pastrana of Colombia, General Barry McCaffrey, the US Drug Tsar, and Anders Kompass, the UN High Commissioner.

Civil Servants

17. Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the recent increase in the number of civil servants. [128665]

Mr. Stringer: Civil Service numbers rose by nearly 1 per cent. in the year to October 1999. Much of this increase is in front line jobs delivering the better public services to which the Government are committed.

Drug-related Crime

19. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to better co-ordinate the Government's response to drug-related crime. [128667]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As Minister with overall responsibility for driving the Government's drug strategy, I am aware of a wide-range of anti-drug initiatives being pursued at both national and local level to meet the Government's target for tackling drug-related crime. These are outlined in the UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator's First Annual Report and National Plan.

Among more recent initiatives being pursued are:

Proposals to extend drug testing across the criminal justice system to identify offenders who are committing crime in order to buy drugs.

The national roll-out of the Drug Treatment and Testing Orders to direct offenders towards treatment.

The allocation of £20 million in a joint funding initiative with the police to accelerate the development of arrest referral schemes to get drug misusing offenders into treatment.

£1.8 million has been spent on anti-drugs initiatives by the Kirklees Drug Action Team in the last financial year.

Ministerial Code

20. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office pursuant to her answer of 14 June 2000, Official Report, column 665W, what procedure is followed in respect of a Minister who does not fulfil his duty under the ministerial code. [128668]

Mr. Stringer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on 19 May 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

Internet

21. Dr. Cable: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on progress in introducing Government services which can be accessed via the internet. [128669]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As part of our Modernising Government programme we announced in our Action Plan, published in July 1999, that we would provide six-monthly reports on our progress in delivering government services electronically. The second of these reports was published on the Central Information Technology Unit (CITU) website in November 1999 (http://www.citu.gov.uk) and the next report was published earlier today.

Rural Areas

22. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what policy initiatives are under consideration to address problems in rural areas. [128670]

Marjorie Mowlam: We are preparing a Rural White Paper for England, led jointly by DETR and MAFF, to set out the Government's vision for rural areas. As part of the preparation of the White Paper we are considering a number of new policy initiatives, which will be announced when the White Paper is published together with a White Paper on urban policy.

Deregulation

23. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she proposes to introduce changes in the deregulation procedure. [128671]

Drug Action Teams

Mr. Savidge: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what contribution is made by drug action teams to the delivery of the Government's anti-drugs strategy. [128650]

Marjorie Mowlam: Drug Action Teams (DATs) have a crucial role in the delivery of the National Drugs Strategy. They are the main mechanism for delivery on the ground, they work as a local partnership of the agencies involved in tackling drugs including Probation, Health, Education, Police Authorities and Local Authorities.

Online Government Services

Mr. Watts: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she intends to publish information on the target set by the Prime Minister after the Knowledge Economy Cabinet meeting on 30 March to deliver all Government services online by 2005. [130470]

Mr. Ian McCartney: A report on progress by Departments and their key agencies is being published today. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of the House and it will be published on the website www.citu.gov.uk. The report contains information supplied by Departments based on all the services they deliver to the citizen and to business, as contained in their Public Service Agreements and Service Delivery Agreements.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by her Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123804]

Mr. Stringer: For the purpose of this answer my Department includes the Government Car and Despatch Agency, an agency within my Department, and the Central Office of Information, which is an agency which reports directly to the Minister for the Cabinet Office.

The Cabinet Office regard it as good practice to publish the results of market and opinion research and in general will make public research considered relevant and important in framing major policy proposals and decisions, unless an exemption applies under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. For example, results of research carried out using the People's Panel are routinely placed in the House Libraries.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial assistance her Department provides for research by the UK Institute of Arable Crops. [130455]

Mr. Foulkes: We do not provide financial assistance in the form of core funding for the Institute of Arable Crops Research (IACR). Funding is provided for specific research projects with agreed objectives which contribute to achieving our overall objectives and also under consultancy contracts.

IACR is currently involved in 12 research projects with a total value of £2,355,599 which are wholly or partly funded from our Renewable Natural Resources research programmes. Most of these involve research collaboration with other institutions in the UK or overseas. It is not possible to disaggregate the share of funding received by IACR in the time available.

IACR also has some involvement in an Indo-UK collaboration on oilseed crops funded from our India programme which includes research and technology transfer and has a total value of £2 million over eight years.

In addition IACR has a contract to provide us with specialist advisory and diagnostic services in the field of tropical plant virology and in response to inquiries from our partner countries. The value of this contract is currently around £40,000 a year.

UN Drugs Control Programme

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial assistance her Department provides for the UN Drugs Control Programme; and what this funding is earmarked for. [130451]

Mr. Foulkes: Over the last three years we have provided £2.377 million to UNDCP in support of alternative development in Bolivia, Peru and Pakistan; £1.550 million to UNDCP in support of demand reduction and education in Peru and East Asia; and £0.196 million in support of strengthening law enforcement in China and East Asia.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Central IT Unit in the Cabinet Office, with support from CCTA, has now developed the toolkit and I am today placing copies in the Libraries of the House, and on the Information Age Government website at www.iagchampions.gov.uk. The toolkit has been extended to cover both the IT professional and business system management skills needed to implement department's e-business strategies, as recommended in the report "Successful IT: Modernising Government in Action" that I published in May.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which she has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129844]

Mr. Stringer: Since 1 May 1997, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office has appointed (or re-appointed) 90 men and 68 women to serve on the boards of non-departmental public bodies. Of these, 21 men (72 per cent.) and eight women (28 per cent.) were appointed to paid posts and 69 men (53 per cent.) and 60 women (47 per cent.) were appointed to unpaid posts.

In addition, my noble Friend, Baroness Jay, the Minister for Women has appointed 16 women to serve on the Women's National Commission. Of these, one is a paid post.

This Government are committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Department has drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women and ethnic minorities holding public appointments. The latest plans, together with the Government's overall plan, were published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos: Opening up Public Appointments 2000–2003", copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

Mrs. Liddell: Gas plays, and will continue to play, an important part in meeting the UK's energy needs. In 1999, gas accounted for 33.2 per cent. of UK primary energy requirements; and, from within that total, gas generation accounted for 38.5 per cent. of electricity supplied. A working paper produced by my Department suggests that the contribution of gas to primary energy demand in the year 2020 will be of the order of 47.5–49.2 per cent., and its share of fuel used for electricity generation to be in the range 57–64 per cent..

Entrepreneurial Skills (Universities)

14. Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to equip universities with entrepreneurial skills. [128954]

16. Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of increased carbon dioxide emissions consequent upon the rescheduling of closure of Magnox nuclear power stations. [128956]

Mrs. Liddell: The projections within "Energy Projections for the UK: Working Paper", issued by my Department in March, include assumptions on the timing of closure of Magnox stations. The projected levels of carbon dioxide release in the Kyoto target period are unaffected by the recent announcements.

Manufacturing Industry

19. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to improve the long-term viability of manufacturing industry. [128959]

Mr. Caborn: We are assisting manufacturing industry to improve its long-term prospects by providing a stable macro-economic framework and by pursuing policies that help firms to innovate and grow.

24. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many parishes lost their sub-post office (a) in the period between 1 May 1997 and 30 April 2000 and (b) in the previous three years. [128964]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that it does not hold data on the location of sub-post offices by parish. The total number of post offices closed between end March 1997 and end March 2000 was 850 and in the three years between end March 1994 and end March 1997 the total number was 277.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of sub-post office closures in each year since 1997 met the definition of unavoidable closures set out in the Performance and Innovation Unit's report into the post office network. [129419]

Ms Hewitt: David Irwin, Chief Executive of the Small Business Service, and I visited the SBA in March this year. We went to see first-hand the work of the SBA and to identify lessons from it and other business support initiatives which could be applied to the SBS.

As announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 5 July 2000 at the joint UK-US conference "Enterprise and Technology for All: Seizing the Opportunity" David Irwin is taking forward with Aida Alvarez, Head of the SBA, a number of initiatives for further collaboration such as staff twinning possibilities and liaison between the Small Business Council and the SBA's National Advisory Council.

Business Regulation

22. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the level of regulation of business. [128962]

Ms Hewitt: According to the recent research by the OECD and the Economist Intelligence Unit the UK is already more lightly regulated than most of our competitors. We will continue to reduce the level of regulation on business wherever possible.

33. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to simplify and reduce regulations affecting business. [128975]

Ms Hewitt: We are continually looking for opportunities to reduce burdens on business. For example, we have increased the statutory audit threshold for companies from £350,000 to £1 million, benefiting up to 150,000 companies, with potential savings of up to £180 million a year.

EU Applicant Countries

23. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which EU applicant countries he or his predecessors have visited since May 1997. [128963]

Mr. Byers: DTI Ministers have visited a majority of the applicants since 1997 reflecting the importance of EU enlargement for business. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has just returned from Hungary.

Civil Aircraft

25. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the Civil Aircraft Research and Demonstration programme. [128965]

36. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes he proposes to make to the Civil Aircraft Research and Demonstration programme. [128978]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Department's support for Civil Aircraft Research and Demonstration makes an important contribution to the competitiveness of the aerospace industry. Decisions on future funding will be made in the light of the Government's spending review.

Creative and Communications Industries

26. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the contribution of the creative and communications industries to the UK economy; and if he will make a statement. [128967]

Ms Hewitt: The creative and communications industries contributed an estimated £25 billion to the economy in 1995. Work in this area is currently under review, with an update of its assessment planned for later this year. Early indications, drawing on National Statistics, are that the corresponding estimate for the most recently available data 1997 is £33 billion, accounting for approaching 5 per cent. of Gross Domestic Product. In addition the telecommunications services industry contributed 1.9 per cent. to GDP.

The creative and communications industries are vitally important to the future economic prosperity of this country. We have joined together with DCMS and other Government Departments to try to help to maximise their competitive position. We have closely involved senior figures from the creative and communications industries in fora such as the Information Age Partnership, chaired by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and the Creative Industries Task Force, chaired by the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

European Charter for Small Firms

27. Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the European charter for small firms. [128968]

Ms Hewitt: The Government welcome the commitments in the European Charter for Small Enterprises agreed at the Feira Council to take action, both at the European and member state level, on areas such as better regulation, strengthening innovation and entrepreneurship, improving access to finance and enhancing business support. The Charter sends a clear signal of the European Union's positive attitude to enterprise and gives substance to the recent commitment to make the European Union the most competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world.

Miners (Compensation)

29. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he has made in meeting retired miners health-related compensation claims. [128970]

Mrs. Liddell: The Handling Agreement for settling claims for respiratory disease were formally signed in September last year. To date we have received around 108,000 claims. So far over 52,000 spirometry tests, the first part of the medical tests, have been carried out. A further 12,000 appointments have been made at 34 centres nationwide. Together this represents over 90 per cent. of the total live claims received. Over 9,000 claimants have received full and final offers based on their spirometry result; of these 2,600 have been accepted. The remainder will progress to the full MAP.

The full Medical Assessment Process, the second part of the tests, began in December. Healthcall, the Department's contractors, now have 26 centres operational. Initially some GPs and hospitals were uncertain about releasing the miners' medical records which are essential prior to making a MAP appointment. However we are now making appointments at a rate of 2,000 a month. We expect this to rise into the autumn. To date the Department has made damages payments totalling in excess of £63 million.

We signed the Handling Arrangement for settling claims for Vibration White Finger in January last year. To date we have received some 80,000 claims. Nearly 15,000 claims have been settled, with damages totalling nearly £130 million.

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases have been lodged to date by former miners living in Barnsley, East and Mexborough for compensation for (a) vibration white finger and (b) chronic bronchitis and emphysema. [129798]

Mrs. Liddell: In the Barnsley and Mexborough area, as at 10 July, the Department has lodged some 4,000 claims for vibration white finger and 5,200 for respiratory disease from former miners and their families. IRISC, the Department's claim handling agents, are not able to provide a breakdown for Barnsley, East.

To date in the Barnsley and Mexborough area the Department has made general damages payments in interim and full and final settlement for both diseases totalling over £10 million.

Thailand

30. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on UK business activity in Thailand. [128972]

Mr. Caborn: In 1999, Thailand was the UK's 39th largest export market with exports of £468 million. Exports for the first four-months of 2000 have shown an increase of 59 per cent. over the same period of 1999. Top export products are electrical machinery, power generation equipment, industrial machinery and leather goods.

The UK ranks as the 5th largest investor in Thailand, being strongly represented in the retail, power and water sectors. The last year has also seen major investments in banking, with HSBC (£620 million) and Standard Chartered (£206 million) acquiring majority holdings in Thai banks.

The recovery from economic recession in Thailand has been reflected in the levels of interest Trade Partners UK has seen from British companies looking to do business there, both in numbers of planned trade missions, exhibitions and seminars, and in the numbers of companies taking part.

Rover Task Force

31. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the report of the Rover Task Force. [128973]

Mr. Byers: The Task Force Report has only recently been received.

SMEs

32. Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to promote wider consultation with employees in small and medium-sized enterprises. [128974]

Ms Hewitt: The Government are committed to promoting a strong partnership culture in the workplace—including in small and medium enterprises.

To this end we have established the Partnership Fund which aims to promote the goal of better employee communications. The fund makes available £5 million over four years to assist with the development of workplace projects including improved consultation of employees. 18 such workplace projects, have received funding, involve SMEs.

We are also working to promote best practice by spreading the message about the achievements of the best companies, whether large or small. Business Links are able to provide guidance to appropriate sources of advice. The independent Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (ACAS) also produces guidance material and works with employers to help modernise their employment practices. The 1998 review of the Service identified this as a priority area for ACAS.

In addition, small and medium enterprises are subject to the existing statutory framework for information and consultation of employees, as regards proposed collective redundancies (i.e more than 20 redundancies proposed at one establishment within a 90 day period), transfers of undertakings, health and safety and information for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Business (North-east)

34. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his policy is on increasing business formation in the North-east of England. [128976]

Mr. Caborn: A stable economic climate is vital to stimulate development. The DTI aims to promote enterprise and innovation and is particularly keen to support successful, sustainable business start-ups. It has set up the Small Business Service (SBS) specifically to champion and service the needs of small business and act as a strong voice on their behalf within Government. The Chief Executive of the SBS, David Irwin, has 20 years experience in the North-east of helping people to start up and grow their businesses. Small businesses make up nearly 99 per cent. of all businesses in the UK and employ more than half the total workforce. The North-east has fewer than its fair share of new start-ups. This fact is recognised by the Regional Development Agency, One NorthEast, who have published their Regional Economic Strategy. One of the key objectives is to address this problem and the new European objective 2 Single Programming Document will be an important vehicle to drive this forward.

Family-friendly Employment Policies

35. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with employers organisations about promoting family friendly employment policies. [128977]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has so far discussed the review of maternity pay and parental leave with the Confederation of British Industry, the British Chambers of Commerce and the Chief Executive of the Small Business Service. Officials from my Department have additionally discussed the review with the Federation of Small Businesses, the Forum for Private Businesses, the Engineering Employers' Federation, Opportunity Now, the Industrial Society, the Employers' Organisation for Local Government, the National Health Service and the Institute of Personnel and Development. They have also met a wide range of other interested organisations.

Time Shares

37. Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to create a right for people who purchase time shares to dispose of them at a later date. [128979]

Dr. Howells: There is no need to introduce new legislation. There is already a marketplace for timeshare resales and many existing contracts include cancellation clauses.

Euro

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the costs to industry and commerce of the adoption of the euro by the United Kingdom. [128969]

Mrs. Liddell: The cost of a changeover would depend on the detailed approach taken and the extent to which the euro had been considered in investment decisions prior to joining.

MCI WorldCom/Sprint Merger

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the implications for the competitive balance of the internet of the proposed merger between MCI WorldCom and Sprint. [129438]

Dr. Howells: This case fell to the consideration of the EC competition authorities under the EC Merger Regulation (ECMR). The Commission prohibited the proposed deal and announced this in a press notice on 28 June.

The Commission's analysis in this case will be published in the Official Journal of the European Communities in due course.

Business Environment Simplification Taskforce

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the report from the European Commission's business environment simplification task force of July 1998. [130056]

Ms Hewitt: The Government welcome the recommendations of the BEST task force, particularly those on regulatory simplification and reform, and now looks forward to the first Annual Report on BEST which will be issued by the Commission later this year. Policies on business environment simplification are currently being developed under initiatives such as the proposed Multiannual Programme for Enterprise and Entrepreneurship for 2001–05 and the recently adopted European Charter for Small Enterprises.

The Commission's draft Multiannual Programme proposes the introduction of a new BEST procedure, based on the identification and adoption of best practice in the enterprise field, with work towards simplification and regulatory reform being driven forward as part of the follow-up arising from the Lisbon Special Summit earlier this year.

Credit Reference Agencies

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to make credit reference agencies accountable to Parliament. [130057]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I have no plans to introduce additional controls on the activities of credit reference agencies.

Businesses which provide credit reference information about consumers already require licences issued by the Director General of Fair Trading under the Consumer Credit Act 1974. The Director General has to satisfy himself that a licensee is a fit person to engage in the activities covered by the licence and he can vary, suspend or revoke licences where he considers that licensees have engaged in practices that appear to him to be deceitful or oppressive, or otherwise unfair or improper (whether unlawful or not). He therefore monitors the complaints he receives about licence holders and he has demonstrated that he is ready to take the necessary licensing action to protect consumers where he considers it justified.

Departmental Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130040]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 11 July 2000]: (a) I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Burgon) on 23 July 1999, Official Report, columns 677–78W.

(b) Departments and their agencies are currently collating this information for 1999–2000 and this will be made available to the House shortly.

Weights and Measures

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the cost to British traders of the law requiring goods to be sold in metric units. [130267]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 July 2000]: A compliance cost assessment was published by the Department of Trade and Industry in 1994, when the legislation was made to require loose goods to be sold in metric weights after 31 December 1999. The main cost for traders was identified as the conversion or replacement of imperial weighing machines. The average cost of conversion was estimated to be £100 per machine. The starting price for replacement was estimated to be £450 per machine. It was further estimated that 80 per cent. of machines were capable of conversion.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what the total cost to his Department will be in the financial year 2000–01 of the salaries of the trading standards officers employed by his Department to enforce the law requiring the sale of goods in metric units; [130268]

(2) how many trading standards officers are employed by his Department to enforce the implementation of the law requiring the sale of goods in metric units. [130271]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 July 2000]: The Department of Trade and Industry is not responsible for enforcing the use by traders of prescribed units of measurement for the sale of goods. Enforcement is undertaken by the local authorities, as part of their wider responsibility for trading standards. Each authority decides how many staff it will employ on trading standards work, and the allocation of staff time (and therefore of staff costs) between the different areas of enforcement.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on (a) the seizure of weighing equipment by trading standards officers of his Department from traders whom they believe to be in breach of the law requiring goods to be sold in metric units and (b) the procedures available to them to obtain the restitution of their property from his Department. [130269]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 July 2000]: Weights and measures legislation includes powers for local authority inspectors of weights and measures to seize and detain equipment in circumstances where they believe the equipment is liable to be forfeited. This would apply, for example, to equipment being used without a valid stamp on it, to equipment which is false or unjust, or which was being used in the commission of fraud.

Where prosecution followed, it would be for the courts to determine whether the equipment should be forfeited. Otherwise it would be returned to the owner.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129855]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 July 2000]: Of the appointments I have made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997:

(i) 54 were women to positions which received some remuneration (29.3 per cent. of remunerated appointments)

(ii) 42 were women to unpaid positions (19.6 per cent. of unpaid appointments).

This Government are committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Department has drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women and ethnic minorities holding public appointments. The latest plan, together with the Government's overall plan, was published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos: Opening up Public Appointments 2000–2003", copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to uprate the national minimum wage. [128952]

Mr. Byers: As indicated in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 30 March 2000, Official Report, column 237W, we have now asked the Low Pay Commission to continue to monitor and evaluate the impact of the minimum wage and to consider whether there is a case for a further increase in the rate next year. The commission will report by July 2001 and any further increase will be introduced in October 2001.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to consult local authorities concerning GM trial sites. [127794]

Mr. Meacher: Current legislation does not at present include provision for consulting local authorities over the location of GM trial sites.

However, the Government have made clear their commitment to an open and transparent process for informing people about the trials. Locations of all proposed sites for research trials are advertised before sowing commences. Full details of the locations of farm scale evaluation sites are on the DETR website, along with detailed information about the programme. A number of public meetings were held during the spring, to which parish and ward councillors with a trial site in their area were invited. We remain committed to making as much information available to local people as possible and are currently drawing on lessons from the spring in planning for future planting rounds, including earlier notification.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), of 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 158W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128248]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 29 June 2000]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and seconding more of our people out. Before an Interchange can occur, all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

From the organisations cited in the answer of 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 158W, individuals seconded in to the Department worked in the following divisions or areas, at the grades indicated.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much money has been (a) offered to and (b) taken up by the Mersey Partnership from public funds over each of the last five years; and from what sources. [129598]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Public funds offered to and administered by the Merseyside Partnership in the last five years are as follows.

Rogers Report

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he has taken to set up regional resource centres for urban development as recommended in the Rogers report, "Towards an Urban Renaissance". [129599]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government agree with the Task Force about the importance of improving urban development skills.

At the national level we have commissioned a feasibility study of a recommendation made by the Social Exclusion Unit's Policy Action Team 16 (Learning Lessons), for the creation of a National Centre for Neighbourhood Renewal. This would provide the training, knowledge and skills needed to support neighbourhood renewal activity and would help to achieve many of the same ends as the Task Force's proposed Regional Resource Centres. Consultation meetings are taking place later this month on the results of the feasibility study.

At the regional level there is also a great deal happening on the ground to improve urban development skills particularly in response to the Continuing Professional Development initiative. Academic institutions across the country are now getting together with regeneration practitioners and professional institutions in putting together relevant good practice guidance and training packages for everyone from existing professionals to community volunteers.

The Government are also working closely with the professional institutions and local government to improve training in urban design skills and are considering, with the Local Government Association, the way resources can be deployed more effectively in the pursuit of excellence in this area. A skills seminar is being held by the Minister for Housing and Planning on 13 July to take this forward.

Right to Buy

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on varying the discounts available under the Right-to-Buy Scheme in areas of high demand for housing; and if he will make a statement. [129471]

Mr. Raynsford: I am aware of no such representations to date, though we published our Housing Green Paper "Quality and choice—a decent home for all" earlier this year and we are considering responses as they come in. The Green Paper said that we do not intend to make any further substantial changes to the Right-to-Buy Scheme.

Airports

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress to date with the airport study for the South-east. [129591]

Ms Beverley Hughes: As the then Minister for Transport announced on 11 March 1999, the South-east and East of England Regional Air Services (SERAS) study has started from the position that nothing is ruled in and nothing is ruled out.

We are currently in the early stages of assessing a wide range of options, both at existing airports and possible new sites. We will proceed through successive sifts to narrow down options to a final shortlist, on which there will be a full public consultation before Ministers come to decisions.

It is expected that the study will be completed by spring or summer 2001, to be followed by public consultation. The results will feed into an Air Transport White Paper, which will also take account of the Government's decisions in response to the Inspector's report on the Heathrow Terminal 5 Inquiry.

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the earliest date will be that planning authorities near Gatwick Airport will be able to consider planning applications following the conclusion of the airport study of South-east airports. [129590]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The South-east and East of England Regional Air Services study (SERAS) is expected to be completed by spring or summer 2001, to be followed by public consultation. The results will feed into an Air Transport White Paper, which is intended to provide a framework for the future development of aviation and airports in the United Kingdom.

Once the White Paper is published, regional planning guidance and local development plans will need to be reviewed to take account of policies that emerge from the White Paper.

In the meantime, before the SERAS study has been completed and the White Paper published, planning applications for development in the Gatwick Airport area will be subject to normal provisions of the planning system and will be determined against existing national, regional and local policies.

Revenue Grant Distribution

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many changes he has made to the system of revenue grant distribution to local authorities since 1997; and if he will give details of the changes. [129938]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There were 15 changes in the method of determining Standard Spending Assessments (SSAs) for the 1998–99 Local Government Finance Settlement; and 20 changes for the 1999–2000 Local Government Finance Settlement.

The July 1998 Local Government White Paper announced a 3-year review of Revenue Grant Distribution. It said that the Government did not expect to make fresh changes to the method of calculation of SSAs except where there are changes in the functions of councils, or the funding of particular services.

In 2000–01 there were therefore only limited adjustments to SSAs to accommodate the establishment of the Greater London Authority and related changes, most notably those arising from the alterations to the boundary of the Metropolitan Police District and the Essex, Hertfordshire and Surrey police areas.

Changes in the method of determining SSAs are contained in circular letters to local authorities, dated 2 December 1997, 2 December 1998 and 25 November 1999, copies of which are in the Library. For convenience, copies of the relevant extracts have been placed in the Library.

London Underground

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the unscheduled line closures on the London Underground that have occurred since 1 January; and if he will set out the (a) cause and (b) duration of each line closure. [130191]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 11 July 2000]: This is an operational matter for London Underground who have supplied details of unscheduled line closures (defined for this purpose as delays of more than four hours) as set out in the following table.

Yorkshire and Humberside

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the Government Office for Yorkshire and the Humber in assisting regeneration projects in the region. [128642]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 12 July 2000]: The Government Office for Yorkshire and the Humber (GOYH) continues to contribute effectively to maximising competitiveness and prosperity in the region, and supporting integrated policies for an inclusive society. In particular it has worked closely with Yorkshire Forward (the Regional Development Agency) to support it in its first full year of operation.

During the past year GOYH has managed and developed the wide range of Government programmes and initiatives that contribute to the regeneration of the region. Examples include:

New Deal for Communities (NDC): Bradford and Hull have each received £50 million and £55 million respectively over 10 years under the first round of NDC and Doncaster and Sheffield have been invited to submit bids for schemes.

Housing Investment Programme: £207 million was allocated to local authorities for 2000–01, 46 per cent. more than the previous year.

Regional Selective Assistance (RSA): RSA to the value of over £15 million was offered to businesses. This is expected to lead to capital investment of £207 million and the creation/safeguarding of over 6,200 jobs.

European Funding: GOYH has worked hard with regional partners to ensure that all available resources under the last round of European funds were committed by the closing date of 31 December 1999. Over £560 million of funding has been committed to support a wide range of projects that maximise the benefits to the region. GOYH continues to work closely with partners to ensure that the new European programmes for 2000–06 are ready to start in 2000.

Local Transport: Last year the region's local authorities received a total allocation of £109 million for their provisional local transport plans (LTPs). GOYH has continued to support the local authorities with the preparation of their full LTPs, which will cover the five years to 2005–06.

Working with Local Government: GOYH has continued to support the modernisation of local government and has contributed to the assessment process for Beacon council and Invest to Save applications from local authorities.

In looking to the future, the Government Office will continue to work closely with Yorkshire Forward and other partners to deliver the shared vision of "A world class, prosperous region".

Fuel Costs

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he proposes to introduce to assist motorists in rural areas with fuel costs. [130406]

Mr. Hill: The Government recognise that transport provision is particularly important to people in rural areas because jobs and services are more widely dispersed than in urban areas. In the 10-Year Plan for transport, we are developing a package of measures to improve transport provision in rural areas and we shall be developing our ideas further in the forthcoming Rural White Paper.

Bicycles on Trains

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what directions he is making to the Strategic Rail Authority to ensure that all new rail franchises require the operators to make adequate flexible space for bicycles available on their trains. [130532]

Mr. Hill: The Deputy Prime Minister gave Instructions and Guidance to the Franchising Director on 29 September 1999 about rail franchise replacement asking him to promote the use of bicycles by seeking the provision of reasonable facilities on board new rolling stock and at stations. The replacement franchise agreements will contain provisions relating to both the carriage of bicycles on trains and the provision of storage facilities for bicycles at railway stations.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish (a) the minutes of his meeting with Regional Development Agency heads in Birmingham in June and (b) each of the business plans subsequently presented by those heads. [130438]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Deputy Prime Minister and other Ministers met the Regional Development Agency Chairmen in Birmingham on 23 June, to launch a consultation document, "The RDAs as Strategic Drivers of Economic Development". A copy of the document has been placed in the Library of the House.

It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to disclose confidential communication between departments and public bodies, consistent with Section 2 of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. We will, therefore, not be publishing the minutes of the meeting. The production of a business plan by each RDA is unrelated to this meeting. Two have been published and others are at various stages of preparation.

Government Offices for the Regions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the future role is of the Government Offices for the Regions; and what (a) are their proposed budgets and (b) were their budgets in each of the last five years. [130437]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Following the publication of the PIU Report "Reaching Out" we are developing the role of Government Offices (GOs) to ensure strengthened co-ordination of policy initiatives with a regional and local impact. The GOs are being given the lead role in bringing together other Departments' and Agencies' involvement at the local level, ensuring activities are complementary. All Departments whose responsibilities affect regional or local activities are committed to better co-ordination of key policies by involving Government Offices.

On the issue of proposed budgets and budgets in each of the last five years, I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 12 July 2000, Official Report, columns 557–59W.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what urban regeneration funds have been made available from agencies under the control of his Department for the Millennium Dome and its environs; how such funds have been used; and what estimate he has made of the sale proceeds which will be recredited to his Department; [130439]

(2) how much public funding through English Partnerships has been spent on the Millennium Dome and its environs. [130436]

Ms Beverley Hughes: English Partnerships, which is under the control of my Department, purchased the Greenwich Peninsula site from British Gas in 1997. Since then it has used part of its regeneration funding grant from my Department to remediate the site, provide roads, footpaths, services, landscaping, river wall walks, improvements to the A102 and permanent facilities such as a park. The part of the peninsula directly associated with the Millennium Dome covers land north of the Jubilee line and North Greenwich Transport Interchange. English Partnerships' expenditure for this area amounts to £15.53 million. The sales proceeds returning to the Department will be determined in the light of the Dome Legacy Competition.

SERPLAN

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when, and in what form, the Government will respond to the recent vote by SERPLAN rejecting his house building numbers for the South-east. [130440]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Secretary of State will carefully consider all the views expressed by SERPLAN and in more than 900 other representations received on regional planning guidance for the South-east, before he reaches any conclusions.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what monitoring his Department undertakes of private finance initiative contracts undertaken by local government; and if he will make a statement. [130277]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 116W.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the net present cost is of each project undertaken in his Department under the private finance initiative; what the value is of their public sector comparators in (a) pre-risk and (b) risk-adjusted terms; what risks have been identified as having been transferred; and if he will place information on other relevant costs for each private finance initiative project in the Library. [130255]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what clawback mechanisms exist under private finance initiative contracts within his Department in respect of (a) refinancing and (b) other contingencies; and if he will place copies of each private finance initiative contract in the Library. [130210]

Ms Beverley Hughes: General provisions exist within all the private finance contracts for payments to be made by the contractor in relation to termination on contractor default. The contract for the Croydon Tramlink includes an incentive share agreement whereby Transport for London will share in any refinancing benefits. Transport for London would also receive a share of any excess revenues obtained by the concessionaire. A refinancing of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link (CTRL) would benefit the Government by reducing the requirement for operating subsidy. In addition the CTRL contract allows Government to share in any construction cost underrun as well as a positive cashflow after 2021.

The MOT computerisation contract includes provision for value for money reviews to be conducted at pre-determined intervals which will examine profit compared with predicted profit which could result in payments back to the Vehicle Inspectorate. This contract also enables the Vehicle Inspectorate to share in the profits of any value added services deriving from the contract.

In accordance with Treasury Taskforce Policy Statement No 5 (Provision of Information to Parliament), which sets out best practice in relation to departments' obligations to disclose information to Parliament, my Department has not deposited any information in the Library.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the average cost to public funds is of external advisers in the negotiation of private finance intiative projects for roads projects expressed as a proportion of each contract's value. [130258]

Mr. Hill: Figures for individual contracts are not available. For the eight privately financed trunk road contracts awarded in England the cost of external advisers expressed as a proportion of the contracts' value is less than one per cent. of the net present value of expected payments over the 30 year life of contracts.

Green Ministers

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the last meeting of Green Ministers took place; what was discussed; and which departments were represented by (a) Ministers and (b) officials. [131071]

Mr. Meacher: Green Ministers held their second meeting of this year on 6 July. We discussed progress on integrating the environment into policy and the feasibility of reporting on transport emissions on the Government Estate. The Green Minister for the Department of International Development, my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), spoke about the sustainable development priority (within the Government's National Strategy) of

> "working with others to achieve sustainable development internationally" and the Green Minister for the Department of Trade and Industry, the Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce, outlined progress on DTI's Sustainable Development Strategy.

The Committee also reviewed plans for a pilot on the public procurement of paper goods, including recycled paper, as announced in the Waste Strategy 2000 and considered the format for the 2nd Green Ministers' Report due to be published in the autumn. Support was also given to a proposal to share experience between departments on the implementation of Environmental Management Systems (EMSs), which should help spread good practice on implementing and certifying EMSs across the Government Estate.

The next meeting will be held on 2 November 2000.

The departments represented by Ministers were: Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions; Department for Culture, Media and Sport; Foreign and Commonwealth Office; Department of Health; Department for International Development; Law Officers' Departments; Lord Chancellor's Department and Department of Trade and Industry. Those represented by officials were: Chancellor's Departments, Home Office and Department of Social Security. The Whips Office was also represented.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) core and (b) non-core training and training support activities and services which will be included in the competition to seek a long-term strategic partner to run the Army Training Estate; and if he will indicate the website where these competitions have been advertised. [124362]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Department's core and non-core training and training support activities and services provided in support of the Army Training Estate are as follows:

None of the core functions will be included in the competition. All of the non-core functions will be considered for inclusion in the competition for a strategic partner. Some non-core work may be included in other Ministry of Defence (MOD) competitions.

The competition for the strategic partner has not yet been advertised as MOD is currently engaged in consultation with the Trade Unions.

BOWMAN

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the cost of the personal role radios that his Department intends to buy; [127608]

(2) if staff requirement (L) 4083 vehicle integrated communications and information system continues to form part of the BOWMAN requirement; [127607]

(3) if he intends to hold a competition for the BOWMAN requirement; [127609]

(4) if the personal role radios to be procured will be compatible with both section and platoon nets; [127606]

(5) what (a) was the original and (b) is the current budget for the BOWMAN requirement. [127610]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Robert Key, dated 13 July 2000:

I am replying to your questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about the BOWMAN communication project. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The personal role radio (PRR) is a short range radio designed to facilitate communications within sections and other small military teams. The PRR will be required to work with existing Clansman and BOWMAN man portable radios which will enable section commanders to pass information from the platoon net to the section and vice versa. The PRR is currently being procured through competition. It is therefore not possible now to give a definitive cost figure, but it is expected that the whole life cost will be in the order of £40M.

The original budget for the procurement of the BOWMAN system was £1.9Bn at 1993/94 economic conditions. Allowing for inflation this equates to the current budget for the procurement of BOWMAN, as currently constituted, of £2.2Bn at 1999/00 economic conditions.

ACSL is currently the preferred source for the supply of BOWMAN. Study contracts were placed earlier this year with Computing Devices Canada and Thomson CSP to ascertain whether alternatives to the current ACSL solution for BOWMAN might be available to compete for the requirement. These studies have reported and are being evaluated. We expect a decision on the way ahead for the BOWMAN project later this Summer.

I can confirm that staff requirement (L) 4083 vehicle integrated communications and information system continues to form part of the BOWMAN requirement.

Ceremonial

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost was of (a) Beating the Retreat and (b) Trooping the Colour for each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [128787]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 3 July 2000]: Costs were not collected for the Queen's Birthday Parade (Trooping the Colour) and Beating the Retreat until 1996 and were not identified separately until this year. The total costs between 1996 and 1999 were:

1996	33,400
1997	34,300
1998	35,200
1999	36,000

For this year, the cost of the Queen's Birthday Parade was £31,200 and for Beating the Retreat £7,420, giving a total of £38,620.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129093]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

The number of New Dealers within my Department and its executive agencies represents 0.06 per cent. of total civilian staff.

During the financial year ending March 2000, a target of 1 per cent. in respect of the recruitment of New Deal candidates into the appropriate grades was set. Actual achievement was 2.3 per cent.

Tornado GR4

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the Tornado GR4's capability to launch Sea Eagle missiles; how much has been spent on enabling the Tornado GR4 to launch Sea Eagle missiles; and if this element of the upgrade programme is planned to continue. [129805]

Mr. Spellar: Software development work to allow the Sea Eagle missile to be launched by Tornado GR4 aircraft was incomplete at the time the missile was withdrawn from service and further work was halted. This development work was part of the overall software upgrade programme for the GR4 and the costs are not separately identifiable.

Chain Gun

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the facilities (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere which (i) manufacture the chain gun and (ii) are capable of manufacturing the chain gun. [129669]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 7 July 2000]: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Tornado (Fraud)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what investigations his Department's police fraud squad is conducting into allegations of accounting irregularities and financial malpractice on the Tornado maintenance programme; when the investigations began; when they will be completed; and if he will make a statement. [129043]

Mr. Spellar: This is an operational policing matter. I understand however that the Ministry of Defence Police Fraud Squad began investigating allegations of malpractice connected with the Tornado maintenance programme last month. At this stage it is not possible to say when the investigation will be completed.

Centre for Defence Medicine

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence where the proposed Centre for Defence Medicine will be sited; when the centre is due to open; and if he will make a statement. [130092]

Dr. Moonie: The Centre for Defence Medicine will be located in Birmingham and is being developed in association with the University Hospital Birmingham NHS Trust (UHB) and its academic and clinical partners. The Centre is due to open as planned on 1 April 2001. Defence medical personnel will be working at the UHB's Queen Elizabeth and Selly Oak sites and some will be working very closely with the University of Birmingham and other academic partners. We continue to be extremely pleased with the way the project is developing and with the enthusiasm and commitment of our partners in Birmingham.

West Indies Guard Ship

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which ships have fulfilled the role of the West Indies guard ship in the past 18 months; and if he will list the dates during which the ships have been on station. [130447]

Mr. Spellar: The ships that have fulfilled the role of the Atlantic Patrol Task (North) (previously known as the West Indies Guard Ship) in the past 18 months are as set out:

Ship	On station
HMS Marlborough	29 January 1999 to 17 June 1999
HMS Northumberland	17 June 1999 to 23 November 1999
HMS Manchester	15 February 2000 to 26 June 2000
HMS Cardiff	26 June 2000 to est. end November 2000

Royal Fleet Auxiliary

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current industrial dispute involving the Royal Fleet Auxiliary. [130448]

Dr. Moonie: The current industrial dispute involving Rail, Maritime and Transport Union (RMT) members of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary commenced in February this year following their rejection of the 1999 pay offer, which has subsequently been implemented by administrative action. The issue at the centre of the dispute is a demand by the RMT for additional Earned Voyage Leave While nothing further can be done for 1999, RMT members have been guaranteed improvements to leave in addition to pay both for the current year and in years to come. It is disappointing therefore that they are continuing the action.

RFA vessels that are directly involved in front-line operations or on humanitarian relief tasks have been exempted from the individual action by the RMT. Changes are being made to other vessels' movements and deployments when necessary to minimise the effect of such action. RMT members are however now taking continuous action. This will mean that ships in port will be prevented from sailing, as happened with Sir Geraint on 11 July. In these circumstances, my Department has no alternative other than to apply appropriate sanctions.

The Ministry of Defence remains ready to talk to the RMT with a view to solving the dispute by negotiation.

Royal Navy University Units

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to disband University Royal Navy units. [130445]

Mr. Spellar: There are no plans to disband University Royal Naval Units.

HMS Sheffield

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the future role of HMS Sheffield will be. [130444]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Sheffield will continue to fulfil a wide range of general purpose and specialist roles in support of UK interests worldwide. In order to maintain her capability across a variety of defence missions, her weapons and sensor suites, including the Sea Wolf AAW missile system and her combat management system, will receive upgrades during the course of her next refit.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sport Action Zones

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many Sport Action Zones there are in the Greater London area. [129790]

Kate Hoey: There is currently one Sport Action Zone in Greater London: London South Central, which covers the areas of North Southwark and North Lambeth. It is one of the first 12 Sport Action Zones announced in January this year. It is eventually intended to designate 30 Zones across the country.

Baltic Exchange

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what reports he has received from English Heritage concerning whether the former Baltic Exchange building can be rebuilt; what conclusions were reached by English Heritage; and if he will place a copy of the reports in the Library. [R] [129708]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 7 July 2000]: My Department has seen a copy of a recent letter sent to the City Corporation, in which English Heritage sets out its view on the current planning and listed building consent applications relating to the Baltic Exchange site. In forming that view English Heritage has had regard to (among other considerations) the extent to which the original building could be reconstructed. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library.

Football Competition Bids

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assistance his Department has offered to the United Kingdom football associations for (a) recent and (b) future bids to host international football competitions in Britain. [129926]

Kate Hoey: No financial assistance was offered by my Department to the FA in respect of the bid to hold the European Championship Finals of 1996. However, my Department made a commitment to providing funding totalling £400,000 for the cultural programme which ran alongside the tournament in the eight host cities. Following the success of the 1996 bid, this amount was paid through the Association for Business Sponsorship for the Arts and the Sportsmatch scheme.

Direct costs to the Government have arisen in respect of the previous Minister of Sport's visits to a number of countries in support of the bid. The cost of these visits was £102,780, although some other Government business was also conducted.

My Department committed a total of £20,000 to assisting the FA's bid to hold the 2006 World Cup. That amount is in respect of the travelling expenses of the Prime Minister's Special Envoy, and £10,000 has been paid to date.

Cricket Training

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the adequacy of cricket training facilities for young people outside school hours. [130105]

Kate Hoey: Outside school hours the largest providers of cricket training facilities are cricket clubs, and of the 6,600 affiliated clubs, around 4,100 have junior sections. In 1999 there were 157,000 youngsters who participated in these clubs.

Funding is also available to cricket through the Lottery Sports Fund, one of whose priorities is young people. The Fund has made 527 awards to cricket facilities, worth a total of over £61 million, towards project costs of over £107 million.

The ECB spends 11 per cent. of the £26 million per annum it receives from broadcasting revenue for the development of cricket. Approximately 2,000 coaches per year are qualified through the England and Wales Cricket Board (ECB) Coach Education Scheme and the majority of these go on to work with young cricketers in clubs. The ECB is investing £450,000 on Inner City Projects this year to increase the opportunities for young people to play cricket.

Junior cricket is also eligible for funding from Sportsmatch, the Government's sports sponsorship incentive scheme. Since its inception in 1992 Sportsmatch has made 336 awards worth a total of over £2.08 million to grass roots and junior cricket applications in England, attracting a similar amount in commercial sponsorship.

Works of Art (Theft)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people have been successfully prosecuted for the theft of works of art and artifacts from the national collections since 1990. [130061]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have asked my officials to contact the National Museums and Galleries which are sponsored by DCMS to request information for a reply to my hon. Friend's question. I will write to him as soon as this is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

"Households Below Average Income"

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the latest edition of "Households Below Average Income" will be published. [130923]

Mr. Darling: "Households Below Average Income" for 1994–95 to 1998–99 has been published today and copies have been placed in the Library.

Fresco Interiors

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) when Fresco Interiors will receive payment of their invoice of 14 May for flooring work undertaken at his Department's offices at Quarry Hill in Leeds; [130461]

(2) if the contract for the maintenance of his Department's premises at Quarry House in Leeds contains a clause requiring the contractor, and any sub-contractors, to make prompt payment to suppliers for work undertaken; and if he will make a statement; [130462]

(3) what his Department's policy is regarding prompt payment of sub-contractors used by contractors responsible for the maintenance of his Department's buildings; and if he will make a statement. [130463]

Mr. Rooker: The contract for the flooring work undertaken at Quarry House is between Fresco Interiors and G. S. Hall, the sub-contractor of Trillium who supply the Department with serviced accommodation. Payment of the invoice is therefore a matter for G. S. Hall.

The Department does not have a universal set of standard terms and conditions for contractors and sub-contractors simply because different contracts, some of which can be very complex, require different provisions. We do however ensure that, wherever possible, contracts include provision for payment of all sums within a specified period not exceeding 30 days from the date of receipt of a valid invoice. As a Department, we fully support the Government's prompt payment initiative and aim to pay all our bills on time and will endeavour to ensure that all contractors do likewise.

Organophosphates

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what costs have been incurred, in each of the most recent three years for which figures are available, in making payments for industrial injury benefits to those suffering organophosphate poisoning from sheep dips. [130400]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested.

The table shows the number of people in the last three years who were first diagnosed as having prescribed disease C3 (Poisoning by phosphorus or an inorganic compound of phosphorus or poisoning due to the anti-cholinesterase or pseudo anti-cholinesterase action of organic phosphorous compounds) which includes poisoning from sheep-dip.

Pilot Projects

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which pilot projects undertaken by his Department since 1997 have involved random assignment elements; and what assessment he has made of their effectiveness in promoting more effective policy making. [130311]

Mr. Rooker: The Pensioner Income Support Pilots (poorest pensioners) used the random assignment approach.

The pilot ran for a year from May 1998. Four different approaches to encourage entitled non-recipient pensioners to claim Income Support were tested in nine areas. Pensioners identified as possible eligible non-recipients were randomly allocated to one of the four approaches. The pilot was fully evaluated and findings were published in December 1999 in the DSS Research Series (report no. 105).

Findings from the evaluation informed the current Minimum Income Guarantee (MIG) take-up campaign.

Housing Benefit

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has to require local authorities to spend a greater proportion of their budgets on Housing Benefit exceptional hardship payments; and if he will make a statement; [130241]

(2) what plans he has to prevent local authorities from retaining money unspent from their Housing Benefit exceptional hardship payment budgets; and if he will make a statement; [130242]

(3) what plans he has to introduce an independent element to the review process for local authority Housing Benefit exceptional hardship payments; and if he will make a statement. [130245]

Angela Eagle: Using provisions in the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill, we propose, from April 2001, to replace the current system of exceptional hardship and exceptional circumstances payments with a new scheme of purely discretionary payments to meet housing costs, which are not part of the Housing Benefit or Council Tax Benefit schemes.

Under these provisions, local authorities will be provided with a sum of money from central Government towards this expenditure, and we propose that they will be required to return any of the money that is not spent. Since local authorities will not be able to keep anything they do not spend, this should encourage them to use the money for the purpose intended.

Although claimants will not be able to appeal the decisions made by local authorities on these discretionary payments, they will have an internal right of review. Local authorities will be able to revisit decisions and take account of representations made.

Once these provisions are in place, we will be involving the Local Authority Associations in discussions on how we can ensure that the right criteria for payment are set and claimants made aware of their entitlement.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 10 March 2000, Official Report, column 843W, on housing benefit, (1) what assessment he has made of the impact of the introduction of the housing benefit verification framework on delays in paying housing benefit; and if he will make a statement; [130068]

(2) what plans he has to monitor the impact of the introduction of the housing benefit verification framework on delays in paying housing benefit; and if he will make a statement. [130069]

Angela Eagle: The verification framework sets out what local authorities should be doing to safeguard the gateway into benefit.

We recognise that implementing the framework may create some short term administrative delays in those local authorities which have not previously operated an adequate verification or checking system.

The Department has commissioned in-depth research to provide more information on authorities' experiences of setting-up and operating the framework. This will include information on the impact on the time taken to determine claims.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the difficulties that claimants may have accessing Housing Benefit offices during their opening hours in order to comply with the requirements of the Housing Benefit Verification Framework; and if he will make a statement. [130065]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Housing Benefit is the statutory responsibility of local authorities. The provision of adequate access to services is a matter for individual local authorities.

The Verification Framework does not require that clients must attend a benefit office in order to verify their entitlement to benefit. The Framework is flexible enough to allow each authority to provide the services most appropriate to its own area and clientele. These can include dealing with evidence gathering by post or by visiting, as well as by clients calling at an office. It is open to councils to provide alternative venues for clients who wish to produce documents in person. For example, some councils have trained staff in neighbourhood offices and libraries to collect and verify evidence on behalf of their benefit colleagues.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 155W, what estimate he has made of the (a) cost, (b) technical difficulties and (c) improvement in accuracy of increasing the sample size of the area benefit reviews. [130175]

Angela Eagle: The estimated cost of the current Housing Benefit review programme is £1.5 million for 1999–2000. This represents set up costs of the project and costs associated with staff recruitment. The project is expected to cost £2.1 million per year thereafter at current prices.

Technical difficulties are being overcome by incorporating Housing Benefit into the Benefits Agency's Area Benefit Review (ABR) programme. The ABRs are a rolling programme of benefit reviews, which provide estimates of losses due to claimant fraud and error. This procedure is well established and will use the technical expertise the agency has acquired over a number of years.

We plan to sample 5,010 additional cases each year to estimate the level of fraud and error in standard Housing Benefit. This gives us a level of accuracy around the central estimate of between ±10 and 20 per cent. of the central estimate. For example if incorrect expenditure was estimated to be 10 per cent. of total expenditure we would expect the actual value to between 8 and 12 per cent. Increasing the sample size produces diminishing improvements in the accuracy of the estimates. For example, doubling the sample size to 10,000 cases would produce an estimated 25 per cent. improvement in the accuracy of the estimates, i.e. the level of accuracy would then be 7.5–15 per cent.

Benefit Costs

Jean Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was, or is expected to be, the real terms cost at 1999–2000 prices of (a) Child Benefit, (b) One Parent Benefit and, following Table 2 in the DSS report and Expenditure Plans, the element for Lone Parents, included for Child Benefit from April 1997, (c) Family Credit and Working Families Tax Credit, (d) Children's Tax Credit and (e) the estimated cost included in Income Support for children, and, applying the Government Actuary's assumptions of both 1½ per cent. and 2 per cent. earnings growth, each of the above as a percentage of gross domestic product in each of the years 1994–95 to 2001–02. [130059]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129494]

Mr. Rooker: The Department has standing instructions requiring staff to report changes in marital status.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to inform the married women who have retained the right to pay the reduced rate of National Insurance contributions of the consequences of their option with regard to future eligibility for incapacity benefit. [128596]

Mr. Rooker: A publicity exercise will be undertaken later this year. It will be aimed at all women who hold a valid election to pay National Insurance contributions at the reduced rate.

(2) how many agencies of his Department use interactive voice response systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [127400]

Mr. Mandelson: None.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for his Department and its agencies the approved list of manufacturers of (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles; and if he will make a statement on his Department's leasing and purchasing policy. [128993]

Mr. Mandelson: The Northern Ireland Office and its agencies do not have approved lists of manufacturers for either cars or commercial vehicles. Vehicles are sourced using either UK national framework agreements or by open competitive tender. Procurement (i.e. purchasing or leasing) for the NIO is normally undertaken using the open procedure. The procurement practice for such contracts is governed by national and international regulations, in particular EC Directives. These Directives mean that government must conduct public purchasing according to three basic principles—openness and transparency of award procedures, genuine competition in contract award, and no unlawful discrimination.

In certain circumstances (e.g. security) the restricted procedure is used. Where this procedure is used companies may apply to be included on a restricted list of approved suppliers. Their inclusion on such lists is subject to their meeting the required criteria.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129628]

Mr. Mandelson: None.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129482]

Mr. Mandelson: At present, no special arrangements operate to notify those members of staff who have elected to pay married women's reduced rate National Insurance contributions to keep the Department informed of changes to their marital status. All staff are informed at induction and are periodically reminded by general office notices thereafter of the necessity to keep the Department informed of any change in their personal circumstances which may have a bearing on the accuracy of records kept about them, or in relation to their pay or other entitlements or conditions of their employment.

Lords Lieutenant

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money his Department has spent in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available on (a) lords-lieutenant and (b) their deputies in Northern Ireland. [129681]

Mr. Mandelson: The information is contained in the table.

There is no separate record of expenditure on the lords-lieutenant and their deputies.

PRIME MINISTER

Government's Annual Report

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Prime Minister when he will publish the Government's annual report. [130231]

The Prime Minister: I have done so today. Copies have been placed in the Library and are available in the Vote Office.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many written parliamentary questions tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April 2000 have not received substantive answers, excluding those not answered on the grounds of (a) disproportionate cost, (b) that the information is not available, not held centrally, or not held in the form requested and (c) of commercial or other confidentiality. [127097]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 21 June 2000]: I assume the right hon. Member is referring to parliamentary questions where Ministers have sent a holding reply, and will reply as soon as possible. If so, there have been seven such cases out of a total of 1,187 parliamentary questions answered by my Department in the period in question.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions he has deposited papers in the Library in response to parliamentary questions tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April 2000. [127439]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 23 June 2000]: For the period in question, my Department has deposited papers in the Library in response to parliamentary questions on 40 occasions.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many written parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department between 19 October 1999 and 20 April; and how many have not received substantive answers, citing disproportionate cost as the reason. [128017]

Mr. Morley: For this period there have been 1,189 written parliamentary questions tabled, and 21 did not receive substantive answers, citing disproportionate cost.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage this represents of total staff. [129098]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

The number of New Dealers within my Department and its Executive Agencies as at 1 April 2000 represents under 1 per cent. of total staff.

Soil Erosion

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to encourage the Environment Agency to issue advice to farms in areas where soil erosion and runoff from the land exist about how to stop or alleviate erosion and runoff. [129608]

Mr. Morley: My Department and the Environment Agency are working closely together to ensure that appropriate advice is made available to farmers whose land may be vulnerable to erosion and runoff.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will issue farms in those areas where there is soil erosion and runoff from the land with (a) codes of practice on protection of soil and water and (b) publications from his Department on controlling soil erosion. [129607]

Mr. Morley: My Department has already made available free of charge copies of the Water, Air and Soil Codes. In addition, advisory leaflets on controlling soil erosion, are also available free of charge. These leaflets have been promoted by a series of on-farm seminars, in areas which are vulnerable to erosion which were attended by farmers and the Environment Agency.

Sheep and Goat Identification

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on sheep and goat identification. [131060]

Ms Quin: Consultation documents were issued by my Department on 17 April to seek views on proposals to introduce a requirement for the tagging or tattooing of all sheep and goats in England before they leave their holding of birth. The consultation period ended on 12 June.

We have taken account of the comments given and we now intend to introduce new Sheep and Goat identification legislation in England in early September. Given the need to ensure that the industry has enough time to order and be supplied with the appropriate tags, we have decided that the tagging and tattooing requirements of the new legislation will not take effect until 1 January 2001. We will be writing to all sheep and goat keepers with full details of the new rules shortly.

International Whaling Commission

Ms Atherton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of this year's annual meeting of the International Whaling Commission. [131061]

Mr. Morley: The International Whaling Commission's 52nd annual meeting was held in Adelaide from 3 to 6 July. I attended the meeting, together with officials from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of the Environment, Transport and Regions and representatives of environmental organisations.

Australia and New Zealand put forward a proposal to create a South Pacific Whale Sanctuary. This would have complemented the existing Southern Ocean Sanctuary by protecting the breeding areas and migration routes of whales that feed in the Southern ocean. It was endorsed by the South Pacific Forum, which represents all the range states affected by the proposed sanctuary. The UK was one of the co-sponsors of the proposal, and I spoke strongly in favour of it. But although it was supported by the majority of those voting, it unfortunately did not receive the three-quarters of votes cast necessary for adoption. Both the Australian and New Zealand Governments indicated that they would be submitting the proposal next year; the UK will again be supporting it.

The UK took the lead in proposing a resolution condemning Japan's whaling under special permit (so-called 'scientific' whaling) and urging Japan not to proceed with its plans for a new programme in the North Pacific; this would involve, among other things, taking for the first time sperm and bryde's, as well as minke, whales. In introducing the resolution, I made it clear that the UK Government regarded this as a serious development and one that we would continue to raise both bilaterally and in other fora. The resolution was adopted by a large majority, as was a similar resolution on Japanese whaling under special permit in the Southern Ocean Sanctuary.

A resolution was adopted by consensus establishing a programme of further work on the Revised Management Scheme (RMS), which is being developed to regulate all aspects of any future commercial whaling. This followed a two day working group on the RMS which immediately preceded the IWC meeting itself. The resolution makes it clear that it does not affect, or in any way commit Governments to lift, the moratorium on commercial whaling. In agreeing to form part of the consensus we emphasised that the resolution did not commit us to accepting anything that we had not already agreed to, and that it did not preclude the inclusion of other elements in the RMS.

At the meeting I reaffirmed the UK's opposition to whaling. There was only a limited discussion of the Irish proposals for a package of measures on whaling; we made it clear that the UK's position on these remains unchanged. I am pleased to say that efforts by Japan to secure a quota of 50 minke whales, despite the moratorium on commercial whaling, was again defeated by a substantial majority. We also strongly criticised Norway's continued whaling activities.

I made clear the UK's continuing concern about the cruelty involved in whaling, and drew attention, in particular, to the need to improve the regulation and humaneness of hunts for small cetaceans such as dolphins and porpoises. Earlier in the meeting the UK made use of a video of a dolphin drive hunt in Japan which graphically illustrated the need for such improvements. Although it is primarily for the Government of the country concerned to regulate the killing of small cetaceans in its waters, I believe that the IWC has a useful role to play in helping to raise awareness of this issue and in improving standards.

A number of other issues were considered. In particular, resolutions were adopted supporting the IWC's research programme on the effects of environmental change and pollution on cetaceans; drawing attention to the need to improve the protection of North Atlantic right whales, one of the most critically endangered species of whales, from mortalities caused by ship strikes and entanglement in fishing nets; drawing attention to the need for improved measures to conserve freshwater cetaceans (river dolphins); and calling on Canada to reconsider takes of bowhead whales from highly endangered stocks by indigenous peoples.

While the failure to adopt the South Pacific Sanctuary was disappointing, in other respects this was a successful meeting for the UK, and demonstrated the continuing commitment by the majority of IWC members to upholding the moratorium on commercial whaling. The next IWC meeting will be held in London in July 2001.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Court of Justice Cases

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the number of cases which are currently before the European Court of Justice, listing the arraigned party in each case and the date on which each case was notified to the Court; [127915]

(2) if he will list, for each of the last 10 years, the number of cases brought to the European Court of Justice which have been ruled as inadmissible, giving details of the parties bringing the cases and the parties against whom they were brought. [127916]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 3 July 2000]: It will take some time to collate the information requested. I will write to my hon. Friend shortly with the information. Copies of the letter will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129487]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office does not issue any specific guidance on National Insurance obligations for married women. However all staff are expected to be aware of Diplomatic and Home Service Regulations. These require all officers to advise the administration of any changes in their marital status, including those that will have effect on their National Insurance contributions.

Austria

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the sanctions imposed by EU member states against the Austrian Government. [129813]

Mr. Vaz: Measures were implemented by the 14 member states to limit the bilateral relationship as an expression of our concern at the inclusion of a far right party in the Austrian Government. Chancellor Schuessel has now accepted the EU 14's proposal that a group of "three wise persons", appointed by the President of the European Court of Human Rights, should report on the Austrian Government's commitment to common European values and on the evolution of the Freedom Party. We fully support this initiative, and will, together with our other EU partners, consider the report and its implications when it is submitted.

Israel

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what account Her Majesty's Government have taken, in connection with imports from Israel under preferences, of public communications by the Government of Israel stating that Israel issues certificates of origin according to its own definition of territoriality. [130178]

Mr. Vaz: The European Commission is responsible for enforcing the trade provisions of the EU-Israel Association Agreement, under which Israel exports goods to the EU. The UK is currently participating in a Commission-led verification exercise in respect of goods imported from Israel. In this context the UK is aware of the communications made by the Israelis.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures that do not rely on Israel's co-operation the Government have taken as a High Contracting Party to the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 to ensure (a) that neither Britain's nor the European Community's own resources accrue to the benefit of Israel's illegal settlements and (b) that Israel's application of its own definition of territoriality in respect of its trade agreements with the EC does not persist under the EC-Israel Association Agreement that has just come into effect. [130179]

Mr. Vaz: The UK is not aware of any circumstances in which the UK or the EU's resources might accrue to the benefit of Israel's illegal settlements.

The European Commission will continue to enforce the trade provisions of the new EU-Israel Association Agreement and is currently conducting a verification exercise to confirm the origin of certain products exported from Israel.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Britain has taken to ensure that the European Community ensures that Israel conducts its preferential trade relations with the Community in a manner that accords with its agreements with the EC and with the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 in respect of products from settlements located in the territories occupied by Israel since 1967. [130197]

Mr. Vaz: The UK is participating in a European Community wide verification exercise initiated by the European Commission to confirm the origin of certain products exported from Israel.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many United Kingdom observers were accredited by the Zimbabwe authorities as election monitors. [130432]

Mr. Hain: No Britons were accredited by the Zimbabwe authorities as election observers, but there were Britons on the administrative staff of both the EU and the Commonwealth observer missions.

Diamond Imports (Sierra Leone)

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the introduction of a United Nations embargo on the import of rough diamonds from Sierra Leone. [130797]

Mr. Hain: The United Nations Security Council adopted resolution 1306(2000) on 5 July which prohibits the direct or indirect import of all rough diamonds from Sierra Leone to the territory of member states. The resolution also decides that rough diamonds controlled by the Government of Sierra Leone through a Certificate of Origin regime shall be exempt from the measures when the UN Sanctions Committee on Sierra Leone has reported to the Council that an effective regime is fully in operation.

Britain played a leading role in promoting resolution 1306 in the UN Security Council. Diamonds are at the heart of the tragedy in Sierra Leone and this resolution sends a powerful signal about the need to end the trade in conflict diamonds from Sierra Leone.

The embargo on Sierra Leone rough diamonds is established for an initial period of 18 months. At the end of this period the Security Council will review the situation in Sierra Leone, including the extent of the Government's authority over the diamond-producing areas, in order to decide whether to extend the restrictions for a further period, and if necessary, to modify them or adopt further measures.

The embargo is implemented in the UK by means of an amendment to the Open General Import Licence. Orders in Council under the United Nations Act 1946 will be made to implement the restrictions in the Crown Dependencies and Overseas Territories.

Strategic Export Controls

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Government's response to the Defence, Foreign Affairs, International Development and Trade and Industry Committees' report (HC 225) on the 1997 and 1998 Annual reports on Strategic Export Controls will be published. [130973]

Mr. Hain: We will publish the response to the Committees' Report (HC 225) on Friday 14 July. It will be published as a Command Paper at 12.00 pm and copies will be available in the Vote Office and in the Printed Paper Office in the House of Lords.

Diplomatic Representation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those British ambassadors and high commissioners who are (a) women and (b) members of an ethnic minority; and if he will express the number in each category as a percentage of the total number of ambassadors and high commissioners. [130401]

Mr. Hain: Out of a total of 144 Ambassadors and High Commissioners currently seven (4.9 per cent.) are women. A further seven women are head of subordinate posts.

There are currently no Ambassadors or High Commissioners who have declared themselves to be of a minority ethnic origin.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each British embassy or high commission the (a) staff numbers, (b) salary costs and (c) running costs for the financial years (i) 1997–98, (ii) 1998–99, (iii) 1999–2000 and the projected levels for (iv) 2000–01 and (v) 2001–02. [130122]

Mr. Hain: Much of the information requested by the hon. Member is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The remainder of the information will take some time to collate. I will write to the hon. Member shortly with the information. Copies of the letter will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Drugs Control

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs where the UN Drugs Control Programme field trials using Fusarium Oxysporum have been conducted. [130452]

Mr. Battle: UNDCP research into Fusarium Oxysporum, including field testing, has been conducted at a US Government research station in Hawaii.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) which UN-sponsored fungal herbicide field trial projects his Department supports to combat (a) coca, (b) opium and (c) marijuana; [130453]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 309W, on drugs control, for what reason Her Majesty's Government are not funding research into Fusarium Oxysporum; and if he will list the fungal herbicides for which Her Majesty's Government are providing research funding via the UN Drugs Control Programme. [130454]

Mr. Battle: The UNDCP research into Fusarium Oxysporum is fully funded by the United States. Her Majesty's Government were not approached for funding of this research.

UNDCP research into the viability of Pleospora Papaveracea, a naturally occurring fungus, as a control agent specific to opium poppy, is supported in part by UK funding, from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, of £100,000 which was granted in 1997. The UK is not funding UNDCP research into any other fungal herbicides.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has had with members of the UN Drugs Control Programme concerning the criteria used to decide where field trials of fungal herbicides to combat coca, opium and marijuana crops take place. [130456]

Mr. Battle: The decision on where field trials are held is made by the UNDCP and the authorities of the country where the trials are to take place. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office have not had discussions with UNDCP on this issue.

However, we have made it clear that if research into Pleospora Papaveracea showed it to be harmful to the environment, the UK would withdraw support and press for closure of the research programme.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the visit of the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities to the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations in June. [128090]

Ms Jowell: I visited the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations on 22 June in response to their kind invitation to be the keynote speaker at their annual conference on New Deal. During what proved to be a very successful conference I congratulated the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations and its member organisations for the significant contribution they had made to the successful delivery of New Deal in Scotland. I outlined the various measures that were being, or would be, taken further to improve the help New Deal can give to particularly disadvantaged young people and those who are long term unemployed. The SCVO video on the Voluntary Sector Option in Scotland was launched and an award presented to the 4000th young person to enter the option in Scotland. I looked forward to a continuation of the partnership working between SCVO, its members, the Employment Service and other New Deal partners that has been a special feature of the delivery of the option in Scotland.

New Deal

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many employers in Paisley, South, or the nearest available geographical unit, have agreed to take on one or more subsidised employees from the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds in each month since January 1998; and how many employers have agreed to take their first subsidised employee from the New Deal scheme for 18 to 24-year-olds in each month since January 1998. [128737]

Ms Jowell: The information is not available in the form requested but we do have aggregate information for the Johnstone and Paisley jobcentre catchment areas. Since April 1998, when the New Deal for young people was introduced nationally, a total of 237 employers have signed New Deal agreements and many of these have taken on one or more subsidised employees. Many employers signing agreements will also have taken on young people into unsubsidised jobs and in the Paisley, South constituency as a whole, over 400 young people have found jobs under the New Deal. This is a significant contribution to our manifesto commitment to help 250,000 young people into jobs through the New Deal.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent research he has carried out into the reasons for those in the New Deal scheme leaving the scheme prematurely. [128736]

Ms Jowell: The purpose of New Deal is to move people swiftly into jobs and the design of New Deal enables young people to leave from all stages of the process to take jobs or for other reasons. Those that return to Jobseeker's allowance within three months go back on to New Deal at the point they left. However, young people do leave the process without telling us where they are going. They are under no obligation to do so but we are naturally concerned to know more about their circumstances. As a result we commissioned a study in 1999 which told us that 57 per cent. of leavers went into jobs and 8 per cent. into training. A second survey of leavers to unknown destinations from all three stages of the New Deal for Young People is currently under way.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which parliamentary constituencies fall within which New Deal units of delivery. [129461]

Ms Jowell: There is no neat fit between New Deal Units of Delivery and parliamentary constituencies. It is for this reason that quarterly New Deal statistics for each parliamentary constituency have been produced and placed in the Libraries alongside those on a Unit of Delivery basis. A list of Units of Delivery and those parliamentary constituencies that fall, all or for the most part, within their boundaries is contained in the table, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries.

Jobcentres

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what guidance his Department has given to jobcentres regarding the advertising of jobs in the sex industry; and what definition of the sex industry is used in the guidance; [129110]

(2) what his Department's policy is regarding the use of public funds to subsidise job placement schemes with firms in the sex industry. [129835]

Ms Jowell [holding answers 4 and 10 July 2000]: Responsibility for the subject of these questions has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Foster to Mr. Tim Loughton, dated 12 July 2000:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked Leigh Lewis to reply direct to your questions, about the guidance given to Jobcentres on the advertising of jobs in the sex industry; and what definition of the "sex industry" is used in the guidance and about what the Departments' policy is about the use of public funds to subsidise job placement schemes with firms in the sex industry. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to Leigh Lewis as the Chief Executive of the Agency, I am replying in his absence.

Jobcentres are instructed not to deal with job vacancies associated with the sex industry. The guidance dates from 1996 and does not seek to define precisely the boundaries of the sex industry but has as its prime aim the need to avoid causing genuine offence or embarrassment to jobseekers.

All job placement subsidies provided by the Government require there to be a vacancy or opening with an employer. As the Employment Service does not deal with vacancies in the sex industry the question of subsidies does not arise.

I hope this is helpful.

ONE System

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 28 June 2000, Official Report, column 544W, concerning Welfare to Work and ONE, if he will list (a) the organisations and individuals consulted, (b) the organisations and individuals who attended the seminar on 18 January and (c) other organisations and individuals who have been asked for advice during the course of the review; and if he will make a statement. [130053]

Ms Jowell: Those who attended the seminar were:

Richard Blundell, Institute of Fiscal Studies;

Mike Campbell, Policy Research Institute, Leeds Metropolitan University;

Martin Evans CASE, The London School of Economics;

Dan Finn, Portsmouth University;

Abigail McKnight, CASE, The London School of Economics;

John Philpott, Employment Policy Institute;

John van Reenen, University College, London;

Anna Vignoles, The London School of Economics;

Simon Wilson, freelance consultant;

Helen Edwards, NACRO;

Amanda Jordan, NatWest Group;

Charles Lilley, KPMG together with officials from all the relevant Departments.

The rest of the information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Career Guidance

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that the level of career guidance available to 13 to 19-year-olds will be maintained by the Connexions service. [130226]

Mr. Wicks: The Government are committed to universal access to careers education and guidance for all young people. Every young person will get help to enable them to make well-informed decisions. We will be drawing up a national statement of what young people can expect from the Connexions Service including access to impartial careers guidance.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that the knowledge and experience of career guidance practitioners will be utilised by the Connexions service. [130225]

Mr. Wicks: The Connexions Service will offer at least the same level of careers information, advice and guidance for 13 to 19-year-olds as is currently provided by the Careers Service. It will be a universal service with a focus on removing any barriers to learning faced by young people.

The new Connexions Service will offer challenging new posts to be filled by people with the appropriate competence and skills, including people from the existing Careers Service, Youth Service and other statutory, community and voluntary organisations.

A major training programme for the personal adviser is being developed and the DfEE recently published a consultation document on the development of the professional framework for personal advisers. The document had been developed through discussion and consultation with representatives from the Youth Services, Careers Services and others and invites views and advice from a range of people including existing practitioners in both professions.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on how the independence and impartiality of career guidance practitioners will be maintained under the provisions of the Learning and Skills Bill [Lords]. [130227]

Mr. Wicks: Impartiality is a fundamental element of the Government's approach to guidance. The Connexions Service will offer at least the same level of impartial careers information, advice and guidance for 13–19 year olds as is currently provided by careers services. Local managers from the Connexions Service will agree with schools how school based personal advisers will be deployed and how the impartiality of guidance will be ensured.

The Learning and Skills Council has a power under the Learning and Skills Bill to secure for adults, the provision of facilities for providing information, advice or guidance about education or training or connected matters (including employment). The arrangements for ensuring the quality and impartiality of that provision will be for the Learning and Skills Council to agree with those organisations delivering it.

However, impartiality is and will continue to be a key principle underpinning publicly funded information, advice and guidance services. The Government have invested £54 million over the period 1999–2002 on the development of local information, advice and guidance services to adults. A key priority for that money is to raise the quality of information, advice and guidance provision through the development of national quality standards, underpinned by the principle of impartiality, against which providers of information, advice or guidance to adults are required to be accredited by March 2002.

Bargaining for Skills Project

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has for the future funding of North-west Bargaining for Skills by the Learning and Skills Council; and if he will make a statement. [130252]

Mr. Wicks: For the current year, Training and Enterprise Councils in the North-west have been able to meet only half the cost of the Bargaining for Skills projects, due to other pressing financial commitments. My Department will ensure that the balance is found to sustain the programme for the rest of this year.

Trade Unions have a unique and pivotal role to play in encouraging and facilitating learning opportunities at work. Nowhere has this been more effectively demonstrated than through the success of the Union Learning Fund and Bargaining for Skills Projects. Workforce development will be at the heart of the remit of the Learning and Skills Council, and we are currently discussing with the TUC the role that unions can play in supporting this.

Nursery Nurses

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what consultations are taking place on a new job title for nursery nurses. [129006]

Ms Hodge: No such consultations are taking place. Job titles for all paid support staff are decided locally, taking account of any national agreements reached between employers' organisations and unions.

Teacher Suicide Rates

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the annual suicide rate has been of (a) teachers and (b) head teachers in (i) all schools, (ii) primary schools and (iii) secondary schools in each year since 1989; how many suicides there were in each case; and if he will make a statement. [129843]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 11 July 2000]: Information on teachers in service who commit suicide is not available centrally.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129637]

Mr. Wills: ES is the only agency of the Department for Education and Employment that uses touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. The ONE call centre (benefit inquiry line) currently being piloted makes use of such a system.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems. [129619]

Mr. Wills: Within the Department for Education and Employment there are two departmental telephone lines used by the general public which are responded to by a touch tone telephone steering system. The Overseas Labour Service and the Qualifications for Work systems both make use of such systems.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has issued to local education authorities about services to asylum seekers and their dependants. [130114]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 11 July 2000]: Children of asylum seekers are entitled to the same educational opportunities as all other children. The Department has funded a number of publications by the Refugee Council aimed at helping children of asylum seekers access education. Officials here recently met representatives of the Refugee Council and the Local Government Association to discuss whether or not further guidance on the education of children of asylum seekers would be helpful to Local Education Authorities.

The Secretary of State has recently announced that £1.5 million is to be made available in this financial year to improve access to education for children of asylum seekers who are dispersed to cluster areas under the support arrangements in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. Up to £500 is available for each child. The money will go to schools to help with extra language lessons, and to help children settle in quickly.

Asset Management Plans

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 21 June 2000, Official Report, column 205W, what the deadline is for the submission of asset management plans by local education authorities. [130208]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 12 July 2000]: Our target is that, by December 2001, 90 per cent. of authorities' AMPs should be satisfactory in relation to DfEE performance standards. Our interim target, however, is that by December 2000, 90 per cent. of authorities' AMPs should be operational at least in respect of condition, suitability and sufficiency assessments.

Pupil Statistics

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pupils sat (a) GCSE and (b) A level exams early in the academic cycle; what was the youngest age at which the exams were sat; and how many students, as a percentage of all GCSE and A level students, sat exams early in (1) 1995–96, (2) 1996–97, (3) 1997–98, (4) 1998–99 and (5) 1999–2000. [127254]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 27 June 2000]: The information requested on GCSEs and GCE A level is shown in the following table.

	1995–1996	1996–1997	1997–1998	1998–1999
(a) GCSE entrants
Number of candidates who sat at least one exam before age 15	30,630	40,817	40,890	44,744

Data for 1999–2000 are not yet available.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the average length of time is between (a) the completion of the outline business case and the signing of the final contract and (b) the publication in the Official Journal of the European Community and the signing of the final contract, where applicable, of private finance initiative contracts for schools. [130253]

Jacqui Smith: To date, 16 schools private finance initiative contracts have reached final contract signature in England, taking on average 22 months from placing initial notices in the Official Journal of the European Community. Because many of these projects were advertised before the current arrangements for reviewing outline business cases were introduced in late 1997, it is not possible to provide a meaningful average length of time between outline business cases being approved and final contract signature. However, since the current arrangements were introduced, a typical schools project takes around three months for the outline business case to be assessed and approved.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what monitoring is undertaken of private finance initiative contracts for schools, further education colleges and higher education; and if he will make a statement. [130278]

Mr. Wicks: Responsibility for monitoring PFI projects lies with the relevant procuring body. For schools, monitoring is the responsibility of Local Education Authorities or other procuring bodies. The Department informs the Department for the Environment, Transport, and the Regions about services and payments arising from new projects, so that the overall level of revenue commitments can be monitored.

The Further Education Funding Council supports colleges in developing projects and monitors educational achievement, financial returns and the efficient use of property.

The Higher Education Funding Council for England monitors progress by requiring higher education institutions to submit progress reports on PFI contracts as part of their annual financial forecasts.

The Department works closely with LEAs and the Funding Councils to ensure that procedures are in place to monitor progress and value for money effectively.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what clawback mechanisms exist under private finance initiatives within his Department in respect of contingencies other then refinancing; and if he will place copies of each private finance initiative contract in the Library. [130263]

Mr. Wicks: The Employment Service has entered into three Private Finance Initiative contracts since 1997. It has established private finance deals for the delivery of procedural guidance via networked personal computers, for the delivery of all IT and related services, and for pay and personnel records.

None of these contracts has clawback mechanisms other than the normal agreements to reduce the charges made under each contract in the case of failure to meet agreed service levels.

I will be unable to place copies of these contracts in the Library, as they contain information that is considered commercially confidential.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what use of equity finance has been made in his Department's private finance initiative projects; and if he will make a statement. [130256]

Mr. Wicks: The Employment Service has entered into three Private Finance Initiative contracts. None of these projects makes use of equity finance.

Learning and Skills Council

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will announce the appointment of the Chief Executive of the Learning and Skills Council. [130798]

Mr. Wicks: Today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has appointed John Harwood as Chief Executive (Designate) of the Learning and Skills Council.

Mr. Harwood is currently Chief Executive of Oxfordshire County Council. He will bring the vision and breadth of experience that will be needed to set up and lead this important new public body. He brings a great deal of experience from a lifetime in public service, as well as a wide understanding of post-16 learning. Working with the Council's Chair Designate, Bryan Sanderson, he will be able to build a modern, effective organisation.

We aim to announce the Executive Directors of the local Learning and Skills Councils through the summer. A list of the successful candidates will be placed in the House Libraries.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Lords Lieutenant

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 7 July 2000, Official Report, column 356W, regarding lords lieutenant, if he will make a statement on the selection procedure which applies to the appointment of (a) lords lieutenant and (b) deputy lieutenants. [130402]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Lords Lieutenants are appointed by The Queen on the advice of the Prime Minister. In England, the Prime Minister's Secretary for Appointments carries out the consultation process within the county on behalf of the Prime Minister. Nominations of candidates for Lords Lieutenant can, when a vacancy occurs, be made to the Secretary for Appointments, the relevant Clerk to the Lieutenancy and the outgoing Lord Lieutenant.

The appointment of Deputy Lieutenants is a matter for the Lord Lieutenant, subject to the non-disapprobation of The Queen.

Prisoners (Useful Activity)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average number of hours of useful activity each week is in each British prison. [130020]

Mr. Boateng: The average weekly purposeful activity hours per prisoner in 1999–2000 for establishments in England and Wales are given in the table.

Ashfield and Forest Bank prisons opened late in 1999–2000 and are not included in this analysis.

Dangerous Driving

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of the inter-departmental working party on penalties for causing death by dangerous driving and related driving offences; and when he expects to produce a report. [130435]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The work of the review of penalties for road traffic offences is almost complete. The Government hope to publish a consultation document, setting out the proposals of the review, shortly.

UN Drugs Control Programme

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial assistance his Department provides for the UN Drugs Control Programme; and what this assistance is earmarked for. [130450]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In 1999–2000 the Home Office provided £1,171,000 for United Nations Drugs Control Programme (UNDCP) projects, allocated as follows:

	£000
Modernisation of the police academy and the strengthening of precursor control (in Brazil) (AD/BRA/98/D31 and D33)	478
Drug law enforcement in Pakistan (AD/PAK/98/D86)	480
Strengthening drug law enforcement (AD/RER/D41)	113
Regional clearance system for the control of movement of vessels (in the Caribbean) (AD/CAR/97/C49)	100

In addition £127,000 was contributed to the general fund of the UNDCP.

Police (Feira Report)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if police officers will operate (a) in national uniforms and (b) under a common code of practice under the provisions of the Feira Presidency proposals. [129920]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Feira Presidency report makes no proposals as regards uniforms or codes of practice for police officers from European Union member states deployed on international civilian policing operations.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to increase police numbers in order to provide the manpower indicated in Section C of the Feira Presidency conclusions. [129923]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Presidency Report to the Feira European Council on "Strengthening the Common European Security and Defence Policy" looks at establishing concrete targets for civilian police capabilities as part of a wider initiative on international non-military crisis management operations. The United Kingdom will be working with European Union partners to achieve the target agreed at Feira. The Presidency Report does not impose any national quotas which would oblige us to increase the number of United Kingdom officers who will be available for peace keeping missions abroad. We will continue to contribute to such operations on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the conditions under which police officers from other EU states would operate in the UK, as proposed in the Feira Presidency conclusions. [129812]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Feira Presidency Report contains recommendations and proposals which will enable the European Union to contribute more effectively to international peace and security by enhancing its contribution to crisis management operations led by international and regional organisations. There is no suggestion that officers from European Union states should operate as part of such a mission in the United Kingdom or any other European Union state or that the circumstances in the European Union are such that they would be required in such a capacity.

Children's Homes

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of missing children from children's homes have been investigated by the police since 1970; how many had led to the missing children being traced; and how many are currently under investigation. [129768]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There is no evidence of such information having been recorded or held centrally. The information could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost. However, we have accepted the recommendations of the Waterhouse Report which identified the need for the police and care homes to create a record of missing children. We will take forward the recommendations through an inter-agency review of best practice in conducting complex abuse investigations. A Review Group is being established to take forward this work, bringing together representatives from the Home Office, Department of Health, Local Government Association, Association of Directors of Social Services and the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Police Training College, Hendon

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have attended training programmes at the Metropolitan Police training college at Hendon in the last 12 months. [129823]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In the 12 months ended 31 March 2000, 9,342 officers from the Metropolitan Police attended courses at the Peel Centre, Hendon.

The courses attended included probationer training, detective courses, driver and traffic training, dog training, firearms, computer and management courses.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in reducing the incidence of domestic violence in England. [129937]

Mr. Boateng: The Government have made available from the Crime Reduction Programme £7 million for projects addressing domestic violence and rape and sexual assault by known perpetrators. I was pleased to announce the successful bids on 10 July. Of these, 25, costing a total of £5.3 million, deal with aspects of domestic violence. We expect this major commitment to lead to more women reporting these offences and in the longer term to a significant fall in the actual number of offences being committed.

This initiative complements a range of Government measures to ensure that the problem of domestic violence is tackled effectively, including in the last four months new multi-agency guidance, a new resources manual for Health Service professionals and a new Home Office Circular to the police. Our other initiatives and commitments are set out in the joint Home Office/Women's Unit publication, "Living with Fear: an integrated approach to tackling violence against women", published in June 1999.

Crime/Police Manpower

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent evidence he has collated on the correlation between the level of crime and (a) police numbers and (b) police funding. [129496]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In response to the intervention of the right hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) in the debate on the Crime Reduction Strategy on 29 November 1999, Official Report, columns 21–38, officials in my Research, Development and Statistics Directorate assembled information on changes in police numbers and recorded crime rates between (i) 1996–97 and 1998–99; and (ii) 1993–94 and 1998–99. The analysis is set out in Tables 1 and 2. Table 1 shows that 12 of the 21 top performing forces had falls in police numbers over the last two years, whereas in the other group of 22 forces, 14 had falls. At the individual force level, however, there seems little obvious statistical link between performance and police numbers. Table 2 shows that, over five years, there is little difference in the number of forces with falls in numbers in the top 21 forces and the bottom 22. Again, though, there is a very mixed picture overall, with the statistical relationship between police numbers and changes in crime over this period weak.

Other analysis by the Research, Development and Statistics Directorate around the same time also looked at the correlation at police force level between the changes in numbers of crimes, police numbers and police funding. The results are in Table 1. They show no association that carries much statistical weight when comparing forces. The strongest association is between increasing budgets leading to increasing officers.

Historic figures on overall police numbers in England and Wales and the total number of recorded crimes are in the Library.

Appointments (Women)

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many and what percentage of the (a) paid and (b) unpaid appointments which he has made to non-departmental public bodies since 1 May 1997 were women. [129846]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 12 July 2000]: The information showing paid and unpaid appointments made to non-departmental public bodies from 1 May 1997 and the percentage of women appointed is shown in the table.

This Government are committed to increasing the representation of women in public life. In support of this, the Department has drawn up an action plan for increasing the number of women and ethnic minorities holding public appointments. The latest plans, together with the Government's overall plan, were published on 24 May 2000 in "Quangos: Opening up Public Appointments 2000–03", copies of which are in the Library.

Football Hooligans

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) on 26 June 2000, Official Report, column 396W, on football hooligans, what the basis is for his estimate of the percentage of young males who have a criminal record. [130090]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 12 July 2000]: The estimate is based on information contained in Home Office Statistical Bulletin 14–95 which reports an analysis of the criminal histories of a large sample of offenders born in 1953, 1958, 1963, 1968 and 1973. The data confirm that 26 per cent. of men born in 1968 had a conviction for a standard list offence by the age of 24, 33 per cent. of those born in 1963 had a conviction for such an offence by the age of 28 while the comparative figures for those born in 1958 were 31 per cent. with a conviction by the age of 25.

Party Conferences (Policing)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much grant will be paid to Dorset Police towards the cost of policing the Conservative Party Conference in Bournemouth in autumn 2000; how much grant was paid in respect of the Labour Party Conference in Bournemouth in 1999; and if he will make a statement. [130186]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Dorset Police Authority will receive a special grant of up to £900,000 as a contribution towards the additional costs of the police security operation at this year's Conservative Party Conference.

The Dorset Police were given a special grant of £1.6 million towards the additional costs of policing the Labour Party Conference in 1999.

Speed Cameras

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police vehicles have activated speed cameras in (a) Wiltshire and (b) England and Wales in the last year for which figures are available. [130176]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is not available centrally.

Rural Policing

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the distribution of the money that he has identified for additional spending on rural policing in the current financial year, with particular reference to Staffordshire police. [130070]

Mr. Charles Clarke: With additional funds made available through the budget, the opportunity has arisen for the Government to recognise the special needs of rural policing. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary therefore agreed to make £15 million available for the remainder of this year to enhance the policing service in rural areas at no cost to the metropolitan forces.

I expect to make an announcement on the final allocation of this additional funding to the House next week.

Metropolitan Police

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate for planning purposes of net pensions fund obligations, pensions less contributions, for (a) the Metropolitan police and (b) all UK police forces in (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02, (c) 2005–06 and (d) 2010–11; and how these obligations will be financed. [127330]

Mr. Charles Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 June 2000, c. 523W]: I must amend an error in that answer.

The final sentence should read

> The provision of revenue funding for the police forces in Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of the devolved Administrations.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements he has made for publication of the Home Office Statistical Bulletin containing the recorded crime statistics for England and Wales for the period April 1999 to March 2000; and if he will make a statement. [130922]

Mr. Straw: The decision as to when the statistics on recorded crime are to be published is taken by the Director of Research, Development and Statistics at the Home Office and is announced well in advance, as was the date of 18 July for the publication of the crime statistics from March 1999-March 2000. Ministers are informed but not consulted about such dates. This follows the new arrangement to protect the integrity of national statistics which I established in 1997.

In the light of the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now planning, Parliamentary time allowing, to make a statement on public spending, on the afternoon of 18 July, the Director of Research, Development and Statistics, Professor Paul Wiles, has decided that the statistics will be published on 18 July as was originally announced, but at 00:01 hours rather than 11:00. An embargoed press briefing will be provided on 17 July so that the statistics can be reported on the morning of 18 July. At the same time as embargoed press copies are made available, they will also be sent to the Opposition. To ensure that Parliament is properly informed, copies of the crime statistics will be placed on the Home Office website and in the Library at 00:01 hours on 18 July.

HEALTH

GPs

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many and what percentage of GPs in each health authority area in England are due to retire by 2005. [129611]

Mr. Denham: Although there is no fixed retirement age for general practitioners they are removed from the health authority medical list on reaching 70 years of age if providing general medical services as a principal. Similarly doctors employed by personal medical services pilots or under the salaried doctor scheme cannot work past the age of 70. Numbers of GPs who will reach the age of 70 years by 2005 are available in the table. However these do not take account of doctors who may retire before age 70 by choice or for medical or other reasons, nor is any allowance made for those GPs who may exercise the option to retire and so claim their pension and gratuity but who may return to the health authority medical list 28 days later and continue working until they fully retire. In addition there is no retirement age for doctors who return to work as assistants or locums.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the policy since 1989 on writing annually to those of his Department's staff who are paying reduced rates of National Insurance contributions, reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates, as recommended in the Inland Revenue guidance note on reduced rate National Insurance contributions for married women. [129486]

Mr. Denham: The Department employs a small minority of women who pay reduced rate National Insurance contributions. The Department writes periodically to these staff reminding them of the rules governing the payment of reduced rates and whom they need to notify if their circumstances have changed.

Hernia Operations

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hernia operations have taken place in NHS hospitals in the Greater London area in the last 12 months. [129791]

Mr. Denham: The London Region was created on 1 January 1999 and the latest available data are for 1998–99 when London was covered by the North Thames and South Thames Regions. 1. The figures for 1998–99 are provisional, no adjustment has as yet been made for shortfalls in data (ie the data are ungrossed).

2. An FCE is defined as a period of patient care under one consultant in one health care provider. The figures do not represent the number of patients, as one person may have several episodes within the year.

3. Hernia has been defined as OPCS codes T19-T21 inclusive.

Ritalin

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received regarding the use of Ritalin. [129960]

Ms Stuart: We have received a number of representations, mainly from parents, expressing concern over the clinical evidence for using Ritalin. I am pleased that given this concern the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) is appraising the drug as part of its 2000 work programme. It will issue authoritative advice, which should ensure that professionals treating children and adolescents with emotional and behavioural disorders have an evidence-based approach to using Ritalin. NICE is scheduled to report its findings in October.

Continence Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people receive continence pads through the NHS. [130093]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 10 November 1999, Official Report, column 654W.

Circular Implementation

Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many reports he has received from the Social Services Inspectorate about the implementation of Circular HSC1999/162.LAC(99)28; and how many of them indicate that the circular is not being properly implemented. [130403]

Mr. Hutton: No formal reports have been received. However, the Social Services Inspectorate regularly undertakes detailed assessment of local social service authorities' performance including services for learning disabled people. In addition a survey of the use of the Direction on Choice to which the circular refers was carried out in 1998 and this was followed up by a series of regional seminars in the summer of 1999 to disseminate the lessons learnt. We are also developing a national learning disability strategy to be launched later this year which will aim to eliminate inconsistencies in service delivery.

Labelling

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the meeting between the Minister of State and the hon. Member for Linlithgow on 19 June, what discussion he has had with EU trade organisations concerning the labelling of medicines tested on animals. [128966]

Yvette Cooper: Pursuant to the meeting between the Minister for Trade and my hon. Friend, I can confirm that I have held no discussions with European Union trade associations concerning the labelling of medicines tested on animals.

Beta Interferon

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many EU countries do not publicly fund the treatment by beta interferon of people with MS. [128938]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in the UK with MS currently receive beta interferon; what this represents as a percentage of MS sufferers; and what the equivalent figure is in (a) France, (b) Germany and (c) the US. [128939]

Mr. Denham: We estimate that between 1,700 and 1,800 people in England are currently receiving beta interferon on the National Health Service, equivalent to around 3 per cent. of all patients with multiple sclerosis in England.

We understand that the percentage of patients with multiple sclerosis receiving beta interferon in France and Germany respectively is 12 per cent. and 13 per cent.

We do not held information for the United States of America.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average length of time is between (a) the completion of the outline business case and the signing of the final contract and (b) the publication in the Official Journal of the European Community and the signing of the final contract, where applicable, of private finance initiative contracts for hospitals. [130254]

Mr. Denham: The dates for approval of the outline business case, the notice in the Official Journal of the European Community and the signing of the final contract for the major private finance initiative hospital schemes (capital value over £25 million) are shown in the table.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if private finance initiative was considered for the Rochdale, Royal Berkshire, Central Sheffield and the Guys and St. Thomas hospital projects. [130249]

Mr. Denham: The private finance initiative was considered for each of the above hospital projects. In each case it was found that the publicly funded option offered the better solution.

Parliamentary Question

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons the question tabled by the hon. Member for Lewes on 21 February, for answer on 1 March, about bovine offals, reference 111898, has not been answered. [130396]

Yvette Cooper: I have answered the hon. Member's question today, Official Report, column 685W. I apologise for the delay.

BSE

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason his Department sought exemption for medicines from the ban on specified bovine offals when this was introduced for the food chain. [111898]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 1 March 2000]: The long established convention that Ministers generally are not given access to papers of a previous administration that would reveal former Ministers' opinions means that I do not have the information to answer this question. However I have already asked that all possible information on this topic be released directly to the BSE inquiry.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Derbyshire Magistrates Courts

Mr. Todd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when a decision will be made on proposals for the Private Finance Initiative for Derbyshire magistrates courts. [130170]

Jane Kennedy: Best and Final offers were returned by the remaining two bidders on 16 June 2000. The preferred bidder will be selected on 17 August 2000. Subject to the successful outcome of negotiations, contract close is expected in December 2000.

Mr. Todd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the estimated cost is of the investigation, preparation and assessment of the proposals for the Private Finance Initiative for projects connected with Derbyshire magistrates' courts. [130172]

Jane Kennedy: The estimated cost of the investigation, preparation and assessment of the proposals for the Private Finance Initiative for Derbyshire is £940,000.

Mr. Todd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the change to the annual operating costs of the Derbyshire magistrates court service following the Private Finance Initiative. [130173]

Jane Kennedy: No information on the likely change to the annual operating costs of the Derbyshire Magistrates Courts Committee following the Private Finance Initiative will be available [illegible] the conclusion of the negotiations with the bidders.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of correctly presented bills were paid by his Department in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 within 30 days of receipt of (i) goods and services, (ii) a valid invoice and (iii) other agreed payment terms. [130033]

Mr. Lock [holding answer 11 July 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Burgon) on 23 July 1999, Official Report, columns 677–78W.

Departments and their agencies are currently collating this information for 1999–2000 and this will be made available to the House shortly.

Tribunals Review

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the organisations consulted on the Review of Tribunals. [130098]

Jane Kennedy: The Review of Tribunals team have sent copies of their consultation paper to over 1,500 organisations and individuals. The list of those consulted includes Government bodies, the judiciary, consumer groups, the legal professions, charities, trade unions, and academics. A list of those consulted is available on the team's website: tribunals-review.org.uk.

TREASURY

Migration

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the annual level was of migration of (a) people and (b) households into the South-East from (i) London and (ii) the rest of England in each of the last three years. [129750]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 10 July 2000]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Drew, dated 13 July 2000:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to [illegible] recent question about the annual level of migration of people and households from London to the South East, and from the rest of England to the South East. (129750).

The attached table (i) presents the information for the movement of people that you require for each of the last three years. The latest year for which estimates are available is 1998. Data are presented for moves from London and the rest of England, to the South East Planning Region. The data show a net gain of people from London but a net loss of people to the rest of England. The estimates of internal migration within the United Kingdom are based on the movement of NHS doctors' patients between the former Family Health Service Authorities. They should not be regarded as a perfect measure of migration as there is variation in the delay between a person moving and registering with a new doctor.

Moves between the individual Government Office Regions (GORs) and the rest of the United Kingdom are published in Key Population and Vital Statistics, which is available in the House of Commons Library.

There are no annual data on household migration. The only data that are available come from the 1991 Census. The estimates of wholly moving households, between 1990 and 1991, are shown in the attached table (ii). For comparison the estimates of people moving are also shown for 1991.

(i) Number of people moving into the South East Planning Region[1]

Pensions Provision

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the extra yield from reducing the earnings limit on which income tax deductible personal pension payments are based to (a) £70,000, (b) £60,000 and (c) £50,000; and if he will make a statement. [129826]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 10 July 2000]: I regret that it is not possible to provide a reliable estimate.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) of 27 March 2000, Official Report, columns 46–47W, on secondments, if he will give the names, grades and job titles of the staff seconded into his Department from each organisation mentioned, stating in each case the name of the section they were seconded to and a summary of the work that they were involved with. [128254]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 29 June 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), on 27 March 2000, Official Report, columns 46–47W. The new members of staff were seconded into HM Treasury pay ranges D or E.

Names and job titles cannot be provided. Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. Before and after Interchange can occur all parties must be satisfied that no conflict of interest arises.

Continence Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 268W, on VAT, how many people qualify to receive zero-rated continence pads; [130091]

(2) what criteria are used to classify people as incontinent. [130124]

Dawn Primarolo: It is a matter for individuals living in their own homes and suffering from incontinence to declare they are chronically sick or disabled and therefore entitled to purchase zero-rated continence products. These declarations are held by the retailers and it is not known how many people are eligible for or claim this VAT relief.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 July 2000, Official Report, column 178W, if he will list his Department's targets for answering (a) named day parliamentary questions, (b) ordinary written parliamentary questions and (c) Lords written questions; and if he will make a statement. [130279]

Mr. Timms: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 11 July 2000, Official Report, columns 507–08W.

"Adding It Up"

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action is being undertaken to implement the recommendations of the Performance and Innovation Unit report entitled "Adding It Up"; and if he will make a statement. [130314]

Mr. Andrew Smith: An implementation group, chaired by the Chief Economist in the Treasury Public Service Directorate, and including experts from different departments and from academia, is being set up to promote and follow up the 41 conclusions of the "Adding It Up" report. Action falls to HM Treasury, the Cabinet Office, the Office for National Statistics, and to departments; good progress is being made.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which stakeholders will be involved in decisions made on allocations of resources from the Evidence-Based Policy Fund; when he will announce the detailed use of the first tranche of funding; and if he will make a statement. [130315]

Mr. Andrew Smith: An implementation group, chaired by the Chief Economist in the Treasury Public Service Directorate, and including experts from different departments and from academia, is being set up to promote and follow up the conclusions of the "Adding It Up" report, and to advise upon the allocations of the Evidence-Based Policy Fund. Successful bids from the first tranche of funding will be announced in the autumn.

Civil List

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the estimated surplus will be at the end of 10 years on the Civil List, assuming an average price increase of 2.5 per cent. per annum and a yearly 3 per cent. rate of return on the invested surplus. [130316]

Mr. Timms: The precise outcome would depend on the exact profiles of wage and price inflation, and of interest rates. If the assumptions stated applied uniformly across the period, and assuming that earnings growth is uniform and consistent with the 2.5 per cent. per annum increase in prices, the surplus at the end of 2010 can be calculated to be £8 million.

UK Growth Rate

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the standard deviation of the United Kingdom's growth rate over the previous economic cycle; and if he will make a statement. [130261]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 12 July 2000]: Over the economic cycle between 1986 Q2 and the first half of 1997, the Treasury estimates the standard deviation of the quarter on quarter growth of GDP (in 1995 prices and seasonally adjusted) was 0.62.

Since the first half of 1997 GDP growth in the UK has been less variable than over the previous economic cycle, with an estimate standard deviation to date of 0.27.

Bank Closures

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the proportion of bank closures in the past year which have been in Objective 1 areas. [129711]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 7 July 2000]: The information is not available.

Road Fuel Testing

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many days HM Customs and Excise road fuel testing units were operational within Dumfries and Galloway region during (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; how many prosecutions were brought for illegal use of red diesel during those years; and what the total value was of penalties and duty recovered during each of those years. [129801]

Mr. Timms: Detection figures are not available for regions. For the 1998 and 1999 figures, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 27 June 2000, Official Report, column 476W. For 1997 the vans were operational for a combined 367 days. 194 detections were made leading to penalties and duty recovered of £374,871. Two cases are pending prosecution.

Telephone Steering Systems

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many of his Department's telephone lines used by the general public are responded to by touch tone telephone steering systems; [129623]

(2) how many agencies of his Department use touch tone telephone steering systems when dealing with telephone inquiries from the general public. [129641]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Treasury has one such system. Of the Chancellor's seven agencies, Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue and National Savings use touch tone steering systems.

Endowment Policies

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on (a) the position of mortgage holders with endowment policies whose paid-up value has not covered or is not anticipated to cover the full repayment of their mortgage, (b) the consequences for those mortgage holders left with such a shortfall and (c) discussions he has had with the providers of such policies regarding assistance to customers in this position; [130081]

(2) if he will make a statement on (a) the extent to which mortgage endowment policies have been mis-sold on the basis that their eventual paid up value could not reasonably be expected to cover the full amount of the mortgage and (b) the redress available to those who believe they have been mis-sold such a policy. [130082]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) on 23 May 2000, Official Report, columns 415–16W.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employees of his Department and its agencies have been recruited from the New Deal; and what percentage of total staff this represents. [129141]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) on 6 July 2000, Official Report, column 286W.

Third-world Debt

Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he will make at the G8 Summit in July to obtain better financial arrangements for the world's poorest countries. [129088]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have both informed the Japanese Presidency of the G7 that they wish to use the opportunity of the Okinawa Summit to review and encourage progress on the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) debt initiative. The UK Government want to see as many countries as possible qualify for debt relief by the end of the year, in line with the G7 target set at Cologne.

The Chancellor also took the opportunity at a meeting of G7 Finance Ministers at Fukuoka last weekend to set out specific UK proposals on providing assistance for those HIPC countries where conflict is undermining the process of developing an effective commitment to poverty reduction which is needed in order to qualify for debt relief.

INDEX TO THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

SIXTH SERIES

OFFICIAL REPORT
SESSION 1999–2000

VOLUME 353

3rd July—13th July 2000

Printed indexes to Hansard

The volume index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the bound volumes of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The fortnightly index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the volume index but references are to the column numbering in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings and written questions:
    - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
    - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
    - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
    - Debates etc. (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
    - Sittings in Westminster Hall (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings); and
    - Questions (which includes written, oral and private notice questions).
